Lord ESHER, M.R.—It seems to me that the covenant for repayment in the deed of 1857 is a separate and independent covenant. The defendant, who was a party to that deed, undertook, in consideration of the loan of £450 to J. C. Buckenham, to become surety for its repayment in accordance with the terms of the covenant. That was a separate covenant independent of all the other covenants in the deed. It seems to me that a covenant, upon certain conditions being fulfilled, to repay on a certain day necessarily implies a covenant not to sue until that day upon those conditions being fulfilled. The affirmative covenant necessarily implies the negative. By the deed of 1884 the £450 was made part of the £3,200, and under the covenant in that deed the £3,200 is not to be repaid until a date later than that named in the deed of 1857. That covenant applies to the £450. That covenant necessarily implies a covenant not to sue until the date named. This covenant swallows up the covenant in the former deed, as it is entirely inconsistent with it. It is said that the plaintiff, by the deed of 1884, has reserved his rights under the covenant in the first deed. I care not whether he has purported to do so or not. He cannot say that he reserves his rights under that covenant when by the very terms of the second covenant he gives them up. It is useless for him to purport to reserve his rights. That being so, it is clear that the surety, who is no party to the second deed, is discharged. The judgment for the defendant is, therefore, right, and the appeal must be dismissed.

LOPES, L.J.—I am of the same opinion.

KAY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The deed of 1884 consolidated the various mortgages, including the mortgage of 1857 for £450. The several securities so consolidated were assigned as security for each and all of the debts, and therefore there would be further security given for the £450. That would satisfy the words "further security" in the deed of 1884. The deed of 1884 stipulates for payment of the principal sum secured thereby on a day later than that named in the deed of 1857. The argument urged on behalf of the plaintiff is that this covenant is not inconsistent with the covenant for repayment in the deed of 1857. It is clearly inconsistent if it means that the debt cannot be sued for until the day named. In my opinion that is the meaning of the covenant. There is that implied negative in the covenant, and it is not consistent with the covenant in the earlier deed. The result is that time has been given to the principal debtor, and, there being no reservation of rights against the surety, the surety is discharged.

Appeal dismissed.

HEWETT v. BARR. (a.)

Practice—Renewal of writ after expiration of twelve months—Statute of Limitations—Ord. 8, r. 1; ord. 64, r. 7.

The time for renewing a writ of summons will not be extended after the expiration of twelve months from the date of the issue of the writ where, in the absence of such renewal, the plaintiff's claim would be barred by the Statute of Limitations.

Doyle v. Kaufman, 26 W. R. 98, 3 Q. B. D. 7, 340, followed.

Appeal from the decision of a divisional court refusing an application to renew a writ of summons made more than twelve months after the date of the issue of the writ.

It appeared from the affidavits that every effort had been made to serve the writ within the twelve months, but that the defendant could not be found, and that on the last day of the twelve months a clerk to the plaintiff's solicitors was on his way to obtain a renewal of the writ when he was unexpectedly detained until it was too late to make the application that day.

The next morning an application to renew the writ was made to a master, who refused it on the authority of Doyle v. Kaufman, 26 W. R. 98, 3 Q. B. D. 7, 340, on the ground that the period fixed by the Statute of Limitations had in the meantime expired.

The Divisional Court upheld this refusal.

Cooper Willis, Q.C., for the plaintiff. — Even although the period of six years from the accruing of the debt for which the action is brought has elapsed, the court will under exceptional circumstances extend the time: Weldon v. Neal, 35 W. R. 820, 19 Q. B. D. 394; Eyre v. Cox, 25 W. R. 303. The rule laid down in Doyle v. Kaufman is not inflexible.

He referred to ord. 64, r. 7.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—According to the true construction of ord. 8, r. 1, this writ cannot be renewed. It is laid down in Weldon v. Neal as a general rule of conduct that amendments ought not to be granted where they will have the effect of altering the existing rights of the parties. This principle applies even more strongly where we are asked to renew a writ, and where by so doing we should deprive the defendant of his existing right under the Statute of Limitations. We must, I think, refuse this application and dismiss the appeal.

LOPES, L.J.—I am of the same opinion, and I base my decision on the case of Doyle v. Kaufman. In that case Cockburn, C.J., held that the power to enlarge the time given by ord. 57, r. 6, of the rules then in force did not apply to the renewal of a writ where the remedy had been lost by operation of a statute. When that case came to the Court of Appeal, although the appeal was dismissed on other grounds, the court intimated its approval of that opinion, and the practice has, I believe, been followed ever since.

KAY, L.J.—I think that under exceptional circumstances the court might, under ord. 64, r. 7, have power to grant such an application as the present. Here, however, there are no such circumstances as would warrant us in doing so. The affidavits merely state vaguely that every effort was made to find the defendant, and no sufficiently good reason seems to be given for having postponed the application for renewal till the very last moment.

I agree, therefore, that the application should be refused.

Appeal dismissed.

Metropolis — Vestry — Removal of ashes — "Refuse of trade, manufacture, or business"—Metropolis Local Management Act, 1855 (18 & 19 Vict. c. 120), ss. 125, 128.

Clinkers produced in the furnaces of certain boilers in an hotel, and used to generate steam for supplying power for the electric lighting of the hotel, for the heating of the public rooms, and for other purposes, are not "refuse of a trade, manufacture, or business" within section 128 of the Metropolis Local Management Act, 1855, so as to entitle the vestry to demand payment for their removal.

Per Lord Esher, M.R., and Lopes, L.J.—Gay v. Cadby, 2 C. P. D. 391, 25 W. R. Dig. 156, dissented from.

Appeal from the judgment of the Queen's Bench Division upon a case stated by a metropolitan police magistrate in the matter of a dispute referred to him under section 129 of the Metropolis Local Management Act, 1855, as to whether certain clinkers were "refuse of a trade," within the meaning of section 128 of that Act.

The respondent was the proprietor of the Hotel Metropole, within the appellants' district. The clinkers were produced in the furnaces of certain boilers which were situate in the basement of the hotel, and which were used to generate steam for the purpose of supplying power for the electric lighting of the hotel, for heating the large public rooms, passages, staircases, and halls, for cooking, and occasionally for working the lift, and pumping water to the top of the hotel. There were fireplaces and fires in the ordinary rooms of the hotel.

It was contended on behalf of the appellants that the clinkers were refuse of a trade within the meaning of section 128 of the Metropolis Local Management Act, 1855, and that the appellants were not bound to remove them without payment. The magistrate decided that the clinkers were not refuse of a trade.

The Divisional Court (Lord Coleridge, C.J., and Wills, J.) affirmed this decision. The appellants appealed to the Court of Appeal.

R. G. Glenn, for the appellants.—These clinkers are refuse of the trade or business of the hotel within section 128, and are not dirt, ashes, or rubbish within section 125, which the vestry would be bound to remove without payment. Section 125 deals with insanitary matter, and these clinkers never can become insanitary.

J. E. Bankes, for the respondent.—The clinkers are "ashes" in a solidified form produced in a furnace giving out great heat. These ashes are not the refuse of a trade, manufacture, or business, but were produced in a fire used for domestic purposes.

The following authorities were referred to:—Law v. Dodd, 1 Ex. 845; Lyndon v. Standbridge, 5 W. R. 590, 2 H. & N. 45; Gay v. Cadby, 2 C. P. D. 391, 25 W. R. Dig. 156; Collins v. Vestry of Paddington, 27 W. R. 504.

Cur. adv. vult.

Nov. 17.—Lord ESHER, M.R.—The question here is whether the vestry is entitled to be paid for the removal of these clinkers, which are in truth ashes, the result of a fire in a furnace used for various purposes connected with the hotel. I do not wonder at the difficulty felt in construing this Act, for it seems to me that different words are used in different parts of the Act when probably the same thing was intended. By section 125 of the Metropolis Local Management Act, 1855, the vestry is required to appoint and employ a sufficient number of persons, called scavengers, or to contract with any company or persons, for collecting and removing all dirt, ashes, rubbish, ice, snow, and filth in houses and places within their parish. That section is obviously a compulsory section. It is clear that what the vestry was asked in the present case to remove were ashes. Therefore, unless there is something in the Act to limit that obligation, the vestry would be bound to remove these ashes. We must give the full meaning to those words unless there is something in the Act to limit that meaning. The next section, section 126, provides that any occupier of any house or land, or other person, who refuses or does not permit any soil, dirt, ashes, or filth to be taken away by the scavengers, or who obstructs the scavengers in the performance of their duty, shall for every such offence forfeit and pay a sum not exceeding £5. Here we find that the word "soil" is introduced, the words "rubbish, ice, and snow" being omitted. Then comes section 127, where the words again are different from the words in either of the preceding sections, the words being all "dirt, dust, night-soil, ashes, and rubbish." Then comes section 128, which is the section relied upon as limiting the general obligation imposed upon the vestry by section 126. Section 128 provides that in case any scavenger be required by the owner or occupier of any house or land to remove the refuse of any trade, manufacture, or business, such owner or occupier shall pay to the scavenger a reasonable sum for such removal, such sum, in case of dispute, to be settled by two justices. That section deals with a case where the scavenger is required by the owner or occupier to remove the refuse. That cannot apply to matter which the vestry is bound to remove whether asked to do so or not. It cannot impose upon the owner or occupier an obligation to pay when the scavenger is simply asked to do that which it is his duty to do, and which he would be bound to do whether asked or not. It seems to me to apply to things which the owner or occupier may remove for himself if he pleases, and if he requires the vestry to remove them he must pay for it. It seems to me that the section cannot refer to the same things as in section 125. The words are new—"the refuse of any trade, manufacture, or business." The words are not "the refuse, the result of any trade, manufacture, or business." I think that the words "the refuse of a trade, manufacture, or business" are well known as a business term. The "refuse of a manufacture" applies where a material or subject-matter is being manufactured into something else, and in the course of the manufacture refuse from the material or subject-matter so being manufactured is produced. I cannot say that that is the only refuse of manufacture possible.

Next as to "refuse of a trade." I cannot define that term. I can see what is not included in that term. Take the case of a linendraper. No one could contend that the ashes resulting from fires used for warming the rooms in which the employees worked would be refuse of a trade. The refuse of that trade would be the pieces cut off the materials being made up for the purposes of that trade. There may also be other things which are refuse of that trade. But I cannot think that ashes from the fires would be refuse of that trade.

Then we have the words "refuse of a business." It may be that the word business was inserted because it was thought that the word trade was confined to cases where there was buying and selling. Can the ashes from the furnace used for the purpose of performing certain work in the hotel be the "refuse of a business"? I suppose there is a refuse of the business of an hotel keeper, but I am unable to say what it would be. But I cannot think that ashes from fires for working engines and for other purposes of the hotel are the refuse of the business of the hotel. I am therefore of opinion that the words of section 128 do not limit the large words in section 125, and that the vestry is bound to remove these ashes without payment.

With regard to the case of Gay v. Cadby, from what I have said, it is impossible to agree with that decision.

LINDLEY, L.J., read the following judgment:—The question in this case is whether the clinkers from the furnaces used in the Hotel Metropole for the purposes mentioned in the special case are to be removed by the parish scavengers without extra payment beyond what they are paid out of the rates, or whether those scavengers are entitled to extra payment from the hotel keeper for removing such clinkers. This question turns on the true construction of sections 125—129 of the Metropolis Local Management Act, 1855, and on the proper application of those sections to the facts of this case.

The special case assumes that the term "clinkers" requires no definition or description, and is well known to the court. I understand by it that hard material which is formed by the combustion of coal or coke as distinguished from the ordinary fire ash which is produced by the combustion of the same materials. Small clinkers are frequently found amongst the ashes of an ordinary fireplace. Closed stoves, such as Arnott's stoves or their modern varieties, produce larger and more numerous clinkers than ordinary fireplaces; and furnaces produce larger and more numerous clinkers still. All this is common knowledge, but has to be borne in mind. It is also well known that the uses to which clinkers can be put are very limited. Speaking generally they are unsaleable, and those who produce them are only too glad to get rid of them. They are rubbish.

In the sections of the Metropolis Local Management Act, 1855, which relate to the removal of matter by scavengers, a distinction is drawn between matter which the scavengers are bound to collect and remove without special payment, and matter which they are not bound to remove without such payment: see sections 125 and 128. Matter of the latter sort is referred to as "the refuse of any trade, manufacture, or business, or of any building materials": see section 128. Matter of the former sort is referred to as "dirt, ashes, rubbish, ice, snow, and filth": see section 125. The words "soil," "dust," and "night-soil," also fall within this class: see sections 126 and 127. Penalties are imposed on persons who will not allow matter of this sort to be removed: see section 127; and such matter, when collected by the scavengers, becomes the property of the vestry or local board appointing them: see section 127. I say "when collected by the scavengers," for that is, in my opinion, the meaning of "collected as aforesaid" in section 127. It is obvious that with so very rough a classification of matter as the above, questions would probably arise as to the class to which some kinds of stuff would belong; and, accordingly, it is provided by section 129 that such questions shall be decided by a magistrate. But now his decision may be reviewed on a case stated by him: see 42 & 43 Vict. c. 49, s. 33.

In this case the magistrate has decided that the clinkers in question are not "refuse of any trade," &c., within section 128, and this decision has been upheld by a divisional court. We are, however, invited to say that trade refuse (to use a compendious expression for that which is referred to in section 128) must include the clinkers in question in this case, and reliance is placed on Gay v. Cadby. In that case, however, the ashes were the produce of the furnace of a saw mill used exclusively for manufacturing purposes. The court there held that trade refuse cannot be confined to the waste residue of things manufactured, but can also comprehend the waste residue of substances used in the course of manufacture. This, in my opinion, is quite right. Take the case of metal smelting or roasting; the slag of the smelted or roasted metal and the clinkers of the furnaces employed to smelt or roast the metal may both be waste refuse within the meaning of section 128. Many other cases of the same sort may be put. I do not, however, think that Gay v. Cadby compels the court to say that the clinkers here must be trade refuse within section 128. The furnaces here are principally used for the same domestic purposes as ordinary grates or stoves, and are not used, as in Gay v. Cadby, exclusively for wholly different purposes. I am not prepared to define trade refuse, but I can see that in many trades and manufactures clinkers might come under that description. I think Gay v. Cadby was right, but I also think that these clinkers may, consistently with that decision, be regarded as falling within that kind of stuff which the scavengers must remove without extra payment.

LOPES, L.J., read the following judgment:—The question in this case is whether certain clinkers are "refuse of any trade, manufacture, or business" within the meaning of section 128 of the Metropolis Local Management Act, 1855.

The facts are set out in the special case. To determine the question raised it is necessary to consider the scheme of certain sections in the Act beginning with section 125 and ending with section 129 (being the sections relating to scavengers), and the meanings of those sections. The scheme of the sections appears to be twofold: With regard to certain things of no value, and which the owner or occupier of the house would wish to get rid of as being of no value and inconvenient to retain, to compel the vestry to remove them, subjecting those responsible for their non-removal, whether the vestry or its scavengers, and the occupier of the house if he obstructs their removal, to a penalty; but in the case of any refuse of a trade, manufacture, or business there is no such compulsion; there must be a request by the owner and occupier, and a reasonable sum paid for removal, on the ground, I presume, that such refuse may have some commercial value and on that account the owner or occupier may not desire its removal, and requiring a payment, because its removal is rather for his convenience than for any sanitary requirement.

These clinkers are ashes in a vitrified form. They are the unconsumed portions of the fuel used for the purpose of producing heat and light in aid of the business carried on in the hotel, but not refuse of the business, and fall within section 125 just as much as any other ashes. Fire is kept for the purpose of almost every trade, manufacture, and business. If we were to hold these clinkers refuse of a trade or business, I cannot see how any ashes produced in aid of any trade, manufacture, or business would be removable without payment, and this would be to limit the meaning of the word ashes in section 125 to an extent which I cannot think was contemplated.

It is difficult to give any exhaustive definition of "refuse of any trade, manufacture, or business," but the definition I am about to give describes what I think those words mean. It is what is discarded after the rest has been utilized for the purpose of working the trade, manufacture, or business; refuse which is the immediate and direct result of the trade, manufacture, or business; not a kind of refuse which would arise as much if there was no trade, manufacture, or business, and is only increased in quantity by reason of the trade, manufacture, or business.

I cannot agree with Gay v. Cadby. Lindley, L.J., can scarcely be correctly reported. He says: "Whatever be the true meaning of the word 'refuse,' it clearly means something beyond what is meant by the same word in section 125." The word refuse does not occur in section 125.

In re ELLIOTT.
ELLIOTT v. JOHNSON. (a.)

Will — Bequest to a "superstitious use" — Testator domiciled in England — Legatees resident abroad — 1 Edw. 6, c. 14.

A legacy to a "superstitious use," given by a testator domiciled in England, is void, even although the legatee is resident abroad where such a legacy is good.

A testator, who was a domiciled Englishman, bequeathed to priests of the Society of Jesus at Richmond, Victoria, one thousand pounds to be spent in masses for the repose of the soul of his late wife and his own.

Held, that the legacy, being void by the law of the testator's domicil as a gift to a "superstitious use," was not rendered valid by the fact that the legatees were domiciled in the colony of Victoria, although by the law of that colony the legacy would be valid.

Further consideration.

Charles Elliott, by his will, dated the 19th of September, 1882, provided as follows:—"After payment of all my just debts, funeral and testamentary expenses, I give, devise, and bequeath unto the priests of the Society of Jesus at Richmond, Victoria, one thousand pounds sterling, to be spent in masses for the repose of the soul of my late wife, Catherine Elliott, and my own." The will also contained other legacies and a gift of residuary estate.

The testator died on the 10th of July, 1886, domiciled in England.

The action was brought for administration of the testator's estate; the defendants were the two executors and trustees of his will, one of whom resided in England and the other in Australia.

This was the further consideration of the action, one of the questions for determination being whether the bequest to the priests of the Society of Jesus at Richmond, Victoria, was valid, notwithstanding that it was a gift to superstitious uses, because by the law of Victoria, where they were domiciled, such a gift was valid.

Burleigh Muir, for the plaintiff.—The bequest is void, as the testator died domiciled in England, and by English law, which governs the distribution of his personalty, a bequest of money to be spent in masses for the good of the soul is void by virtue of statute 1 Ed. 6, c. 14, as a gift to a superstitious use: West v. Shuttleworth, 2 My. & K. 684, 697.

Theobald, for the priests.—Such a gift was valid by the general law of England before the statute 1 Ed. 6, c. 14, which does not in terms make it void. Such a gift has only been declared void by implication, by virtue of that Act, which does not extend to the colony of Victoria. The gift is good according to the law of Victoria. The law of the testator's domicil does not make invalid such a bequest to a legatee domiciled abroad, but only when the legatee is in England. The object of the law against superstitious uses is to prevent superstitious uses in England, not abroad, and the English law invalidating gifts to superstitious uses does not apply to a legacy given to persons abroad. Such a gift is not like a gift immoral in itself, which is void everywhere.

He referred to Yeap Cheaah Neo v. Ong Cheng Neo, L. R. 6 P. C. 381, 24 W. R. Dig. 174; In re Michel's Trust, 8 W. R. 299, 28 Beav. 39; Mackintosh v. Townsend, 16 Ves. 330.

Woodroffe, for the residuary devisee.

George J. Duncan, for a legatee.

Richard Muir, for the executor in England.

Swinfen Eady, for the executor in Australia.

NORTH, J.—I think that the legacy is clearly bad. In Sill v. Worswick, 1 H. Bl. 665, Lord Rosslyn says, at p. 690, "It is a clear proposition, not only of the law of England, but of every country in the world where law has the semblance of science, that personal property has no locality. The meaning of that is not that personal property has no visible locality, but that it is subject to the law which governs the person of the owner. With respect to the disposition of it, with respect to the transmission of it, either by succession or the act of the party, it follows the law of the person. The owner in any country may dispose of his personal property. If he dies it is not the law of the country in which the property is, but the law of the country of which he is a subject, that will regulate the succession." That being so, as this testator was a domiciled Englishman, the English law governs the distribution of his personal property. According to the law of England a gift to a body of priests to be spent in masses for the soul of the testator's deceased wife and for the soul of the testator, is void as a gift to a superstitious use. It is none the better because the persons to whom the money is given have a domicil which is not that of England.

ASHLING v. BOON. (a.)

Evidence — Promissory note — Insufficient stamp — Evidence for collateral purpose—Stamp Act, 1870 (33 & 34 Vict. c. 97), s. 54, sub-section 1.

The defendant tendered as evidence of a loan an insufficiently-stamped promissory note.

Held, that the receipt of the money was of the essence of the promissory note and inseparable from it; that to admit the note as evidence of the loan would not be to admit it for collateral purposes; and that it must be rejected.

Trial of action.

A question arose in this case as to whether an insufficiently stamped promissory note could be admitted as evidence of the receipt of the money.

The defendant in the action claimed to be an equitable mortgagee of certain property in respect of advances made by him to a person since deceased, and as evidence of one of these advances he tendered at the hearing a document in the form of a promissory note for £40, whereby the recipient promised to pay £40 on demand for value received. This document was stamped with an adhesive penny stamp only, and could not be used as a promissory note, but it was argued that it was admissible as evidence of the receipt of the money.

Renshaw, Q.C., and E. Bray, for the plaintiff.—The document is insufficiently stamped, and cannot be made available for any purpose whatever: Stamp Act, 1870, s. 54, sub-section 1; Gregory v. Fraser, 3 Camp. 454; Roscoe's Nisi Prius Evidence, 15th ed., p. 558; Green v. Davies, 4 B. & C. 235. In Evans v. Prothero, 1 De G. M. & G. 572, the document was a contract, and not within this section. [KEKEWICH, J., referred to Ionides v. Pacific Insurance Co., L. R. 6 Q. B. 674, 20 W. R. C. L. Dig. 80, 21 W. R. 22, L. R. 7 Q. B. 517, and Tilsley on the Stamp Laws, 3rd ed., pp. 104, 247].

Marten, Q.C., and C. E. E. Jenkins, for the defendant.—The leading case on the point is Evans v. Prothero, which overrules the former cases, and shows that an insufficiently stamped document can be used for collateral purposes. There are two parts in this document—the promise, and the expression "for value received": Sutton v. Toomer, 7 B. & C. 416; Reg. v. Gompertz, 9 Q. B. 824. Section 17 of the Act of 1870 puts all instruments on the same footing.

KEKEWICH, J.—The defendant says that he from time to time advanced to James Donaldson certain moneys, making up a specific total amount, and that the first loan was £40, and in proof of that he tenders a document which expresses on the face of it that £40 was received by James Donaldson from the defendant on or before the 30th of April, 1878. The admission of that document as evidence is objected to by the plaintiff on the ground that it is a promissory note for that sum of £40, and being stamped only with a penny stamp is insufficiently stamped, and cannot be received in evidence. That it is a promissory note and is insufficiently stamped is beyond question. The defendant urges me to admit it on the ground that, according to the decision of Lord St. Leonards in Evans v. Prothero, this document, though not admissible as a promissory note, is admissible for some other purposes, and that the present purpose is within the exception. The words of the Act are stringent—"available for any purpose whatever." That certainly seems as if a promissory note could not be used for any purpose, either to be sued on as a note, or for any other purpose, if insufficiently stamped. That was the view taken in Green v. Davies, where an earlier statute governed the case, but a statute expressed in as stringent terms as the Act of 1870; and the court there, on a considered judgment, declined to admit the promissory note tendered in evidence because it was insufficiently stamped, and they declined to admit it as evidence of an account stated. At p. 242 Bayley, J., says:—"We therefore feel ourselves bound, though reluctantly, to say that the stamps in this case were not sufficient, and, if not, it follows as a consequence upon the third point that the note could not be received as evidence of an account stated. The statute 31 Geo. 3 provides explicitly that no note shall be given in evidence or available in law or equity unless the paper on which it is written is duly stamped; and to allow it as proof of an account stated would be to admit it in evidence and make it available on the last question."

Therefore, in that case, on a statute practically the same as the Act of 1870, I have a distinct decision that an insufficiently stamped promissory note cannot be admitted as evidence of an account stated, and therefore it follows that it could not be admitted as evidence of the receipt of money. Another authority has been referred to, Gregory v. Fraser, which I do not wish to pass over, for although the statute is not set out in the report, and may have been different from the present Act, still it is a decision of Lord Ellenborough, and entitled to great respect. There the note which it was attempted to put in was unstamped, and the object of putting it in was to prove that it had been obtained from the maker at a time when he was drunk, and Lord Ellenborough said it could not be admitted as a security or to prove the loan of the money, but it was admitted to be used for collateral purposes. That decision is of less value because we do not know what statute was in force at the time. There is another case of Sutton v. Toomer, in which a document was admitted, not being unstamped, but one which had been altered, and had become void on that account. So that takes it out of the present discussion. Here the document, which is said to be admissible, is insufficiently stamped. Mr. Marten's argument really comes to this, that these decisions were all before Evans v. Prothero, in which Lord St. Leonards laid down a different rule with respect to the case before him, and that that is the governing case now. As far as I am aware, that rule has never been departed from. There a document was put in which could not be admissible as a receipt because it was insufficiently stamped in that character, but it contained the essential elements of a contract, and Lord St. Leonards admitted it as evidence of a contract, although not as a receipt. He states the law at page 575, "that the document in question was receivable as evidence of an agreement, although, by reason of the fiscal regulations of the country, not as evidence of a receipt."

The answer to that case is that what he was dealing with was not a bill of exchange, but a document to which the same stringent regulations have not been applied. But, apart from that, the contract was entirely different from the receipt. It was one document containing two instruments, and the contract was clearly unconnected with the receipt. There might be a good receipt and no contract, or a good contract and no receipt.

Another case, somewhat nearer the present case, with reference to a slip for a marine policy, which is also subject to stringent provisions, is Ionides v. Pacific

(a.) Reported by H. C. ROPER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Insurance Co., where Blackburn, J., in giving a considered judgment at L. R. 6 Q. B. p. 685, says:—"As the slip is clearly a contract for marine insurance, and is equally clearly not a policy, it is, by virtue of these enactments, not valid—that is, not enforceable at law or in equity; but it may be given in evidence wherever it is, though not valid, material; and in the present case it is material." [His lordship referred to the judgment at some length, and continued:—] He must have meant material to some fact outside the policy. That goes to show, as I think Evans v. Prothero does too, that one must regard the fact it is admissible to prove as something collateral. Is the receipt in this case something collateral? The receipt of the money secured by the promissory note is of the essence of the promissory note. It is impossible to read this document as partly a receipt and partly a promissory note. It is a note for £40, and if I admit it as evidence of the receipt of £40 I shall in any other action—and, indeed, in this action—be giving him the right to sue for £40, notwithstanding that the statute says the note shall not be available for any purpose whatever.

On these grounds I feel compelled to reject the evidence, and I do so with the less hesitation because my doing so need not stop the case, for it is not the foundation of the whole claim, but only one item of it. If I am wrong, and if the defendant proves the rest of his case, he will have to prove the receipt of this £40 elsewhere.

[The case then proceeded, and in the event his lordship held that the defendant was not entitled to an equitable mortgage.]

In re LACON.
LACON v. LACON. (a.)

Ademption—Double portions—Legacy to son of shares in partnership—Gift of shares during life of testator.

A testator by his will gave to his three sons equally as tenants in common his shares in a partnership in a brewery business. At the date of the will he owned twenty-one twenty-fourth parts or shares therein. Between that date and his death he admitted one of the sons as partner, assigning to him two of such shares. The son at the same time gave up a salary he received as manager, and continued in active management of a branch of the business.

Held, that the two shares assigned to the son were ejusdem generis with the gift of shares contained in the will, and that there was an ademption of the shares given by the will to that extent.

Trial of action.

This was an action brought by some of the beneficiaries under the will of Sir Edmund Henry Knowles Lacon, deceased, to have it declared that a gift in the testator's will to the defendant Ernest de Montesquion Lacon of a share in the business of a brewer and in the property, effects, goodwill, and book debts thereof, was adeemed to the extent of two equal twenty-fourth shares in the said business, assigned to the defendant by the testator in his lifetime.

By his will, bearing date December 22, 1884, the testator gave all his parts or shares, estate, right, and interest of and in the trade or business of a brewer then carried on by him in Great Yarmouth, and in the City of London, and elsewhere, in co-partnership, under the style or firm of "Sir Edmund Lacon & Sons, the Great Yarmouth Brewery," and of and in all messuages, tenements, beerhouses, malthouses, public-houses, breweries, buildings, lands, and other hereditaments of every tenure whereon the said trade or business should at the time of his death be carried on, or which should then belong to the said co-partnership, and of and in all engines, machinery, fixtures, implements, utensils, plant, stock-in-trade, horses, drays, carts, carriages, tubs, and all other effects and things which at the time of his death should be used or employed in the said business, or belonging to the said co-partnership, and of and in the goodwill of the said trade or business, and of and in all book and other debts which, at the time of his death, should be due and owing to the said co-partnership, or on account of the said trade or business (but not his part or share of the cash which, at the time of his death, should be in the hands of the said co-partnership, or in the bank, or elsewhere, to the credit of the said co-partnership), to his sons, the plaintiff, Thomas Beecroft Ussher Lacon, and the defendants, Henry Sidney Hammet Lacon and Ernest de Montesquion Lacon, and their respective heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns respectively according to the nature and tenure of the subjects respectively, to and for their own use and benefit respectively in equal shares as tenants in common and not as joint tenants.

The will also contained a gift of the residue of the testator's estate and effects upon trust for all his children equally.

At the date of his will the testator was entitled to twenty-one equal twenty-fourth shares in the business. In December, 1887, the testator made over to the defendant E. de M. Lacon two of his twenty-one shares, and, though no assignment was actually executed, the latter was treated as owning such shares in a partnership deed dated the 19th of December, 1887. In this deed it was declared that the capital of the partnership should be taken to be contributed as to nineteen equal twenty-fourth shares thereof by Sir E. Lacon, as to two such shares by Admiral Willes, as to two such shares by the defendant, and as to the remaining one such share by Samuel Nightingale.

The defendant E. de M. Lacon had entered the business in 1874, and had since 1884 managed the London branch at a salary of £1,000. Since that date the business had increased and he frequently applied to his father for an increase of salary. To these requests Sir E. H. K. Lacon had never acceded until he voluntarily made his son a partner by the deed above mentioned, which was merely submitted to the latter for signature, but as to the terms of which he had not been consulted. At the same time Sir E. H. K. Lacon intimated that the salary and allowances hitherto enjoyed by the defendant would cease, as the profits from his share of the partnership would, in his opinion, be ample remuneration, and to this the defendant assented. The profits therefrom did in fact largely exceed £1,000 a year.

The testator died on September the 6th, 1888.

Sir H. Davey, Q.C., and Borthwick, for the plaintiffs.—There are no documents disclosing any negotiation or purchase of the shares in the partnership. The case is on all fours with In re Lawes, Lawes v. Lawes, 30 W. R. 33, 20 Ch. D. 81, and In re Vickers, Vickers v. Vickers, 36 W. R. 545, 37 Ch. D. 530. Ademption is easier to apply than satisfaction.

ture. As to whether the furniture was, in fact, dealt with by this agreement, I think the finding of the judge is conclusive that the previous transaction was completely undone by the parties, and that the furniture had revested in Wenman before he made the settlement. Two other points were raised. It was said that this agreement for a settlement was void under 13 Eliz. c. 5 as a fraud upon creditors. The county court judge has found that at the date of the agreement Wenman was solvent, and had money in the bank; undoubtedly he seemed to treat that as decisive of the question. It is said that he ought also to have found that there was no intention to defeat creditors. But there was no evidence of any such intention, and therefore the learned judge came to the right conclusion. The fourth question was whether this agreement for a settlement was a bill of sale. I appreciate the argument based on the analogy between this case and the cases upon the applicability of the Conveyancing Act, 1881, to agreements for leases, but I do not think the analogy exists. I think that the words "marriage settlement" in section 4 include marriage articles, which are not exactly a legal settlement, carefully and formally drawn. The reasoning which was used in In re Player exactly applies to this case. Cave, J., says: "The end and purpose of the thing must be a settlement—that is, a disposition of property to be held for the enjoyment of some other person." Those words are exactly in point when we are considering the construction which we are to put on the words "marriage settlement" in section 4, and I think that those words include documents which are in substance, though not in form, settlements made in consideration of marriage.

MAYOR, ALDERMEN, &c., OF MANCHESTER v. WILLIAMS. (a.)

Libel—Corporation—Personal charges made against a corporation—Right of action.

A corporation, as distinguished from its individual members or officials, cannot sue for a libel merely affecting personal reputation.

This was a point of law raised by pleadings under order 25. The plaintiffs, who were the Municipal Corporation of Manchester, brought an action for libel against the defendant upon the following letter.

"THE GAS SCANDALS.

"To the Editor of the Examiner and Times.

"Sir,—Manchester has lately been pitying poor Salford and has exhibited much cheap sympathy or contempt for that misguided, misgoverned, and much defrauded royal borough. Let Manchester look at home before it throws mud across the Irwell. Some years ago I felt it my duty to write for one of your contemporaries some half dozen articles dealing with the city council's scandalous and abominable expenditure of about £100,000 upon 'our' Victoria Hotel. That investigation brought some strange occurrences (not yet revealed by me) to my knowledge. I received visits from several gentlemen of high standing amongst us, who confided to me facts that dumbfounded me, and which showed that the citizens lost large sums of money by the lax way in which the job was managed, and that bribery and corruption prevailed to a regretable extent. Let me express the hope that the commission which Salford is asking for, may be extended so as to include Manchester, and if it possesses statutory power to send for persons and papers I will undertake to bring before it witnesses and documents who will (and I deeply deplore it) prove that in the case of two, if not three, departments of our Manchester Civic Council, bribery and corruption have existed and done their nefarious work.—Yours, &c., "S. NORBURY WILLIAMS."

The statement of claim alleged that the defendant meant by the said letter that bribery and corruption existed in three departments of the Manchester City Council, and that the plaintiffs were either parties thereto or culpably ignorant thereof. There was no allegation that the plaintiffs had been injured in the way of pecuniary or other loss by reason of the said letter. The defendant, in his pleading, objected that the words complained of were not capable of being construed as a libel upon the plaintiffs; that the statement of claim disclosed no cause of action; and that the municipal corporation could not sue in a corporate capacity in respect of the words complained of.

C. A. Russell, for the defendant.—This is not a libel upon the corporation, but upon individual members or officials of the corporation. The corporation has no personal character which can be injuriously affected by libel, and no injury to property is alleged. In the case of Metropolitan Saloon Omnibus Co. v. Hawkins, 7 W. R. 265, 4 H. & N., p. 90, Pollock, C.B., says:—"A corporation cannot sue in respect of an imputation of murder, or incest, or adultery, because it could not commit those crimes, nor can it sue in respect of a charge of corruption, for a corporation cannot be guilty of corruption, although the individuals composing it may."

Blake Odgers, for the plaintiffs.—The libel here complained of can refer only to the corporation as a whole, for it speaks of "scandalous and abominable expenditure," and that money must be voted by the corporate body and not by its individual members. For this wrong the corporation must be entitled to damages. A corporation is liable to be sued for a malicious prosecution, on the ground that it can be guilty of malice by its servants; there is no reason, therefore, why it should not be guilty of corruption by its servants; and if that is the case, it is entitled to sue for an imputation of such corruption.

DAY, J.—This is an action brought by a municipal corporation to recover damages for what is alleged to be a libel on the corporation itself as distinguished from its individual members or officials. The libel complained of consisted of a charge of bribery and corruption. The question is whether such an action will lie. I think it will not.

It is altogether unprecedented, and there is no principle on which it could be founded. The limits of a corporation's right of action for libel are those suggested by Pollock, C.B., in the case which has been referred to. A corporation may sue for a libel affecting property, not for one merely affecting personal reputation. The present case falls within the latter class. There must, therefore, be judgment for the defendant.

LAWRANCE, J.—I am of the same opinion.

IN BANKRUPTCY.

Q. B. Div. (Cave and Vaughan Williams, JJ.) Jan. 15.

Ex parte MANCHESTER AND COUNTY BANK. In re HULTON. (a.)

Bankruptcy—Money stolen by cashier of bank—Purchase of shares—Right of bank to shares purchased.

The bankrupt, who was the cashier in a bank, misappropriated moneys intrusted to him by his employers for banking purposes, and purchased therewith certain shares. The bankrupt absconded, and an application by the bank for an order that they were entitled to the shares purchased with the stolen money was refused by the county court judge.

Held, on appeal, that the order of the county court must be reversed, and that the trustee in bankruptcy must deliver up the shares to the bank.

Appeal from the refusal of his Honour Judge Jones, in the county court at Oldham, to make an order declaring that certain gold mine shares standing in the name of the bankrupt were the property of the Manchester and County Bank (Limited), and to direct the trustee to deliver up, the scrip and other documents of title to such shares, to the bank.

The bankrupt was formerly in the employment of the Manchester and County Bank as cashier in the branch bank at Oldham, and on January 27, 1890, fifteen £100 notes were sent from the head office at Manchester to the branch at Oldham for banking purposes.

On January 28, 1890, a letter was received by Messrs. Beazley & Co., stock and share dealers, in London, from the bankrupt containing fifteen £100 notes in payment for certain shares. These notes were identical in amounts, dates, and numbers with those sent to the bankrupt from the head office.

On February 1, 1890, the bankrupt absconded, and on the same day a warrant was obtained against him by the Manchester and County Bank on a charge of embezzlement, but this warrant had not been executed.

An order of adjudication having been made against the bankrupt in his absence, the Manchester and County Bank applied to the county court judge for an order declaring that they were entitled to the shares purchased with the money stolen from them, but this application was refused, the judge holding that the bank could not claim the produce of the stolen notes, but could only prove against the bankrupt's estate for the loss sustained by the theft.

The bank appealed.

Smyly, for the appellants.—The notes were put into the care of the cashier as the servant of the bank, and he held them in a fiduciary relation. When he committed a breach of duty to his master in stealing the notes and purchasing the shares, as the notes can be traced in the purchase of the shares, the bank can follow and claim them against the trustee.

Yate Lee, for the trustee.—I admit that stolen property may be followed, but that does not extend to a case where property is stolen and things purchased with the proceeds. The doctrine of following the property has never been so extended, and in certain cases a person might have to elect which property, that stolen or that converted, would be taken.

CAVE, J.—A very ingenious argument has been raised on behalf of the trustee, but it is impossible for us to give effect to it. It is admitted that if the clerk had stolen the fifteen notes and retained them, the trustee must have been ordered to give them up; but it is said that as the notes were exchanged into shares, something was thereby effected so as to enable the trustee to keep the proceeds. In my opinion it is impossible to find any authority for such a contention. The appeal must be allowed, and there must be an order on the trustee to deliver up the shares and to do all things necessary to vest them in the appellants.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J., concurred.

Appeal allowed.

"THE COUNTY OF DURHAM." (a.)

Practice — Appeal — County court having admiralty jurisdiction—District in which to commence action—County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act, 1868 (31 & 32 Vict. c. 72), s. 21—County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act, 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 51), s. 2.

A claim by a shipowner under the 2nd section of the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act, 1869, arising out of an agreement in relation to the use or hire of a ship belonging to him, is properly brought in the county court having admiralty jurisdiction within the district of which such ship happens to be at the date of the commencement of the suit.

This was an appeal from a decision of his Honour Judge Seymour, the judge of the county court of Northumberland, holden at Newcastle-upon-Tyne.

By the decision appealed from the county court judge had, in an action arising out of an agreement in relation to the use or hire of the ship County of Durham, refused to grant a motion on behalf of the defendants, the charterers of the said vessel, that the action should be dismissed for want of jurisdiction, the ground of the motion being that the suit had been wrongly commenced in the county court of Northumberland, holden at Newcastle-upon-Tyne, within the district, for admiralty purposes, of which The County of Durham was at the commencement of the suit.

The judgment of the county court judge, as printed for the purposes of the appeal, was in terms as follows:—

His Honour Judge SEYMOUR.—This is an action brought in the County Court of Northumberland held at Newcastle, on the admiralty side of this court, by the owners of the steamship County of Durham, Messrs. Johnson Brothers, of Newcastle, assignees of a charter-party dated the 2nd of April, 1889, made between Messrs. McAllum & Co., of Newcastle, and the defendants, the Poole, Baltic, and Quebec Timber Co. (Limited), as charterers of the ship, for breach of a clause in the charter-party, whereby the defendants warranted a certain depth of water at their wharf at Poole to berth the ship in, and owing to a breach of such warranty the ship ran aground and was damaged. It is expressly agreed between the parties that at the time of the commencement of this action the ship was in the Tyne, and therefore within the admiralty jurisdiction of this court.

(a.) Reported by C. F. JEMMETT, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The defendants have applied by way of motion to dismiss the action for want of jurisdiction, and the question I have to decide is whether their objection is good.

As the question is one of great importance to the shipping interest here and elsewhere, and as I believe this is the first occasion on which the point has been raised in any court, I have taken time to consider my decision.

So far as the plea may be said to depend upon the general admiralty jurisdiction of county courts over a charter-party of this description, no difficulty exists. The difference which prevailed a few years ago between the High Court of Admiralty and the Courts of Common Pleas and Exchequer on the one hand, and the judges of the Privy Council on the other, as to whether county courts in admiralty have not, under recent legislation, a more extensive jurisdiction in certain matters than the High Court in admiralty actions, has been finally set at rest by the decision of the Court of Appeal in the case of The Alina, 29 W. R. 94, 5 Ex. D. 227. This case, and that of Cargo ex Argos, L. R. 5 P. C. 134, 22 W. R. Dig. 46, are direct authorities for the proposition that an action on a charter-party by the owner or charterer of a ship is an action on an agreement made in relation to the use or hire of a ship within section 2 of the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act, 1869, and that that Act has given a jurisdiction to the county courts which the High Court of Admiralty did not possess.

The omission of any form applicable to the present case from the statutory forms given under the Act of 1868 may be explained, therefore, by assuming that the latter were, no doubt, compiled from those in use in admiralty actions in the High Court, which had jurisdiction in the cases mentioned in that Act, but not having jurisdiction in cases like the present, necessarily supplied no forms applicable to the case before me.

The only ground, therefore, upon which a plea in denial of the jurisdiction of the court can prevail is that to which the defendants have mainly limited their contention—viz., that the present action has been entered in the wrong district.

In the Act of 1869 there is no express clause defining or limiting the district in which proceedings are to be commenced, but by section 1 of the Act of 1869, the Act of 1868 and the Act of 1869 are to be read and interpreted as one Act. Turning, then, to the Act of 1868, s. 21, it is there provided that proceedings in an admiralty cause shall be commenced—(1) in the county court having admiralty jurisdiction within the district of which the vessel or property to which the cause relates is at the commencement of the proceedings; and (2) if the foregoing rule be not applicable, then in the county court having admiralty jurisdiction in the district of which the owner of the vessel or property to which the cause relates, or his agent in England, resides, &c.; and it has been strongly contended and urged with great reliance upon the forms and procedure in admiralty, that the word "vessel" to which the cause relates can only mean the ship or vessel of the defendant. It is clear that until the passing of the Act of 1869 the jurisdiction of the county court over claims for salvage towage, necessaries, or wages, or for damage to cargo or damage by collision, were all in the nature of proceedings for services rendered to, or injury done by, the ship or vessel of the defendant, and in any proceeding in rem the only ship in the contemplation of the parties would naturally and logically be the ship of the defendant; but now, by section 2, subsection 1, of the Act of 1869, a county court with admiralty jurisdiction can try any claim arising out of any agreement made in relation to the use or hire of any ship, and the present action is a proceeding in personam, under a charter-party, for the use or hire of the plaintiffs' ship, and complaining of damage resulting from breach of that agreement.

It has been argued that the present is not properly a cause relating to a ship, but I don't agree with that view, the expression "cause relating to a ship" only differs from "cause relating to the use or hire of a ship" as the greater differs from the less. If an action on a charter-party which, ex concessis, is an action upon an agreement relating to the use of a ship is not an action relating to a ship, it seems difficult to admit that an action for towage or wages is an action relating to a ship. To what ship does the present cause relate? The proceeding itself is not in rem but in personam, and the only ship indicated is the ship which is the subject of the agreement of hire, for breach of which this action is brought, and there is nothing in the words themselves, "vessel or property to which the cause relates," which involves any violence of construction in holding them to be applicable to the ship either of plaintiff or defendant as the case may be. I hold, therefore, that the present cause does relate to the plaintiffs' vessel, and as that vessel was within my jurisdiction at the time the cause was entered I decide against the application, and I hold that I have jurisdiction to try this action.

I may add that section 4 of the Act of 1869, which extends the jurisdiction of county courts in admiralty to all claims for damage to ships, whether by collision or otherwise, when the amount claimed does not exceed £300, is plainly intended to cover cases in which damage may be occasioned in many other ways besides collision, and in which the only vessel to which the cause could be said to relate would be the damaged vessel for which the plaintiffs brought this action. Whether upon the hearing of this cause it may appear to me more convenient and proper that it should be tried within the jurisdiction of the county court at Poole, is a matter which I may have to consider hereafter, but for the present I dismiss the defendants' application, with costs.

The appeal was now heard before the President and Butt, J., sitting as a divisional court of the Probate, Divorce, and Admiralty Division.

J. P. Aspinall appeared for the appellants, defendants in the court below.—The provision contained in the 22nd section of the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act, 1868, as to the arrest of vessels "to which the cause relates" shows clearly that the Legislature meant by the same phrase in the 21st section of that Act, the vessel of the defendant in the action. This meaning, so known to the Legislature when the Act of 1869 was passed, cannot have been altered by the fact that the two Acts are "to be read as one." Why should a different construction from what it originally bore be put on the section, because rules specifying the districts in which causes like the one now before the court should be commenced, have not yet been made?

Boyd, for the respondents, was not called on to argue.

HANNEN, P.—I have nothing to add to the judgment of the learned county court judge. The County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act, 1868, and the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act Amendment Act, 1869, are, by section 1 of the later Act, to be read as one. If the construction put on the language of the first Act before the passing of the second Act did not apply to the present case, the effect of the second Act, in my opinion, has been to extend the meaning to be given to that language, and, therefore, applying, as I must do, the words "vessel or property to which the cause relates" to the actions over which jurisdiction is given by the second Act, I think the action in this case was brought within the right district.

BUTT, J.—I concur, though if it had not been that the two Acts are to be read as one, I should have felt a great doubt.

In re ARBIB'S AND CLASS'S CONTRACT. (a.)

Vendor and purchaser—Conditions of sale—Right to rescind—Costs of investigating title—"Notwithstanding previous litigation"—Will—Devise to trustee "if and when he shall return to England."

The words "notwithstanding any previous negotiation or litigation" in a condition of sale stipulating that the vendor should be at liberty to annul the sale if unable to satisfy any objection insisted on by the purchaser, cannot be construed as including litigation in which a judicial decision adverse to the vendor has been actually given. Consequently, when, on a vendor and purchaser summons, an order had been made declaring that the vendor had not shown a good title, and directing him to pay the purchaser the costs of investigating the title,

Held, that it was then no longer open to the vendor to avail himself of the above condition.

A testator who died in 1877 appointed B., "now residing at Adelaide, Australia, if and when he shall return to England," and C., executors and trustees of his will, and devised real estate to his said trustees on trust for sale. The will was proved by C., with power reserved to grant probate to B. if and when he returned to England. B., at the time of the testator's death, and down to and at the present time, was domiciled in Australia, but in 1885 he came on a visit to England for the benefit of his health, and stayed there six months, after which he returned to his home in Australia. B. never proved the will, and although in 1879 he had indicated an intention to act as trustee, he had not during his visit to England or since, assented to the devise or taken any part in the administration of the trusts of the will, but he had not actually disclaimed.

Held, that, under the above circumstances, the condition "if and when he shall return to England" had been satisfied by B.; and, consequently, that the trusteeship had become vested in him in 1885.

Appeal from North, J.

W. Bucknall, by his will made in 1871, appointed his son, F. E. Bucknall, "now residing at Port Adelaide, Australia, if and when he shall return to England," G. C. Class, and J. A. Worge executors and trustees of his will; and devised his freehold estates to his said trustees upon trust, that the said trustees or the survivor of them, or other the trustees or trustee for the time being of the will, should sell the estates. The will contained a declaration that the power of appointing a new trustee or new trustees should be exercised by the surviving or continuing trustee or trustees for the time being of the will; and the three sons of the testator were given successively three months' option to take the freehold estates themselves, before the power of sale given to the trustees could take effect, such option to be communicated to the trustees.

Worge died in 1875, during the life of the testator, who died in February, 1877. The will was proved by Class, power being reserved to grant probate to F. E. Bucknall if and when he should return to England. F. E. Bucknall at the date of the will, and down to and at the present time, was domiciled at Adelaide in Australia, and was a member of the Legislature of the Colony of Victoria.

In April, 1879, F. E. Bucknall executed what purported to be a power of attorney to Class to act for him in the matter of the trusts of the will. This instrument, however, not being stamped, was not put in evidence. In 1885 F. E. Bucknall, being ordered a long sea voyage for the benefit of his health, came to England and stayed there with Class for a period of six months till January, 1886, when he returned to Australia. While living in England, Bucknall took no part in the administration of the trusts of the testator's estate, but had not then executed any formal disclaimer. In February, 1886, shortly after Bucknall's departure to Australia, Class, believing himself to be in fact the then sole trustee, appointed Pennick as a new trustee of the will in the place of the deceased trustee Worge; and on November 6, 1890, Class and Pennick, assuming themselves to be the only trustees of the testator's will, and purporting to act as such trustees, in exercise of the power of sale, entered into a contract with E. Arbib to sell the real estate to him.

The 8th condition of the contract stipulated that if the purchaser should make and insist on any requisition or objection, either as to title or conveyance, which the vendors should be unable or unwilling to remove or comply with, the vendors should be at liberty, notwithstanding any previous negotiation or litigation, on giving to the purchaser not less than ten days' notice in writing, to annul the sale; in which case the sale should, at the expiration of the notice, be annulled, the purchaser being, in that event, entitled to a return of the deposit, but without interest, costs, or compensation.

The purchaser took the objection that the testator's freehold estate had vested in F. E. Bucknall when he returned to England in 1885; that Bucknall and Class were therefore the persons in whom the estate was now vested as trustees, and that the present vendors accordingly had not a good title to the property.

On the 6th of November, 1890, North, J., made an order, on a vendor and purchaser summons taken out by the vendors, declaring that the vendors had not shown a good title to the property comprised in the contract.

The purchaser then applied to the vendors to return the deposit, and, the vendors refusing, a summons was taken out by the purchaser to compel them to return it. This summons was heard on November 24, 1890, the vendors opposing the application on the ground that an appeal had been lodged by them against the order of November 6. North, J., directed the deposit to be paid into court, and ordered the vendors to pay to the purchaser the costs of the investigation of title of the property, together with the costs of that summons.

After the decision of North, J., F. E. Bucknall executed a disclaimer of the estate devised to him upon trust by the will of the testator.

The vendors appealed from both orders of North, J.

Byrne, Q.C., and Grosvenor Woods, for the appellants.—The first point is as to the meaning of the words "if and when he shall return to England"; that is a question of intention to be gathered from the

been made for obvious purposes, after he had accepted the trusts and after the estate had vested in him, and it is, therefore, made too late.

On the second point I agree with the rest of the court. In In re Hargreave's Contract, 34 W. R. 708, 32 Ch. D. 654, it was decided that under the words in section 9 of the Vendor and Purchaser Act, which say that on an application in chambers "the judge shall make such order on the application as to him shall appear just, and shall order how and by whom all or any of the costs of and incident to the application shall be borne and paid," the court has power to decide what is to be done as to the costs of the investigation of the title.

On the first of the applications in the present case, where the only question was whether the vendors could make a good title, nothing was said in the order as to who should pay the costs of investigating the title. Then a subsequent summons was taken out to deal with the deposit in the hands of the vendors, and the judge on the hearing of that summons made an order that Class and Pennick should pay to the purchaser the costs of investigating the title. It cannot be denied that this order was within the jurisdiction of the court; that is established by In re Hargreaves. When that summons was before the judge it was not then argued that by reason of this condition in the contract of sale giving the vendors the right to rescind and to escape liability for the costs of investigating the title, that order as to costs ought not to be made.

But now the vendors, not having succeeded in persuading us that the order of the judge below as to the title was wrong, ask to be relieved from the further order as to the costs of investigating title. I agree with the Lord Chief Justice and Lindley, L.J., that the condition which allows the vendor to rescind "notwithstanding previous litigation" cannot apply to such a state of things as have happened here. The words "notwithstanding previous litigation" mean, in my opinion, notwithstanding litigation pending, not litigation decided at the time adversely to the vendor. I do not think that the words mean "notwithstanding previous litigation and judgment against the vendor."

COX v. BENNETT (No. 1). (a.)

Trustee—Administration action—Trustees appointed by the court to receive rents and to manage estate with commission upon rental—Commission to rent collector.

Trustees who have been appointed by the court to receive the rents of, and to manage a trust estate, receiving a commisson upon the rental, will not be allowed to charge additional payments made by them to a collector of rents.

Appeal from Kekewich, J.

William Tomlin, by his will dated the 3rd of April, 1865, appointed Edward Cox, George Legg, and John Bennett trustees and executors thereof, and gave to each of his executors who should prove his will the sum of £50, and after making various devises and bequests, devised and bequeathed certain messuages or tenements at Bromley unto his said trustees, upon trust out of the rents thereof to pay and discharge the ground-rents, rates, taxes, and other outgoings, and keep the same in proper repair and insured against fire, and to stand possessed of the surplus rents and profits thereof upon trust to pay the annual proceeds thereof to his daughter Laura for life for her separate use without power of anticipation, and upon trust after her death as therein directed; and the said testator directed that it should be lawful for his said trustees, with and out of the moneys which should come to their respective hands by virtue of the trusts aforesaid, to retain and reimburse themselves respectively and allow to his or their co-trustee or co-trustees all such costs, charges, and expenses as they or any of them should or might respectively actually sustain or incur in or about the execution of the trusts aforesaid, or in anywise relating thereto.

The testator died in 1866 and his will was duly proved by the three executors. The testator's daughter was at the time of these proceedings married to W. J. Midwinter.

In 1867 an action was commenced for carrying the trusts of the will into effect. On the 22nd of April, 1882, an order was made whereby R. Brown and W. J. Midwinter, two of the plaintiffs, were appointed trustees of the will, jointly with John Bennett, in the place of Edward Cox, deceased, and of G. Legg; and it was also ordered that these three trustees should receive the rents and profits of the trust estate and be allowed a commission of £3 per centum per annum, as stated in a former order dated the 1st of February, 1876.

In the trustees' accounts from the 24th of March, 1889, up to and including the 24th of March, 1890, the trustees not only charged their own above-mentioned commission of £3 per cent. on the rents received on Mrs. Midwinter's account, but also charged a further commission of £3 10s. per cent. for Messrs. W. & D. Brown as rent collectors, which further commission was represented by four items of payment, being severally £16 1s. 9d., £15 10s. 3d., £15 8s. 5d., and £15 7s. 6d.

The defendant Mrs. Midwinter took out a summons in the action asking (inter alia) that these four items should be disallowed, and on the 1st of December, 1890, an order was made by Kekewich, J., that these four items of disbursement charged against the applicant's share of income of the trust estate in respect of commission at the rate of £3 10s. per cent. paid to Messrs. W. & D. Brown for collecting rents should be disallowed.

The trustees appealed.

Renshaw, Q.C., and Bramwell Davis, for the appellants.—The commission paid for collecting the rents has been allowed for years. It was necessary and proper to employ such collectors in the case of rents received monthly from property of a small class. It is a necessary expense which, following the general practice, should be allowed.

J. Mulligan, for Mrs. Midwinter, argued that the trustees could not charge both commissions, and cited Swaby v. Dickon, 5 Sim. 629.

Renshaw, Q.C., replied.

LINDLEY, L.J. (after referring to the facts, and to the administration action especially).—The substantial question is, whether the trustees should be allowed the payments made by them as commission to the rent collectors whom they employed. What were the trustees directed to do? The order of the 1st of February, 1876, contained nothing authorizing them to pay that commission as well as the commission to themselves, it simply ordered that the trustees should be at liberty to deduct out of the income an allowance of £3 per cent. for their management of the testator's real and leasehold estate. Nothing was aid as to two commissions, but the trustees appear o have paid the salary to the collectors and to have assed their accounts. In 1882 the second order was ade; there is nothing in that order to show that the ourt ever contemplated two commissions. There are ot sufficient grounds for allowing these payments, nd the appeal must be dismissed, with costs.

KAY, L.J. (after stating the facts).—In 1882 an order as made that the trustees should receive the rents nd receive a commission of £3 per cent. as stated in he order of 1876. It is almost impossible that the ourt should allow such a commission as the one now n question. The beneficiary now, being separately epresented, objects to the two commissions, and the bjection must be allowed.

In re APOLLINARIS CO.'S TRADE-MARKS. (a.)

Practice—Appeal—Security for costs—Appeal by foreign company having a branch business in England—Assets in England of a fluctuating character.

A company resident in France but having a branch business in England, carried on in leasehold premises, upon which they had stock-in-trade to the value of £12,000, besides plant, horses, and vans worth about £1,200, and having also a large amount of English book debts, appealed from an order. The respondents applied for security for the costs of the appeal, upon the ground of the appellants being resident out of the jurisdiction, and of the moveable and fluctuating nature of the English assets.

Held, that there could be no reasonable doubt that the available assets in this country of the appellant company would be found amply sufficient to satisfy any possible costs of the appeal, and, therefore, an order for security for the costs ought not to be made.

Original motion.

In the year 1886 Messrs. Ingram & Royle, who carried on the business of mineral water merchants in England, had given notice of motion under the Patents, &c., Act, 1883, and the Trade-Marks Registration Act, 1875, to remove two trade-marks of the Apollinaris Co. from the register. The business of Messrs. Ingram & Royle had, in the meantime, been purchased by the Vichy Co., which was a duly constituted French company, and when the motion came on for hearing, that company applied by counsel for leave to amend by substituting the name of the Vichy Co. for those of Ingram & Royle. The Apollinaris Co., finding their opponents were a foreign company, applied on that ground for security for the costs of the motion to remove their trade-marks from the register, and obtained an order for security to the amount of £400.

Kekewich, J., having refused with costs the motion to remove the trade-marks from the register, the Vichy Co. appealed from that refusal.

The Apollinaris Co. then applied for security for the costs of that appeal.

The evidence showed that the Vichy Co. had paid £12,000 for their English business purchased from Messrs. Ingram & Royle as mentioned above, that that business was carried on upon leasehold premises in London, the leasehold interest in which was said to be valuable, that the stock-in-trade on those premises was worth more than £12,000 at cost price, and that the company possessed plant, horses, and vans in England to the value of about £1,200, besides book debts owing in the United Kingdom worth more than £8,000, and bills and cash in hand and at their bankers to a considerable amount.

Neville, Q.C., and John Cutler, for the Apollinaris Co.—The Vichy Co. is a French company, resident and having its office in France. That creates a primâ facie liability on their part to give security for costs. they say they have assets in England, but those assets are of a fluctuating nature and can be readily removed if their appeal is dismissed with costs: Ebrard v. Gassier, 33 W. R. 287, 28 Ch. D. 232, 235. In that case security for costs was refused on different grounds following Redondo v. Chaytor, 27 W. R. 701, 4 Q. B. D. 453, but we rely upon that part of the judgment which deals with the fluctuating nature of the assets. [FRY, L.J.—Does Ebrard v. Gassier apply to the costs of an appeal?] Ord. 58, r. 15, is the rule dealing with such costs. Grant v. Banque Franco-Egyptienne, 26 W. R. 68, 2 C. P. D. 430, decided on that rule, says nothing as to assets, but decides that the fact of a company being a foreign company is a "special circumstance" (within the meaning of the rule) affording a reason for ordering security. Having regard to the removable nature of the assets here, security should be ordered: Sacker v. Bessler, 4 Times L. R. 17.

They also referred to In re Kathleen Mavourneen, W. N., 1878, p. 215, and to ord. 65, r. 6a.

Warmington, Q.C., and Sebastian, for the Vichy Co., were not called upon.

Lord HALSBURY, L.C.—I am of opinion that there is no ground for this motion. The application seems to me to have been made under a misapprehension as to what the rule originally was, whatever its application to the Court of Appeal may be. There is no such hard and fast rule as suggested, that because a litigant is resident abroad he must necessarily give security for costs. The fact of his being so resident creates a primâ facie case for requiring him to give security, but to that there is the well known and ordinary exception that if he has goods and chattels in this country available for execution and sufficient to answer every possible claim of the other litigant, it is not customary for the courts to order him to give security for costs. Whether the rule in the Court of Appeal is the same as in courts of first instance I do not consider, because, upon the facts of the present case, I am satisfied that there is no ground for requiring the Vichy Co. to give security. It is said, and with perfect truth, that £12,000 worth of mineral waters and £1,200 worth of horses and carts may be got rid of. Anything may be got rid of. Even land may be sold before the day of execution. But we must bring our common sense to bear upon a matter of this sort; and when we consider the nature of the business carried on by the Vichy Co. and the amount of the stock-in-trade in their possession in this country it is impossible to doubt that their available assets within the jurisdiction will be found capable of answering any possible costs of the appeal, and, therefore, an order for security for costs ought not to be made.

DREW AND ANOTHER v. LEWIS. (a.)

Practice—Charging order—Application to rescind order absolute—Jurisdiction—1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, ss. 14, 15.

The court has no jurisdiction to grant an application to rescind or vary a charging order on stock under 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, ss. 14, 15, after the order has been made absolute.

Jeffryes v. Reynolds, 52 L. J. Q. B. 55, 31 W. R. Dig. 147, followed.

Appeal from the decision of the Queen's Bench Division affirming an order of the judge in chambers refusing to rescind a charging order absolute.

The plaintiffs, having recovered judgment against the defendant, obtained an order nisi under 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, ss. 14, 15, charging the defendant's interest in certain shares standing in his name in a joint-stock company with the payment of the amount due on the judgment. After the charging order had been made absolute, one Martin took out a summons at chambers to rescind it, on the ground that the shares had been assigned to him by the defendant prior to the charging order nisi. Martin had never been registered as owner of the shares, and after the charging order had been granted, the company refused to register him. The Divisional Court (Wills and Wright, JJ.), affirming the order of the judge at chambers held, upon the authority of Jeffryes v. Reynolds, 52 L. J. Q. B. 55, 31 W. R. Dig. 147, that the court had no power to rescind a charging order absolute.

Martin appealed.

David, for the appellant.—The charging order ought to be rescinded. The shares were not standing in the defendant's name "in his own right" within 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, s. 14. They had been assigned by deed to the appellant before the judgment had been recovered. The last clause of section 15 of 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110 gives the court power to "discharge or vary" the order. That clause is not confined to the order nisi. The decision in Jeffryes v. Reynolds was wrong, and ought not to be followed. The appellant had no notice of the charging order nisi, and so had no opportunity of showing cause against it being made absolute. If this application fails he will be unable to get himself registered and to deal with the shares, and there will be no remedy open to him.

He also referred to Brereton v. Edwards, 37 W. R. 47, 21 Q. B. D. 488.

C. M. Plumptre, for the plaintiffs, was not called upon.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—In my opinion the decision in Jeffryes v. Reynolds was perfectly right. The charging order has been made under 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, ss. 14, 15, and every step prescribed by those sections has been duly followed in this case. The charging order has been made absolute, and it must be assumed rightly made absolute, as there has been no appeal against that order. This is not an appeal against making the order absolute, but it is an independent application to rescind the order absolute. The question, then, is whether the court has any power upon such an application to rescind or vary such an order. The order is made under the provisions of a statute, and the power to rescind or vary it must be conferred by statute. It was said that the last clause in section 15 gives such a power. That clause enacts as follows: "Provided that any such judge shall, upon the application of the judgment debtor, or any person interested, have full power to discharge or vary such order." Before the order was made absolute such a person as the present applicant, though he would not be served with the order nisi, might have appeared to show cause against the order being made absolute. It seems clear to me that the words "such order" in the above proviso refer to the order nisi, and not to the order absolute. That proviso does not apply, and there is therefore no enactment giving the court power to discharge or vary the order absolute. Nor has the court any inherent jurisdiction either at common law or in equity to do it. The court, therefore, has no jurisdiction to do what is asked in the present case. It was urged that if this application failed the applicant would have no remedy. It is immaterial to consider whether or not he has any remedy, or to indicate what that remedy is. I must decline to have anything to do with such a consideration.

FRY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. I concur in saying that Jeffryes v. Reynolds was rightly decided. The last two clauses of section 15 provide for three things. They provide for making the charging order nisi absolute; for discharging it; or for varying it. There is no provision for discharging or varying the order absolute. It was then said that, if that were so, the applicant would have no remedy. I am far from convinced, if the applicant has an absolute equitable interest in these shares, that that is the case, merely because the interest of a third person, the judgment debtor, has been charged. It is not necessary now to consider what that remedy is.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—We are very anxious, now that these applications for new trials come to us instead of going to the Divisional Court, not to disturb or depart from the practice which has prevailed. We have, therefore, consulted the judges of the Queen's Bench Division, and we find that the practice which existed there was very like the practice of this court upon similar applications where there has been a trial by a judge without a jury. Where the judge before whom the action was tried, whether with or without a jury, has refused himself to stay execution, the court will not grant a stay unless there are some special circumstances in the case. It is impossible to lay down any hard and fast definition of those special circumstances, but a mere allegation of misdirection, or that the verdict was against the weight of the evidence, or that there was no evidence to go to the jury, is not such a special circumstance. They are the ordinary circumstances of every application for a new trial. In the present case, as no special circumstances have been shown, the application must be refused.

PITTARD v. OLIVER. (a.)

Slander — Privileged occasion — Meeting of board of guardians—Presence of reporters—Words spoken in bonâ fide belief of their truth.

The defendant, a member of a board of guardians, made a speech which would have been privileged if the meeting of the board at which it was made had been a private one.

Held, that the presence of reporters at the meeting, who were not in any way brought there by the defendant, did not destroy the privilege.

Appeal from the decision of Mathew, J.

The plaintiff was clerk to a poor law board of guardians, and in that capacity had claimed to retain certain moneys which had been collected in connection with his office, contending that the board owed him an amount exceeding the amount of these moneys. The plaintiff was called upon by the board to give an explanation within a fortnight. He in the meantime resigned his position, on the ground of ill-health. The defendant shortly afterwards became a member of the board, and at a subsequent meeting of the board, at which reporters were present, moved an amendment to a proposal to pay the plaintiff £50 in settlement of his claim. In the course of his speech he was reported to have said, "The fierce light which had lately been thrown upon public boards prevented them from condoning in any way the defalcations of an unfaithful servant. Surely they could defend themselves and the public against a man, who for years had been robbing public money, by not giving him one farthing more than he could claim." The dispute between the plaintiff and the board, having afterwards been brought before the court, was decided entirely in the plaintiff's favour, and he thereupon brought this action against the defendant for slander.

The defendant pleaded that the words were uttered on a privileged occasion, and the case was tried before Mathew, J., and a jury. The jury found that "the words were spoken honestly in the discharge of a public duty without malice, but carelessly." Mathew, J., entered judgment for the defendant, and the plaintiff appealed.

Candy, Q.C., and Henry Kisch, for the plaintiff.—The sole question is whether or not the occasion on which these words were spoken was privileged. It is admitted that, if they had been spoken at a private meeting of the board, that would have been a privileged occasion. The guardians had power to exclude the public from their meetings: Purcell v. Sowler, 25 W. R. 362, 2 C. P. D. 215. A person claiming privilege makes any defamatory statement at his peril: Williamson v. Frere, 22 W. R. 878, L. R. 9 C. P. 393. The presence of reporters destroyed the defendant's privilege.

They also cited Popham v. Pickburn, 10 W. R. 324, and Lawless v. Anglo-Egyptian Cotton Co., 17 W. R. 498, L. R. 4 Q. B. 262.

Lockwood, Q.C., and Johnston Watson, for the defendant, were not called upon.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—In this case the plaintiff accuses the defendant of having slandered him. The defence is that what was said was spoken without malice and on a privileged occasion. The jury found that the words were spoken without malice and with a bonâ fide belief in their truth, but carelessly. The question, therefore, is whether or not the occasion on which they were spoken was privileged. The defendant was a member of a board of guardians. A discussion was raised at a meeting of the board as to the conduct of the plaintiff, who had been a servant of the board. The question before the board was whether the salary then due to the plaintiff should be paid to him in full, or whether part of it ought to be kept back on the ground of (as was alleged) defalcations of the public money on his part.

Undoubtedly it is the duty of a board of guardians to see that the money of the ratepayers is properly expended. It was the defendant's duty as a member of the board to express his opinion on the matter, and being bonâ fide of opinion that the money ought not to be given to the plaintiff, he moved an amendment to this effect. It was his duty to give his reasons for his opposition, and he gave them. They amounted to a statement that the plaintiff had embezzled the money of the board. That is really what his reasons come to. He made that statement, as the jury have found, without malice and with a bonâ fide belief in its truth, but it was not true. Therefore, if the occasion were not privileged, he would be liable for having made it. If he had made that untrue statement at a meeting at which only the other members of the board were present, it is admitted that the occasion would have been privileged, because he was discharging his duty in discussing the matter, and in expressing his opinion upon it. But the question is whether the presence of other persons who were not members of the board affects the privilege. I do not know whether those other persons were ratepayers or not. If they were ratepayers they were persons interested in the discussion. I know of no authority for saying that it would be any the less the defendant's duty to say what he thought because persons who were obviously interested in the discussion as ratepayers were present. If a person has a duty cast upon him to make certain statements to certain people, and he calls in others to be present who have no interest in the matter for the obvious purpose of letting them hear what he has to say, then I should hold, not that it became any the less his duty to say what he believed to be true, but that the invitation to the other persons to be present was evidence of such malice as would destroy the privilege. In the present case, assuming that some of the persons who were present were reporters and not ratepayers, there is no evidence that the defendant invited them to be present. He could not order them to leave. That could only be done by a majority of the votes of the board. They were allowed to be present by the board, over whose acts he had no control. Was it his duty to refrain from saying what he thought on the matter because persons other than his brother guardians were present, over whose presence he had no control? Surely such a question answers itself. The occasion was privileged for the performance of his duty to his fellow guardians, and the privilege is in no wise affected by the presence of those persons.

We were pressed with a ruling of mine in the case of Williamson v. Frere. That was not a case of saying anything in the presence of persons other than those interested; it was a publication to persons who were not interested. It is well settled law that to write to a man and tell him that he is a thief or what not is no publication of the libel, and that no question of privilege arises in such a case. But if a person writes defamatory matter on a postcard, which every postman can read, that is a publication, not to the person to whom it is written, but to the postmen. So, too, with regard to cases where something has been said at a place and time where the saying of it is privileged, but a report of it has been inserted in a newspaper. A question then arises as to the privilege of the newspaper proprietor. For instance, as to proceedings in courts of justice, and speeches in the House of Commons. Newspapers may report them, because everyone in the country has an interest in knowing what takes place there. But when a newspaper publishes matter which is not for the benefit or interest of the public at all, then, although the occasion on which the words were spoken may be privileged, the publication by the newspaper of what was said is not privileged, because it is published for its own advantage and not for the interests of the public. That is, in my opinion, the meaning of the case of Purcell v. Sowler. It is clear, I think, in this case that this was a privileged occasion, and that the action cannot be maintained against the defendant in the absence of malice on his part. The appeal must, therefore, be dismissed.

Sir JAMES HANNEN.—I am of the same opinion. The finding of the jury has eliminated all questions of malice from the case, and the only question left is that of privilege. No doubt in the case of Purcell v. Sowler all the judges say that it is discretionary whether boards of guardians shall admit the public or not to their discussions, but they do not say that the admission of the public destroys the privilege. The defendant, as a member of the board, had, in my opinion, a duty to state the grounds of his opposition to the proposal. The jury have found that he did honestly believe the statements which he made. The admission of the public was not in any way his doing, it was done by consent of the whole board.

That is the ground on which I base my decision. He had to do his duty under the conditions in which he found the board. It matters not whether the persons present were reporters or not. His duty to speak what he believed to be right was unaffected by a condition of things which had been brought about by the action of the board of guardians. The cases which have been cited are totally different. They have to do with the subsequent publication of privileged matter. Lord Bramwell puts that very clearly when he says in Purcell v. Sowler, "There was no duty to report such ex parte proceedings. If the guardians did not exclude strangers, as they might well have done, the reporter ought to have taken care what he was about, and not to have reported libellous matter, and the defendants, having published it, must take the consequences." That implies that in Lord Bramwell's opinion the original publication at the meeting of the board was privileged.

FRY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The defendant, as a member of the board of guardians, owed a duty both to his brother guardians and to the ratepayers to bring forward the amendment which he believed to be the right thing to do under the circumstances, and to support that amendment by such arguments and statements of fact as he considered right and reasonable. The jury have found that he did not go beyond that. The guardians had apparently established a practice of admitting the public at their deliberations. I do not think that the presence of the public in any way affected the defendant's duty and consequent privilege. I will only add that I think it very desirable, where discussions as to the character of individuals take place at meetings of boards of guardians, that the guardians should bear in mind what was said by Cockburn, C.J., in Purcell v. Sowler, and should conduct such discussions in camerâ.

MOORE v. KNIGHT. (a.)

Partnership—Liability for fraud of co-partner—Solicitor and client—Misrepresentation—Statute of Limitations (21 Jac. 1, c. 16)—Trustee Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 59), s. 8.

S. M. deposited, between the years 1867 and 1876, with her solicitors, Messrs. M., G., & B., sums amounting to £351 for investment. G. died in 1877, B. died in 1887, and M., who was adjudicated bankrupt in 1888, died in 1890. Interest at five per cent. was paid to S. M. by the firm down to G.'s death, and by the surviving partners from then to 1886. S. M. claimed to recover from the joint assets of the partnership, which was being wound up in another action, or (if these were not sufficient) from the legal personal representatives of G. and B. and the trustee in bankruptcy of M., the sums so placed with the firm for investment, which (except as to an amount of £50) were in fact never invested, but misappropriated and applied to the purposes of the firm.

In 1876, before G.'s death, an account was rendered by the firm containing misrepresentations as to all the sums (except the £50), and by a continuance of such misrepresentations the plaintiff was prevented from discovering the truth till 1886, when the period fixed by the Statute of Limitations had expired.

The personal representative of G., who alone really defended the action, relied on a plea of this statute and the Trustee Act, 1888.

Held, that the principles laid down in Blair v. Bromley, 5 Hare, 542, 2 Phil. 354, which did not proceed on any rule or principle of equity specially applicable to trustees, applied and remained unaffected by the Trustee Act, 1888, and the plaintiff was entitled to the relief claimed by her.

The plaintiff, Sarah Moore, at various dates between the 28th of June, 1867, and the 9th of

(a.) Reported by H. M. CHARTERS MACPHERSON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

December, 1874, deposited with Messrs. Miles, Gregory, & Bouskell, a firm of solicitors carrying on business at Leicester, various sums, amounting in the whole to £351, for the purpose of investment. During the period just mentioned, and for some time afterwards, the firm consisted of Thomas Miles, William Gregory, and James Bouskell.

William Gregory died on the 30th of April, 1877, and the defendant Gregory Knight was his legal personal representative.

In 1878 an action, In re Gregory, Miles v. Knight, was commenced by Miles against Gregory Knight and Bouskell for the purpose of winding up the partnership affairs. In this action, which was still pending, a receiver had been appointed, and in his hands or in court were considerable assets of the partnership.

James Bouskell died on the 4th of January, 1887, and the defendant, Rose Mary Bouskell, was his legal personal representative.

In April, 1888, Thomas Miles was adjudicated a bankrupt, and the defendant Palmer was trustee in his bankruptcy. Miles himself died in the beginning of 1890.

Down to the death of W. Gregory interest at five per cent. was regularly paid by the firm to the plaintiff, and, after his death, down to 1886 interest at the same rate was paid to her by the surviving partners. The firm invested £50, part of the funds so deposited with them, on an investment called Frost's security, and no question arose as to this in the present action.

The books of the firm were most imperfectly kept, and, with the exception of the Frost investment, already mentioned, the only trace of any investment which appeared in them was of a sum of £152 (made up apparently of a sum of £150 deposited on the 28th of June, 1867, and £2 to be taken as interest which had accrued thereon), which would seem to have been lent on the security of property belonging to one Miss Ellen Price. In the ledger under date the 18th of December, 1876, there were the following entries:—

To cash, from Mr. John Bunny, balance of purchase-money	1,000	0	0

By cash paid Miss Sarah Moore, principal on mortgage . .	152	0	0
By cash paid Miss Moore, interest on mortgage	3	14	5
By cash, on account . . .	20	0	0
By balance	824	5	7

And there was appended a receipt signed by Ellen Price for the balance of £824 5s. 7d.

The sum of £152 was not paid to the plaintiff, nor was she informed of the security (if it existed) having been paid off; and no trace of any reinvestment of the £152 was to be found in the books.

From time to time the plaintiff received accounts of the interest due to her, the first being that for interest during the year 1876, but no investment except that of Frost was specifically mentioned.

The account for 1876 contained the following entries:—

June 25, half-year's interest on £152, due this day	3	15	4
December 31, interest on £152 from the 25th of June to this day .	3	18	8

It was proved that this account was made out, or copied by a clerk of the firm on behalf of the firm.

The subsequent accounts were similar in form, and contained similar entries.

The present action was brought by Sarah Moore against Gregory Knight, Rose Mary Bouskell, and Palmer, alleging by her statement of claim that Miles, Gregory, & Bouskell invested £50, part of the funds so deposited with them by the plaintiff, on a security called Frost's security, but that they converted the rest of the money to their own use; and she claimed the following relief:—(1) A declaration that she was entitled to be paid out of the assets of the late firm of Miles, Gregory, & Bouskell the sums neglected to be invested, with interest at five per cent. per annum, and that the plaintiff be at liberty to carry in a claim for this amount in the action of In re Gregory, Miles v. Knight; (2) A declaration that if the joint estate was not sufficient the plaintiff was entitled to recover the balance out of the separate estates of the partners.

Rose Mary Bouskell did not appear, and as against her the action came on upon motion for judgment. Palmer appeared, and at the trial in substance supported the case of the plaintiff. Gregory Knight alone really defended the action, and at the trial, having abandoned various defences raised by the pleadings, he relied on a plea of the Statute of Limitations (21 Jac. 1) and 51 & 52 Vict. c. 59 (the Trustee Act, 1888), s. 8.

Ribton and Bartley Denniss, for the plaintiff.—We rely on the decision in Blair v. Bromley, 5 Hare, 542, 2 Phil. 354, which shows that a partner is bound by the misrepresentations of his co-partner in matters within their business, and that the effect of the misrepresentations, as far as regards the Statute of Limitations, is the same as if they had been made on the day after the fraud had been discovered.

They also cited Gibbs v. Guild, 30 W. R. 407, 591, 8 Q. B. D. 296, 9 Ibid. 59; Metropolitan Bank v. Heiron, 29 W. R. 370, 5 Ex. D. 319; and Dooby v. Watson, 36 W. R. 764, 39 Ch. D. 178.

Graham Hastings, Q.C., and Woodroffe, for the defendant Gregory Knight.—The Trustee Act, 1888, has rendered the decision in Blair v. Bromley inapplicable, and the plaintiff cannot bring his case within any of the exceptions of section 8 of that Act.

They cited Watson v. Woodman, 24 W. R. 47, L. R. 20 Eq. 721, and Manby v. Manby, 24 W. R. 699, 3 Ch. D. 101.

B. Fossett Lock, for the trustee in bankruptcy of Miles.

Ribton, in reply.—Blair v. Bromley proceeds upon the principle of partnership, and not of any rule specially applicable to trustees. The Trustee Act, 1888, has therefore no application, and the propositions in that case remain unaffected.

Cur. adv. vult.

Dec. 18.—STIRLING, J.—[After stating the facts, and observing that the form of the accounts was such as would naturally lead the person receiving them to believe that the various principal sums mentioned in them had been duly invested, and therefore amounted to representations that investments had been duly made of the various sums deposited by the petitioner, taking as example the account for 1876:—] In support of the plaintiff's case Blair v. Bromley was mainly relied on. For the defendant Knight it was hardly disputed that but for the recent change introduced into the law by the Trustee Act, 1888, Blair v. Bromley would have applied; but it was said that that statute had rendered that decision no longer applicable, and that the present case did not fall within any of the exceptions mentioned—viz., "where the claim is founded upon any fraud or fraudulent breach of trust to which the trustee is party or privy, or is to recover trust property or the proceeds thereof, still retained by the trustee, or previously received by the trustee, and converted to his use."

To this it was answered, first, that the case fell within the specified exceptions, and, secondly, that, even if the statute applied, a trustee was under it entitled to the benefit of the Statute of Limitations in the like manner and to the same extent as a person not a trustee; that Blair v. Bromley did not proceed on any principle or rule of equity specially applicable to trustees; and that the principle of the decision remained unaffected by the statute.

I have not been able to satisfy myself that the present case, regard being had to section 2, sub-section 4, does not in truth fall within the last exception. The money was received by the firm, and upon the evidence it was, in my opinion, converted to the use of the firm on or shortly after December 31, 1876. I think, however, it is unnecessary to express a final opinion on this, as in my judgment the second argument urged on behalf of the plaintiff ought to prevail.

The material facts in Blair v. Bromley were that William Bromley and Joseph Wm. Bromley carried on business in partnership as solicitors. In 1829 William Bromley received from the plaintiffs a cheque for £4,500 for investment on a specific mortgage then in contemplation; and the amount was received and placed to the account of the Messrs. Bromleys with their bankers. The mortgage transaction was subsequently broken off, and the money was never invested; but William Bromley concealed the fact from the plaintiffs and rendered accounts from time to time in which he treated the £4,500 as invested on the specific mortgage. In 1834 the partnership was dissolved. Interest was paid down to 1844, when William Bromley became bankrupt, and the plaintiffs therefore filed a bill against Joseph Wm. Bromley, the innocent partner, to recover the amount, and the defendant pleaded the Statute of Limitations, but the plea failed. [His lordship then referred to the judgment of Cottenham, L.C., in 2 Ph., at pp. 359 and 360, and continued:—] It appears, therefore, that the money came into the hands of the firm without fraud, and that one of the firm afterwards committed a fraud in respect of it, but made misrepresentations (some of which were attributable to the firm) which prevented the fraud from being discovered until the period fixed by the Statute of Limitations had expired. It was held that the innocent partner was deprived of the benefit of the statute by these representations, which bound him as a partner. The decision is rested on principles of the law of partnership, not on those of trust; and I think it is unaffected by the provisions of the Trustee Act, 1888.

Here the money of the plaintiff came without fraud into the hands of the firm for investment; no investment was made, but the money was (by some act of which I am willing to believe that William Gregory was innocent) misappropriated, and applied to the purposes of the firm. In 1876, before the death of Gregory an account was rendered by the firm, which contains misrepresentations as regards all the sums except that invested on Frost's security, and by a continuance of such misrepresentations the plaintiff was prevented from discovering the truth until 1886. The principles laid down in Blair v. Bromley appear to me to apply.

It was said that a distinction ought to be made as regards the sum of £152, inasmuch as that was paid off only a few months before the death of William Gregory, and the firm would be entitled to time, to find another investment. There is nothing, however, to show that this sum did not, on the 18th of December, 1876, find its way into the general assets of the firm, or that it was, when received, set apart or earmarked in any way. The account of 1876 contains misrepresentations as regards this sum as well as all the other sums deposited, except that which became the subject of Frost's security; and with that exception it seems to me that no distinction can be drawn between any of the deposits.

If reliance is placed on section 8, sub-section 1 (b), of the Act of 1888, then it is to be observed that the case of Gibbs v. Guild shows that, by a proper form of pleading, the benefit of the decision in Blair v. Bromley (which is recognized by the Court of Appeal in Gibbs v. Guild) may be obtained by the plaintiffs. As regards Frost's security, it appears to have consisted of a conditional surrender by one Samuel Frost to the plaintiff of certain copyhold property held of a manor of which Thomas Miles was the steward. This conditional surrender was not entered on the court rolls, and contained, when handed to the plaintiff, a memorandum indorsed thereon in the following terms: "Paid off 2nd April, 1885." The plaintiff never received the money, nor knew that it had been paid off; and she compromised her claim against the owner of the property which formed the subject of the surrender for £25. There is no evidence to show that Wm. Gregory is in any way responsible in respect of this investment, and I do not see how any claim in respect of it can be made against the joint assets of the partnership or the separate assets of Wm. Gregory. It appears, however, from the interest accounts that the total sum on which interest was paid was not £351 (in respect of which the action is brought) but £408. I have not been able to discover the explanation of the discrepancy; subject to this, it seems to me that the plaintiff is entitled to relief against the assets and the estate of Wm. Gregory in respect of £301. As to the nature of the relief, first the plaintiff is entitled to be paid the amount of her claim out of the partnership assets of the firm of Miles, Gregory, & Bouskell. Those assets are under the control of the court in the action of In re Gregory, Miles v. Knight, and the simplest mode of making them available for the plaintiff's benefit appears to be to give her leave to make such application as she may be advised in that action. The plaintiff is also entitled to a declaration that if the joint estate is not sufficient to satisfy her claim, she is entitled to recover the balance out of the separate estates of Wm. Gregory, Jas. Bouskell, and Thos. Miles.

As regards the estate of Wm. Gregory, it appears that on the 8th of December, 1877, judgment was given for the administration of it in an action, In re Gregory, Astley v. Knight, the plaintiff being one of the next of kin of Wm. Gregory. The plaintiff did not prove her debt in that action. By the certificate, dated the 26th of May, 1888, the debts were found, and it is further stated as follows:—"In addition to the said debts there may be a liability on the part of the intestate to pay a sum in respect of the partnership in which he was engaged at the time of his death, which is now the subject of an action in this court entitled In re Gregory, Miles v. Knight." By the order on further consideration, dated the 24th of July, 1886, it was ordered, with the consent of the next of kin, and also of Thos. Miles and Jas. Bouskell, that the residue of the intestate's estate, after payment of the debts, should be paid out to the defendant Knight upon his undertaking duly to administer such estate. The residue was paid out accordingly; how it has been disposed of does not appear, and the defendant Knight does not admit assets. The strict right of the plaintiff would seem to be to enforce the undertaking embodied in the order of the 24th of July, 1886, but I understand that the defendant Knight does not object to an order in this action for appropriate accounts and inquiries.

The defendant Rose Mary Bouskell does not appear. As regards her, the plaintiff would seem entitled to an administration judgment according to the form given in Hills v. McRae, 9 Ha. 297: see also In re Hodgson, 34 W. R. 127, 31 Ch. D. 177.

The proof of the plaintiff against the estate of Thomas Miles has been admitted by the defendant Palmer, and consequently no further relief is required against him.

The plaintiff is entitled to costs against Gregory Knight, who has set up a defence which has failed.

GREENWOOD v. TURNER. (a.)

Vendor and purchaser—Specific performance—Purchaser in possession—Title accepted—Purchaser's option to pay purchase-money into court or give up possession—Interest.

The underlessee of some property contracted to purchase it, paid a deposit, and accepted the title. By the contract the day fixed for completion was the date of the expiration of the lease, and the purchaser was to pay interest on the purchase-money in default of completion. The purchaser remained in possession, but refused to complete or pay the purchase-money; he claimed to be in possession under the sub-lease, not under the contract, and now offered to pay rent. On motion for an order on the purchaser to pay the purchase-money into court, Held, that the purchaser had an option, and must elect to pay the purchase-money into court within a month or to give up possession; and, if he should give up possession, that he must pay interest on the purchase-money at four per cent. from the day fixed for completion.

There is no rule that a purchaser in possession loses this option by accepting the title.

Motion that the defendant, having accepted the title to certain hereditaments, the subject of the action, and being in possession thereof, might be ordered, within four days after service of the order, to lodge in court to the credit of the action the sum of £4,750, being the unpaid balance of the purchase-money of the said premises, together with interest thereon at four per cent. from the 24th of June, 1890, to the date of payment.

The question was whether the defendant ought to be allowed the option of giving up possession.

The action was for specific performance of an agreement of the 22nd of August, 1889, whereby the defendant agreed to purchase the property in question. At that time he was in possession of the property as underlessee of a tenant whose lease would expire on the 24th of June, 1890. It was accordingly provided by the agreement that that should be the date fixed for completion, and that the purchaser should pay interest on the purchase-money in default of completion on that date.

The defendant paid a deposit of £250, and made no objection to the plaintiffs' title, but he retained possession of the property after the 24th of June, 1890, and refused to complete the purchase or pay purchase-money, or interest, or rent. He now filed an affidavit alleging that he was in possession under the sub-lease, not under the contract, and offering to pay rent.

Warmington, Q.C., and Dauney, for the plaintiffs.—We are entitled to an order for payment into court. The defendant has accepted our title, and on that account he will not be allowed to elect whether to give up possession or to pay the purchase-money into court. He only has that option where the title has not been made out: Crutchley v. Jerningham, 2 Mer. 502; Tindal v. Cobham, 2 My. & K. 385; Clarke v. Wilson, 15 Ves. 317; Gibson v. Clarke, 1 Ves. & B. 500; Sugden on Vendors and Purchasers, 14th ed., p. 229.

Theobald, for the defendant, referred to Lewis v. James, 34 W. R. 619, 32 Ch. D. 326.

Warmington, Q.C., replied.

KEKEWICH, J.—I feel strongly tempted to make this order, because I cannot help thinking that the purchaser has retained possession as long as he could, and but for this action would have retained it still. That is to say, he is endeavouring as far as possible to have the benefit of the contract and yet retain the purchase-money. If I could find any authority to that effect I should act upon it with great readiness, but my recollection of the practice of the court and the cases combined, prevents me from making the order. If I did so I should be establishing a new rule. In Lewis v. James Cotton, L.J., states the rule, which is well known, and I only take it from that case because it expresses the rule in plain words and in better language than I could frame. He says: "This is in some respects like a case where a purchaser, being in possession, is required to pay into court, if he remain in possession, the purchase-money agreed upon; but it is well known that in such a case, under ordinary circumstances, an option is given to the purchaser to go out, and the order only is that if he continue in possession he must pay the price into court." He then refers to two cases, one of which is that of a railway company, which illustrates a large class of cases where the purchaser remains in possession and is doing something which is inconsistent with the property remaining intact or with restoring it in its original state, and the court on that ground orders payment into court. The Lord Justice refers to the principle of those cases as being what I have already stated, and he does not refer to any other exception from the ordinary rule. I turn to the other cases, and in all of them I find that the purchaser has had the option of retiring from possession.

Now it is said that in all these cases there was an objection to the title. There was an objection in Clarke v. Wilson, and in Tindal v. Cobham, and in Gibson v. Clarke. There there were very special circumstances, for the purchaser had been let into possession in the confidence that a good title would be made out, and the confidence was not made good, and Lord Eldon said that he must pay the money or restore the land; the order, made by agreement, was that the purchaser should restore possession, accounting for the rents, without prejudice to any question between the parties.

I find no rule, nor anything approaching to a rule, that where a purchaser has taken and remains in possession, although the possession was under the contract, he is bound to pay the money into court unless under such circumstances as I have mentioned; and if I were to hold that he had no option I think I should be extending the rule. I therefore refuse to make an order for payment into court. The purchaser must have the option of retiring from possession.

(a.) Reported by H. C. ROPER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Warmington, Q.C., asked for interest on the purchase-money according to the terms of the contract.

Theobald argued that that would be inconsistent with the option allowed to him, and that at all events such an order ought not to be made on the motion.

KEKEWICH, J.—Such an order was made in Tindal v. Cobham and in Gibson v. Clarke. You are claiming to have the benefit of six months' possession for nothing. The order will be that the defendant elect either to pay the purchase-money into court by the 6th of March—i.e., within one month—or to give up possession on that day; if he gives up possession, then he must pay to the plaintiff interest at 4 per cent. on the purchase-money from the 24th of June, 1890, to the 6th of March.

JOYCE v. BEALL. (a.)

Practice—Discovery of documents—Two defendants—Separate defences—Security for costs of discovery—R. S. C., 1883, ord. 31, r. 26.

In an action against two defendants, who appeared by the same solicitor, but severed their defences, the plaintiff applied for discovery of documents.

Held, that, the defendants being sued jointly in substance as well as in form, the plaintiff was not bound under ord. 31, r. 26, to pay into court more than one sum of £5.

Appeal from chambers.

In this case the plaintiff sued two defendants who appeared by the same solicitor but severed their defences. The plaintiff paid £5 into court to the "security for costs account" and applied in chambers for an order against both defendants to file an affidavit of documents. The master refused to make the order, holding that two sums of £5 each must be paid in, there being two defendants with separate defences. The plaintiff appealed to A. L. Smith, J., in chambers, and he referred the question to the court.

Witt, for the plaintiff.—By ord. 31, r. 26, the right to demand payment into court is confined to £5 only. There is a discretion in the court or a judge to order an additional sum to be paid in: Campbell v. Lord Poulett, 28 SOLICITORS' JOURNAL, 301, W. N., 1884, p. 48; Eder v. Attenborough, 37 W. R. 507, 23 Q. B. D. 130; The Liverpool and Manchester Aerated Bread and Café Co. v. Firth, ante, p. 269 [1891], 1 Ch. 367, is distinguishable.

Cautley (Herbert Reed with him), for the defendant.—Separate affidavits will have to be made by the defendants, and there ought to be separate sums as security for their costs.

He referred to Smith v. Reed, 28 SOLICITORS' JOURNAL, 84, W. N., 1883, p. 1 6.

Feb. 4.—VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J.—In this case the plaintiff took out a summons asking that the defendants might be ordered to make and file an affidavit of documents. The summons came on before Master Butler, who refused to make any order, on the ground that the plaintiff had paid into court one sum only of £5; whereas, in his opinion the plaintiff should have paid into court two sums of £5, the defendants having severed their defences. The plaintiff appealed against this refusal to the judge in chambers. A. L. Smith, J., referred the matter to the Divisional Court, considering the point of practice one that should be definitely settled. In my opinion the learned master was wrong. Rule 26 of order 31 provides that "any party seeking discovery otherwise than by interrogatories shall, before making application for discovery, pay into court the sum of £5." It seems to me that the plaintiff in this case is a party so seeking discovery, and I do not see on what ground it can be said that he must pay into court a further sum of £5. It is quite true that rule 26 goes on to say that the party seeking discovery otherwise than by interrogatories "may be ordered further to pay into court such additional sum as the court or a judge shall direct," but this means such further sum as the judge shall in his discretion direct; but the master did not act on this portion of the rule, he did not purport to exercise a discretion in the matter. He simply held, as a matter of practice, that where a plaintiff sues more than one defendant he must, if he requires more than one affidavit of documents, pay an extra £5 in respect of each affidavit which he requires. I see nothing in the order to justify this. There may be an action which really is not one action, but two or more actions amalgamated under the same writ, as, for instance, where a plaintiff sues defendants alternatively, or where a plaintiff sues different defendants for different causes of action—e.g., distinct frauds alleged to be committed by them respectively. In such a case it seems to me that the plaintiff would really be a party to two distinct actions, and the defendants would in such cases be distinct parties; but the mere fact that there are more plaintiffs than one or more defendants than one does not prevent the plaintiffs collectively from being "a party" or the defendants collectively from being "a party," nor do I think that the fact that the defendants sever their defence prevents the defendants collectively being "a party" where they are sued jointly in substance as well as in form. In order to ascertain whether two actions are being brought you must consider whether the alleged causes of action are distinct. This seems to me the only case in which the collective plaintiffs or the collective defendants do not fall within the term "a party," and, therefore, the only case in which the plaintiffs or the defendants can be called upon to make a second deposit of £5, although it may very well be that the number of the plaintiffs or the defendants may be a good ground for the judge, in his discretion, ordering a payment into court beyond the £5. Indeed, if this is not a ground on which the further payment may be ordered, it is difficult to see in what case a further sum can be ordered to be paid into court, because it cannot be that the further sum depends on the length of the affidavit, which is unknown when the order is made. Inasmuch as I understand that in the present case the order was opposed both before us and before the master on the ground solely that a second sum of £5 ought to be paid, I think that this appeal ought to be allowed, with costs, and the order prayed for in the summons made.

CAVE, J.—I am of the same opinion. I only wish to add that since we heard the argument in this case I have spoken to Stirling, J., who authorizes me to say that he did not intend in the Liverpool and Manchester Aerated Bread and Café Co. v. Firth to decide anything inconsistent with the decision in Eder v. Attenborough.

REG. v. COMMISSIONERS OF INLAND REVENUE.
Ex parte OHLSON.
REG. v. COMMISSIONERS OF INLAND REVENUE.
Ex parte GARLAND.

Pawnbrokers Act, 1872 (35 & 36 Vict. c. 93), s. 39—Certificate—Licence—Person being a licensed pawnbroker at commencement of Act, his assigns or successors—Inland revenue.

The successor by purchase or assignment of a person who, at the commencement of the Pawnbrokers Act, 1872, was a licensed pawnbroker is entitled to a licence without the production of a certificate of justices within the meaning of the saving clause of section 39 of that Act.

Cause shown against rule for a mandamus calling upon the Commissioners of Inland Revenue to grant licences to certain pawnbrokers.

By the Pawnbrokers Act, 1872 (35 & 36 Vict. c. 93), s. 37: "Every pawnbroker shall yearly take out from the Commissioners of Inland Revenue an excise licence for carrying on his business, for which licence there shall be charged and paid an excise duty of £7 10s." "A separate licence shall be taken out by such pawnbroker for each pawnbroker's shop kept."

By section 39, "After the passing of this Act a pawnbroker's licence shall not be granted to any person except on the production and in pursuance of the authority of a certificate granted under this Act, save that it shall not be necessary for any person, being at the commencement of this Act a licensed pawnbroker, or for his executors, administrators, assigns, or successors to obtain such a certificate."

By section 40, "Certificates under this Act shall be granted (as regards England) in the Metropolitan Police District by a magistrate sitting at any police court in the metropolis having jurisdiction in the district where the application is made, and in any place within the jurisdiction of a stipendiary magistrate, by that magistrate, and in other places by the justices of the petty sessional division assembled at petty sessions specially convened for that purpose."

By section 43, "An application for a certificate shall not be refused except on the following grounds, or one of them:—

"(1) That the applicant has failed to produce satisfactory evidence of good character.

"(2) That the shop in which he intends to carry on the business of a pawnbroker, or any adjacent house or place owned or occupied by him, is frequented by thieves or persons of bad character.

"(3) That he has not complied with the provisions of the last-preceding section" (section 42) as to giving notices of his intention to apply

The present appellants, Ohlson and Garland, respectively had claimed to have their licences as pawnbrokers renewed without the necessity of obtaining certificates as being "persons who were licensed pawnbrokers at the commencement of the above Act, or their assigns or successors," and therefore within the saving clause of section 39. The commissioners had refused to renew their licences unless a certificate had been in each case first obtained.

Each party now appealed, and their cases were heard together.

Ohlson claimed under the following circumstances:—One Creshull, who was a licensed pawnbroker at the commencement of the Pawnbrokers Act, 1872, carried on business in Holloway. His licence for that business was renewed up to 1882, when he died, and his business was carried on by his widow until transferred to one Lucombe, who married her, and to whom the licence was annually renewed. Since 1872 Lucombe had transferred the business to Hornsey, and in 1887 he assigned the business as carried on at Hornsey to Ohlson. Creshull had also, before 1872, opened another business at Stamford Hill, which had been assigned by his widow to one Pockett. Pockett, in 1886, assigned the Stamford Hill business also to Ohlson, to whom the licence had been annually renewed. Ohlson in both cases had had a licence annually renewed without demand for any certificate, and he now claimed to come within the saving clause of section 39 of the above Act, exempting assignees and successors of any person being a licensed pawnbroker at the time of the passing of the Act.

Garland was himself a licensed pawnbroker in 1872, at the time of the passing of the Act, in partnership with a brother at Kennington, to both of whom the licence had annually been renewed. In 1887 the partnership had been dissolved. Garland now desired to open a new business at Teddington, but a licence was refused unless he produced a certificate. This he claimed to be exempted from, under the same section, as having been a licensed pawnbroker at the time of the Act of 1872. There was no allegation of unfitness against either appellant, either in regard to personal character or in respect of the premises where the business was proposed to be carried on.

Sir E. Clarke, S.G., and Danckwerts, for the respondents, the Commissioners of Inland Revenue, showed cause against the rule.—Before 1872 a pawnbroker's licence had by 27 & 28 Vict. c. 56, s. 6, been converted into an excise duty, and anyone might take out such a licence. By the Pawnbrokers Act, 1872, a licence was made to depend upon the fitness of the character of the applicant and the suitability of the premises. The only exception made was in respect of pawnbrokers then existing. That must mean "to any particular business then existing, and to the successors or assignees of that particular business." Otherwise any successor or assignee can open any number of new premises for this business, and, by transferring these to other persons, would obtain exemptions from obtaining certificates, thus making the Act of no effect. [STEPHEN, J.—You would limit section 39 to some hereditary caste of pawnbrokers?] The licence is given for some particular premises. The meaning of "licensed person" in section 39 is a person licensed for carrying on the specified business at the particular premises licensed. It must be limited to "the then existing business."

Woolf, Q.C. (Finlay, Q.C., with him), for the appellant in each case.—The practice of the Inland Revenue has hitherto been to grant licences to these appellants without any demand for certificates. There is a decision on this point by Sir Thomas Henry, as magistrate, in 1874 cited in Turner's Pawnbrokers Acts, 2nd ed., p. 135: Reg. v. Bate. That decision was acquiesced in by the Inland Revenue, who declined the magistrate's offer to state a case for appeal.

STEPHEN, J.—We must decide the meaning of these words of the saving clause in section 39 of the Pawnbrokers Act, 1872, in favour of the appellants in each case. To construe them in favour of the Commissioners we must read into the section the restrictive words "in respect of the particular business which such person was then carrying on." What carries most weight with me, I will confess, is the fact that for eighteen years the practice of the Inland Revenue has been other than what is now contended for. The fact that a case was requested to be stated upon the decision of Sir Thomas Henry soon after the Act was passed is also relevant evidence to support us in our decision. The words of the Act are clear, the practice has been long established. Whatever disadvantages may accrue under such an interpretation must be remedied by Parliament if it can spare the time. This rule must be made absolute.

CHARLES, J.—I am of the same opinion. The practice hitherto of the Inland Revenue Office has been in accordance with the language of the statute. We are asked to read into section 39 of this Act words restrictive of a privilege which, without such words being supplied, is undoubtedly conferred. The section would have to be read as only exempting "a person being at the commencement of this Act a licensed pawnbroker in respect of premises for which the then existing licence is held." There is no justification upon the statute for the introduction of any such limitation. The section confers the privilege granted upon a person "then being a licensed pawnbroker" without any other limitation. In the cases before us, Ohlson was clearly an assignee of Pockett, who was at the time of the Act a licensed pawnbroker, and he is also a successor to Creshull, who also comes within the definition of the Act, and was a person entitled to open new premises, provided he had a new licence, without taking out a certificate. In the second case, Garland was actually a licensed pawnbroker himself at the date of the Act; he has since retired from the particular pawnbroking business for which he was then licensed, but he applies for a licence to open a new business on other premises without obtaining a certificate. He is clearly entitled, under the provisions of section 39, to do so.

Rule made absolute.

SMITH, HILL, & Co. v. PYMAN, BELL, & Co. (a.)

Shipping—Advanced freight—Clause in charter-party—"One-third freight, if required, to be advanced, less three per cent. for interest and insurance"—Loss of vessel before requirement of advanced freight—Right to recover advanced freight.

Advanced freight, being a payment made for the taking goods on board and for the undertaking to carry them, and not for the safe carriage of them, may be recovered in an action by a shipowner under a clause in a charter-party that "one-third freight, if required, should be advanced, less three per cent. for interest and insurance," although the demand for such payment was not made until after the vessel had become a total loss.

Further consideration before Charles, J., of a case tried before him at Leeds Assizes.

The action was brought by shipowners on a charter-party, and was to recover the sum of £245, for "advanced freight." The charter-party was in the usual form, and by it the defendants chartered the plaintiffs' vessel, The Gamma, to carry a cargo of coals from Hull to Odessa. The charter-party contained the usual clauses, and provided that the freight was to be paid, on unloading and right delivery of the cargo, in cash at current exchange; that the captain or owners should sign charterers' bills of lading, and at the end of the charter-party there was the clause which was now sued upon—namely, "One-third freight, if required, to be advanced, less three per cent. for interest and insurance."

The facts were these:—The vessel left Hull on December 19, at half-past six in the morning, without bills of lading having been presented or signed. About three-quarters of an hour afterwards she grounded in the Humber, and on the same afternoon became a total wreck. Late in the afternoon of the same day, and after the loss had become known, the charterers presented bills of lading to the owners' agents, and thereupon one-third freight in advance was asked for, but payment was refused, upon the ground that the vessel had become a total wreck, that the adventure had come to an end, and that, therefore, no obligation rested on the charterers to pay the advanced freight.

On a previous transaction between the same parties it was proved that—the charter-party being in the same form as in the present case—bills of lading had been presented after the vessel had sailed, and advanced freight required and paid.

Cyril Dodd, Q.C. (Montague Lush with him), for the plaintiffs.—The legal consideration for the payment of advanced freight is the receipt of the goods on board and for the undertaking to carry them, and not for the safe carriage of them, and it follows that when the goods are placed on board, then the advanced freight is due and payable. When once it has been paid it cannot be recovered back, whatever happens to the ship, and when it is once agreed to be paid it can be recovered, although the vessel has become a loss: Byrne v. Schiller, 19 W. R. 161 and 1114, L. R. 6 Ex. 319. Andrew v. Moorhouse, 5 Taunt. 435, where it was held that it was not recoverable, was a different case from the present. Kirchner v. Venus, 7 W. R. 455, 12 Moore P. C. C. 361, shows that advanced freight is a payment made for taking the goods on board. Winter v. Haldimand, 2 B. & Ad. 649; De Silvale v. Kendall, 4 M. & S. 37; Allison v. The Bristol Marine Insurance Co., 24 W. R. 1039, 1 App. Cas. 209, are to the same effect. There would have been no difficulty whatever but for the words in the charter-party, "if required." We have got the right to make the requirement up to the time when in the ordinary course the bills of lading are brought for signature, and we exercised our option at that time as we had a right to do. The words, therefore, "if required," can make no difference in the present case.

Lawson Walton, Q.C. (Robson with him), for the defendants.—Advanced freights cannot be required after the vessel has become a total loss, and the object of the voyage frustrated, and the vessel disabled from earning freight. The construction of the clause requires that the option should be exercised within a reasonable time. The loss of the vessel shows that no freight can ever be earned, and therefore no advanced freight can ever be paid or required. The words at the end of the clause relating to insurance show that it was intended that no advanced freight should be payable after an insurance was incapable of being effected: Jackson v. Union Marine Insurance Co., 23 W. R. 169, L. R. 10 C. P. 125; The Kathleen, 23 W. R. 350, L. R. 4 Adm. 269.

CHARLES, J.—In this case the plaintiffs seek to recover from the defendants the sum of £245, being one-third advanced freight on the screw steamship Gamma, payable by defendants to plaintiffs under a charter-party dated the 30th of November, 1888, less three per cent. for interest and insurance.

The facts were very short and they were not in dispute, but they raise a question of law on the true construction of the charter-party. The plaintiffs are the owners of this vessel, and she was chartered by the defendants to proceed from Hull to Odessa with a cargo of coal; she was loaded with coal, and upon the 19th of December she sailed from Hull about half-past six in the morning. Three-quarters of an hour after she sailed she took the ground on some sands called the Middle Sands, and at four o'clock the same afternoon, if not earlier, she broke her back, and this was an end of the voyage so far as the carriage of the cargo was concerned. Certainly after the voyage had come to an end, and the purpose of the voyage had been frustrated by the stranding of The Gamma and the injury which she sustained, charterers' bills of lading were brought to the owners' agent with the colliery invoices of the coal, and thereupon one-third freight in advance was asked for and payment was refused, and it was refused upon the ground that the vessel had become a wreck, and, therefore, the adventure having come to an end, the whole commercial object of the speculation was frustrated, and no obligation rested on the charterers to pay the advanced freight. Now with regard to the language of the charter-party itself, the clause with reference to freight is in these words, "The freight to be paid on unloading and right delivery of the cargo, in cash at current exchange, one-third freight, if required, to be advanced less three per cent. for interest and insurance." The practice of the previous voyage was proved before me, and according to that practice and upon the previous voyage, the requirement was made upon the presentation of the bills of lading. An admission was made at the trial before me at Leeds that on the previous voyage bills of lading were brought after the vessel had sailed, and the advance freight was then required to be paid. Bills of lading were brought after the vessel had sailed. That is possible under this charter-party, because the charterers' bills of lading are to be signed by the captain or the owners, and therefore it is immaterial whether they are brought before or after the vessel had sailed. It was also proved that in the present case the bills of lading were made out in the ordinary course, without delay, and that the colliery invoices were also made out in the usual manner, and it seems to me that there was nothing abnormal in the period at which this requirement was made. The owner could scarcely make the requirement till the charterer told him the amount of the whole freight. The matter really stands thus: That there was nothing unusual or abnormal in the mode in which this requirement was made; quite the contrary, it was made in accordance with what had been done on the previous occasion, and I gather, not from the admission, but from the evidence in the case, that the usual course was adopted between the parties—the course which was usual at the port.

But now comes the difficulty. Undoubtedly at the time the requirement was made the vessel had become a wreck, and the whole voyage was frustrated, and it is contended, that being so, that the requirement cannot be lawfully made, and that argument was enforced by the terms of the advance freight clause, that advance freight, if required, was to be paid. The freight, if required, was to be advanced less three per cent. for interest and insurance, indicating, as it was argued, that clearly the requirement must be made when the subject-matter of the insurance is still in existence. To arrive at a solution of this question it is necessary to ask what advanced freight is. Freight, of course, is money paid for the safe carriage of the goods themselves; but advanced freight, although in one sense it is freight, has been decided over and over again to be a payment made for taking the goods on board and for the undertaking to carry, not for the safe carriage of them, and that being the nature of advanced freight it has been held, first, that if it had been paid in advance it cannot be got back again even although the vessel is lost; secondly, that if there had been an absolute obligation to pay it—in other words, an absolute agreement to pay advanced freight, that agreement can be put in action, although before the action the vessel was lost.

Now those two propositions of law really go a very long way, if not the whole way, to decide this case. and the only difficulty that I have felt about it is, that in the present case the charter-party does not impose upon the charterers an absolute obligation to pay advanced freight, but only to pay advanced freight if required. It seems to me that here there was, at the time of entering into this bargain, this obligation to pay advanced freight if required. What right have I, having a regard to the nature of advanced freight, and remembering that it is money paid, not for safe carriage but merely for the undertaking to carry, to read into that clause the words "if required before the loss of the vessel." The only justification for my doing so is to be found in the clause as to deduction for insurance, but upon reflection I think the meaning of that is this: the owner, being relieved from the necessity of insuring the whole freight, inasmuch as the one-third paid to him is no longer a risk, he is to make a deduction of an amount equivalent to the amount he would have had to spend himself had none of the freight been advanced to him. In other words, that it is in the nature of a discount which he makes in order to get safely home the advance freight which he demands. That appears to me to give full effect to the construction of the words "less three per cent. for interest and insurance," and if it does, then there is simply the clause to be read as it stands—one-third freight if required, to be advanced, and there is nothing to show that that requirement must be made before the loss of the vessel itself.

The case, therefore, really appears to me to be covered by the authorities. It is clear that advanced freight is not money which is paid in any respect for safe carriage, but only for the loading of the goods and the undertaking to carry; and it is clear that the advanced freight cannot be recovered if it be paid, although the ship is lost. It is also clear that an unqualified obligation to pay advanced freight can be insisted upon, even although the vessel be lost before it is insisted upon; and so here I think that the claim may be made to pay the advance freight, although the vessel be lost before the requirement in fact was made.

That entitles the plaintiffs to judgment for £245 and the costs of the claim, and as there is a counter-claim for £35 9s. 2d., which was admitted by the plaintiffs in their reply, there will be judgment for the defendants, without costs, for £35 9s. 2d. on the counter-claim, and execution will issue for the balance.

IN BANKRUPTCY.

Q. B. Div. (Cave and Vaughan Williams, JJ.) Jan. 19.

Ex parte MCGOWAN.
In re ASHTON. (a.)

Bankruptcy—Solicitor—Notice of act of bankruptcy—Notice given to managing clerk—Sufficiency of notice.

Where a solicitor, with the consent of the client, puts his managing solicitor in his place to conduct and manage the matter which the solicitor was retained to conduct, notice of an act of bankruptcy to the managing clerk will be notice to the solicitor.

But, apart from any question of substitution, the mere fact that a man is a managing clerk will not constitute notice to him notice to his principal.

Appeal against an order of his Honour Judge Heywood in the county court at Manchester, by which he declared two deeds executed by the bankrupt on the 19th of November, 1889, to be void as against the trustee in the bankruptcy, on the ground that the title of the trustee related back to a date earlier than that on which the deeds were signed, and that the appellant was not within the protection of section 49 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, because he had by means of an agent had notice of an act of bankruptcy.

In June, 1889, a bankruptcy notice was issued against the debtor, who carried on business as a machinist and engineer at Manchester, and in September, 1889, a bankruptcy petition was filed, but, owing to an adjournment for the purpose of the trial of a disputed question, a receiving order was not made until March, 1890.

On the 19th of November, 1889, the deeds sought to be set aside by the trustee were executed by the debtor in connection with the sale of his business to the appellant, that transaction being for the most part carried through by one Wood, the managing clerk to Mr. R. G. Thompson, the solicitor employed by the appellant in the matter, who it was alleged had at the time knowledge of the act of bankruptcy committed by the debtor.

The county court judge found that neither the appellant nor Mr. Thompson had notice of an act of bankruptcy, but that Wood had, and he held that notice of an act of bankruptcy to him was notice to the appellant.

The present appeal was brought from that decision.

Sidney Woolf, Q.C., and Wharton (Austin with them), for the appellant.—The question is whether the appellant had notice of the act of bankruptcy, and whether it was a sufficient notice. Wood, the managing clerk of Mr. Thompson, was acquainted with the bankrupt, and it was really through him that the appellant came in as purchaser of the business, and it would appear that Wood was to have £100 from the bankrupt for the introduction. Even if Wood had notice of the act of bankruptcy it is not sufficient. He was not an agent to receive notice, and the appellant could not constructively be bound by it.

Bigham, Q.C., and Sutton, for the trustee.—Wood was appointed by the appellant to carry out the whole business, and if a person is put forward by the assignee to negotiate the business, whether he be a solicitor, solicitor's clerk, or layman, his knowledge is that of the person who puts him forward. It is true that the appellant retained Mr. Thompson, Wood not being a solicitor, but Wood was the man who managed the whole business. Although a retainer is given to a solicitor, if that solicitor leaves the business to a clerk, the notice coming to the clerk in such cases is notice to the solicitor, and so to the client. Where the clerk in a solicitor's office is conducting the transaction jointly with the solicitor, or exclusively, or has the management of the business so that a duty devolves on him to tell it is sufficient. If he neglects his duty, it is unfortunate for the person who employs the solicitor.

They referred to Brewin v. Briscoe, 7 W. R. 584; Pike v. Stephens, 12 Q. B. 465.

Sidney Woolf, Q.C., replied.

CAVE, J.—In this case the county court judge has come to a conclusion which does not commend itself to my judgment. There is certainly more than one ground on which it is impossible to say that the alleged notice was such a one as to affect the appellant in this case. It was said first that the appellant had retained and employed Wood, and had constituted him his agent and alter ego so as to make the notice to Wood notice to the appellant. That seems to have been the impression of the county court judge at first, but subsequently he appears to have modified that impression and was more inclined to look on Wood as the alter ego or agent of Thompson, and not of the appellant. It is perfectly clear that the appellant did not constitute Wood his alter ego or agent in the matter. He had understood that the bankrupt wanted to dispose of his business, and on November 5, 1889, with a view of making inquiry as to the property, he retained Thompson to act as his solicitor in the negotiation. No doubt by that act he did constitute Thompson his agent, and notice to Thompson would have been notice to him; but there was no actual notice to Thompson. With regard to Wood it is clear that the appellant did not constitute him his agent. He went to Thompson and retained Thompson, and although it is true he went with Wood to the bankrupt's, yet Wood went with him as Thompson's clerk who was told to go and help in the inquiries. There is also no ground to come to the conclusion that Thompson had constituted Wood his substitute in the matter. We may accede to the proposition which appears to have been laid down in Brewin v. Briscoe, that where an attorney with the consent of the client—for I think that is what is meant—puts his managing attorney in his place to conduct and manage the matter which the attorney was retained to conduct, in that case he does put the clerk into the position that notice to the clerk is notice to the solicitor and to the client. In the present case it is abundantly clear that there was no such substitution. Thompson was employed to conduct the business, and although he did not actually do everything himself, yet it is quite clear he did not delegate the whole matter to Wood. On the contrary, he himself made some very important inquiries, and retained control of the matter.

Those two considerations are sufficient to dispose of this case, because if Wood was not the substitute of the appellant or of Thompson, notice to him could not be notice to the appellant or Thompson. It is said that the doctrine of constructive notice is a very difficult one, and I dare say it is, but I have arrived at the conclusion, in which I think I am supported by some members of the Court of Appeal, that the doctrine of constructive notice is one which has been carried far enough, and I am not prepared to hold that the mere fact that a man is a managing clerk, apart from any substitution by the client or his principal to manage the business, would make notice to him notice to his principal or the client. If I am wrong in this, however, there are other points in the present case which render it impossible to uphold the decision of the county court judge. I am not satisfied at all that notice ever was given to Wood. The knowledge was certainly not acquired by him in the business, and the evidence put before us is not evidence on which any great reliance can be placed. It shows, however, that the person who is alleged to have given the notice was by no means desirous that it should be communicated, but that he and Wood were really anxious that the matter should be concealed, and should not come to the knowledge of Thompson and the appellant, in order that nothing might arise to prevent the transaction being carried through, out of which they were both to get some personal advantage.

JENKINS v. BUSHBY. (a.)

Practice—Trial—Right to a jury—Action in Chancery Division—Trial at assizes—Rules of Supreme Court, 1883, ord. 36, rr. 6, 7 (a).

The plaintiffs, who were mine owners in Glamorganshire, brought an action in the Chancery Division against neighbouring mine owners for an injunction and an account. They named Glamorganshire as the place of trial, and applied for an order for trial with a special jury. An order was made by Stirling, J., that the action should be tried by a judge without a jury at the next Glamorganshire Assizes.

Held, on appeal, that the plaintiffs could not, as a matter of right, claim a trial with a jury, and that ord. 36, r. 6, did not apply; but, as one of the questions to be tried was the question of boundaries, and, considering the importance of a view of the locality for that purpose, that the order appealed from should be varied by directing that the action be entered for trial at the assizes by a judge with a special jury.

In every case in which there was, prior to the Judicature Acts, a right to a trial with a jury, such right still exists; and where there was no such right, it is not conferred by the rules of 1883, though, in such cases, the court has power to direct at discretion a trial with a jury.

Appeal by G. T. Jenkins and T. J. Thomas, the plaintiffs in the action, from an order of Stirling, J., at chambers, ordering that the action, which had been commenced in the Chancery Division, should be tried by a judge without a jury at the next Glamorganshire Assizes. The plaintiffs' claim was for an account of minerals alleged to have been taken by the defendants, H. J. Bushby, C. E. Thomas, and North's Navigation Collieries, 1889 (Limited), from under certain mountain lands of the plaintiffs situate some thirty miles from Cardiff; and the plaintiffs had named Glamorganshire as the place of trial. One of the principal questions to be tried was as to the boundaries, and the plaintiffs had applied for the trial of the action with a special jury, on the ground that a view of the locality would be not only essential but necessary, and that a special jury of the county of Glamorgan, who would be able to view the lands in question, would be the best tribunal.

Ord. 36, r. 4—"The court or a judge may, if it shall appear desirable, direct a trial without a jury of any question or issue of fact, or partly of fact and partly of law, arising in any cause or matter which, previously to the passing of the principal Act, could, without any consent of parties, have been tried without a jury."

Rule 5—"The court or a judge may direct the trial without a jury of any cause, matter, or issue requiring any prolonged examination of documents or accounts, or any scientific or local investigation, which cannot in their or his opinion conveniently be tried with a jury."

Rule 6—"In any other cause or matter, upon the application [within ten days after notice of trial has been given] of any party thereto for a trial with a jury of the cause or matter or any issue of fact, an order shall be made for a trial with a jury."

Rule 7 (a)—"In every cause or matter, unless under the provisions of rule 6 of this order a trial by a jury is ordered, or under rule 2 of this order, either party has signified a desire to have a trial with a jury, the mode of trial shall be by a judge without a jury; provided that in any such case the court or a judge may at any time order any cause, matter, or issue to be tried by a judge with a jury, or by a judge sitting with assessors, or by an official referee, with or without assessors."

Sir E. Clarke, S.G., J. G. Wood, and D. Lewis, for the appellants, the plaintiffs.—The action has gone on so far in the Chancery Division, and as the plaintiffs can change the venue to the assizes, it will be more advantageous to try the case with a jury, who can view the locus in quo. [They referred to Attorney-General v. Vyner, 38 W. R. 194, and Wedderburn v. Pickering, 28 W. R. 239, 13 Ch. D. 769, and section 34 of the Judicature Act, 1873.] The plaintiff has a right to a jury under rule 6, and if he has not such a right this is a proper case to come under rule 7 (a).

Graham Hastings, Q.C., and O. L. Clare, for the respondents, H. J. Bushby and C. E. Thomas.—We object to a jury, to which the appellant is not entitled under the rules. Attorney-General v. Vyner was merely a question of fact. Rule 4 is applicable here, not rule 6. In the cases falling within rule 2 there must be a jury, if either party wishes it. [KAY, L.J., referred to ord. 33, r. 1, and ord. 34, r. 2.] The plaintiffs must show special grounds, which they have not done. There is no reason why a different rule should be applied where the trial of an entire cause is asked for from that in which the trial of a single issue is asked for. Rules 3 and 5 comprise all actions which could have been brought in the Chancery Division. In the present case a number of separate points would have to be left to the jury. The Temple Bar, 34 W. R. 68, 11 P. D. 6, decides that rule 6 gives no absolute right to a jury where the case would before the Judicature Act have been tried without a jury. The judge has exercised his discretion in a way in which the court will not readily interfere. The plaintiffs' claim involves questions of tenure and manorial rights, which will to a great extent turn upon the manor rolls, as in Warrick v. Queen's College, Oxford, L. R. 3 Eq. 683, 15 W. R. Ch. Dig. 111, which begin at the year 1570 and will require peculiarly careful consideration. We should be satisfied to have the question tried by a referee, which would be more convenient than a trial by jury, and a referee could have a view, if necessary.

Sefton Strickland, for the other respondents, submitted to the judgment of the court.

Sir E. Clarke, S.G., in reply.—It would not be proper to send this case to a referee: Ormerod v. Todmorden Mill Co., 30 W. R. 805, 8 Q. B. D. 664. In rule 6 of order 36 the words "in any other cause or matter" must be read, "In any other cause or matter of which the mode of trial has not been determined by the previous rules." [LINDLEY, L.J., referred to Timson v. Wilson, 36 W. R. 418, 38 Ch. D. 72.]

LINDLEY, L.J.—This is an action brought by one mine owner against another for an injunction and an account.

The plaintiffs' mine is in Glamorganshire. The plaintiffs issued their writ in the Chancery Division, and named Glamorganshire as the place of trial. The plaintiffs in due course applied for an order that the action might be tried at the next Glamorganshire Assizes by a judge with a special jury. This was opposed by the defendants, who objected to trial by a jury, and Stirling, J., made an order that the action should be tried at the next Glamorganshire Assizes by a judge without a jury. From this order the plaintiffs have appealed. They contend, first, that they have a right to a trial by a jury under ord. 36, r. 6; and, secondly, that if that rule does not apply this case is one in which the judge could have ordered trial by jury under rule 7, and that he ought to have made such an order in this particular case, inasmuch as the question in dispute between the parties is one of boundary, and that a view of the locality is essential for the proper determination of that question. The defendants, on the other hand, contend that rule 6 does not apply, that this case is one which requires prolonged examination of documents, which cannot be conveniently made with a jury, that the case falls within rules 5 and 7, that the judge had a discretion as to the order which ought to be made, and that such discretion was properly exercised, or, at all events, ought not to be interfered with. It becomes necessary, therefore, first to consider whether rule 6 applies, for if it does then it follows that the plaintiffs are entitled to a trial by jury as a matter of right. Now, rule 6 has been frequently considered, and there are decisions by this court upon it—viz., The Temple Bar, Timson v. Wilson, and Fanshawe v. London and Provincial Dairy Co. There is also the decision of Chitty, J., in Coote v. Ingram, 35 W. R. 390, 35 Ch. D. 117, which was pronounced after the Temple Bar case, and before Timson v. Wilson. The construction put upon rule 6 has been that the words "in any other cause or matter" do not mean "in any cause or matter other than one in which the mode of trial has been fixed under the preceding rules," but mean "in any cause or matter other than those mentioned or referred to in the preceding rules," and the reason for this construction is that if it were not adopted a great, and wholly unintended, change in the mode of trial would have been made in a very large number of actions brought in the Chancery Division. As pointed out in Timson v. Wilson, rules 2-7 of order 36 must be read together; they form a code on this subject. Wherever there was before the Judicature Acts a right to a trial by jury, such right still exists; and where there was no such right before, there is none under the rules, although in such cases power is given to the court to direct a trial by a jury if in its opinion that mode of trial ought to be adopted. That this is the true effect of the rules will be seen by going through them one by one.

Rule 2 preserves the right to a jury in the actions there mentioned, and there is no power to try them otherwise, if either party desires a jury.

Rule 3 applies to cases assigned to the Chancery Division by section 34 of the Judicature Act, 1873. In these cases there was no right to a trial by a jury, and no such right is conferred by the rules; but power is conferred on the court to direct a trial by jury even in these cases.

Rule 4 applies to causes or matters which, before 1873, could be tried without a jury, without any consent of parties. It has no application to old common law actions, but it applies to all chancery actions and to old admiralty actions. Rule 4 does not say how these actions are to be tried; that matter is dealt with by rule 7. Rule 4 only authorizes trial without a jury of one or more issues arising in such actions as I have just mentioned. The old Court of Chancery had power to direct such issues to be tried with a jury, but I never heard of any issue being directed to be tried without a jury. Whether the old Court of Admiralty had power to direct issues to be so tried I do not know. The power to direct issues to be tried with a jury in non-jury actions is preserved by rule 7 (a).

Rule 5 merely preserves the old practice of the common law courts; there was always power in such actions as is there mentioned to order a trial without a jury. This rule has no application to actions which, apart from it, are properly triable without a jury.

Rule 6 is supplementary to rule 2, and was necessary to preserve the right to trial by a jury in all pure common law actions besides those mentioned in rule 2. Rule 6 is qualified by rule 5, but it has no reference to rule 4, except this—viz., that the causes or matters mentioned in rule 4 are excluded from the operation of rule 6. To construe rule 6 as applicable to all actions except those mentioned in rules 2, 3, and 5 would, as already stated, give a right to a trial by a jury where there was no such right before—e.g., in all chancery actions and in old admiralty actions. Such a construction is quite inadmissible.

Rule 7 applies to all actions in the High Court except those in which either party has a right to a trial by jury and has insisted on such right in the mode prescribed in the rules 2 and 6. Actions decided by the Chancery Division fall within rule 3, and although rule 7 is wide enough to cover them, there is no discrepancy between the two rules. Rule 7 is so worded that in all cases to which it applies, the mode of trial is to be without a jury unless otherwise ordered, and it is for those who ask for trial by jury to satisfy the court that the trial should be by jury rather than without.

Rules 8 to 10 apply to all actions, and are supplementary, and create no difficulty.

This construction of the rules gives full effect to all of them, and is the construction put upon them already by this court in the cases to which I have referred, and my only reason for re-investigating the subject is that I think there is still some misunderstanding about it. Rule 4 is sometimes supposed to authorize a trial of an issue by a jury, whereas, in truth, it is confined to trials of issue without a jury, and other misconceptions have occurred which tend to make the rules obscure. So far, therefore, as the appellants base their appeal on rule 6, I am of opinion that they fail.

The next point is to consider rules 5 and 7. In considering rule 5 judges not accustomed to work with juries are apt to underrate their power of dealing with questions involving an examination of maps, plans, and accounts. No doubt when it is necessary to go through a long disputed account item by item it is very difficult, if not impossible, to do so with a jury at the assizes; but to suppose that there is any real difficulty in getting a special jury to see and appreciate the results of accounts, or to apply their minds to and appreciate ordinary maps and plans, is to make a great mistake. Questions of boundary, involving an examination of maps, are constantly tried satisfactorily and without difficulty by judges with juries at the assizes. It is obvious that in this case no accounts will have to be taken at the trial, and if the learned judge really thought that this case could not be conveniently tried at the assizes by a judge with a jury, I cannot agree with him.

I pass now to rule 7, which is the rule applicable to this case. As already stated, this rule, when it applies, throws upon the party asking for trial by jury the onus of showing some good reason why his request should be acceded to. This is obvious from the rule itself, and this is the construction which has been put upon it. The reason given in this case is that a view of the locality by a jury is all-important. I am of opinion that a view may be very important, and that, as regards mode of trial, the choice really lies, not between a trial by a judge with or without a jury, but between a trial by judge and jury with a view by the jury, and a trial by some referee who can go to the locality. Of these two modes of trial the former at present appears the best. In my opinion the learned judge underrated the importance of a view, and overrated the difficulty of properly trying the case with a jury.

The order appealed from ought to be varied by directing that this action be entered for trial at the Glamorganshire Assizes by a judge and a special jury. The costs of the plaintiffs' summons and this appeal should be costs in the action. I wise to add that it must not be understood that this mode of trial will be obligatory on the judge of assize. If he finds it necessary or expedient to order any other mode of trial consistently with the rules he will be quite at liberty to do so.

LOPES, L.J.—After the very exhaustive judgment of Lindley, L.J., and the way he has gone through these rules, I only desire to make a general observation or two. It appears to me that rules from 2 to 7 of order 36 form a code of regulations as to the mode of trial. The effect of them is this. They make a trial by a judge without a jury the normal mode of trial. They do not take away the right of trial by a jury where it exists before, or give it where it did not previously exist. It appears to me that that, beyond all question, is the general effect of those rules. They do, however, make this change, that where it is desired the trial should be by a judge with a jury, this mode of trial must be asked for. That is a great and important change, because previously to the Judicature Acts and these rules, all common law actions and all actions in the Queen's Bench Division in all cases were tried by a judge and a jury, unless the parties consented. That is the effect of these rules on the case now before us. It was contended by the Solicitor-General that the case comes within rule 6, and that he had an absolute right to a jury. I am clearly of opinion that that is not so. Rule 6 does not apply to this case for the reasons already given by the Lord Justice. Under what rule does it come? It clearly comes under rule 7, and the effect of rule 7 on this case is, that the party who seeks to have the case taken out of what I call the normal mode of trial and tried by a jury, must make out a case for that change.

Does the applicant in the present case make out such a case? It appears to me he does. The question here is a question of boundary, and I have no hesitation in saying that, from what experience I have had of cases of that kind, that it is most frequently desirable that a view should be had. It is of assistance to the jury of such a kind as no other assistance can give. With regard to a view, a view cannot be had except by a jury of the county in which the property is situated. That being the case, I agree with what has been said that a case has been made out by the appellant that this action should be tried in the county of Glamorgan, and that it should be tried there with a special jury.

I quite agree with what was said by Lindley, L.J., that we do not desire to make this a rule obligatory on the judge. If at the hearing he should be of opinion that it would be more desirable to try it by an official referee, it will be right and proper for him to so order. I fully expect, however, when the trial is entered upon that it will be found there will be no difficulty in trying it with a jury, and that the decision of a jury in all probability will be the most satisfactory result that can be attained, having regard to the interests of both parties. I think, therefore, that this application must be allowed.

KAY, L.J.—The real question in this case upon the orders was put by the Solicitor-General in reply very accurately, thus: Does ord. 36, r. 6, except from its operation all causes and matters mentioned in the preceding rules of that order, or only the causes and matters as to which those rules had provided particular modes of trial?

Reading those rules apart from the decided cases, it seems to me that there is very much to be said in favour of the latter of these two constructions. But its adoption would certainly result in the formidable difficulty which was pointed out during the argument by Lindley, L.J. There are very many cases commonly tried in the Chancery Division which are essentially common law actions, such for instance are cases of nuisance, trespass, actions for obstruction of light and air, and the like. These are not specially provided for in rules 1-5, and on this construction, if any of the parties applied to have them tried with a jury, the court could have no discretion, but would be compelled under rule 6 to direct such trial.

In The Temple Bar case the Court of Appeal adopted the former of these two constructions, holding that not only the causes and matters, the mode of trial of which was specially provided for, were excepted by the first words of rule 6, but also the causes and matters mentioned at the end of rule 4. That rule provides that the court or a judge may direct a trial without a jury of any question or issue of fact, or partly of fact and partly of law, arising in any cause or matter which, previously to the passing of the principal Act, could, without any consent of parties, have been tried without a jury.

I doubted at first whether the relative "which" did not refer to the issue to be so tried, but on consideration I am clear that it refers to the cause or matter mentioned in rule 4, because an issue of fact directed before the Judicature Act, 1873, would be tried by a judge with a jury, and the meaning of the rule seems to me to be that where such an issue is directed in a cause or matter, which cause or matter could have been tried without a jury, then the court may direct the issue to be tried in like manner.

The Temple Bar case has been followed in many subsequent decisions. It lays down a useful rule because it gives the court a discretion as to ordering the trial by jury in the class of cases to which I have referred when commenced in the Chancery Division.

But then it is said that in Attorney-General v. Vyner it was held that where a plaintiff had brought an action to establish a right of highway in the Chanc-

Division, although he had marked his pleadings with a local venue, as in this case, so that the trial would have to be at the assizes, and the judge of the High Court had directed the trial should be without a jury, the Court of Appeal would not interfere with that exercise of his discretion.

Of course, in a question of discretion, authorities are not of much value. No two cases are exactly alike, and the court cannot be bound even if they were, by a previous decision, to exercise its discretion in a particular way, because that would be in effect putting an end to the discretion.

Naturally, however, the learned judge in the court below felt much pressed by the decision of the Court of Appeal in Attorney-General v. Vyner.

There is, however, this material distinction, that in the present case the question is, what is the true boundary between different properties under which there are valuable mines? and I am fortified in my own opinion, as to the importance of trying such a case before a jury who could have a view, by the much greater experience of Lopes, L.J., who thinks it material, if not essential.

I venture to express a hope that the learned judge who tries this case will be able so to deal with the costs as to discourage the bringing of an action of this kind in the Court of Chancery and at the same time fixing a local venue for the trial. This seems to me a revival to some extent of one of the great abuses which the Judicature Act and the statutes known as Rolt's and Cairns' Acts were intended to remedy—viz., of dragging the defendant from one court to another and thereby increasing the delay and cost of the action. I must say that in my opinion such a proceeding by the plaintiff ought to be discouraged.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL v. MORGAN. (a.)

*Mines—Gold mine—Gold found with other metals—Rights of Crown—Licence to work—*1 W. & M. c. 30, ss. 2, 4—5 W. & M. c. 6, ss. 2, 3.

A mine not worked or worth working except as a gold mine, though containing a certain quantity of copper, tin, iron, or lead, is not a "mine of copper, tin, iron, or lead" within the meaning of the Act 1 W. & M. c. 30, or (therefore) a "mine . . . wherein any ore . . . is . . . found . . . in which there is copper, tin, iron, or lead" within the meaning of the Act 5 W. & M. c. 6 (which two expressions—the latter Act being explanatory of the former—must be taken to mean the same thing). Such a mine is a gold mine, and consequently, being in the United Kingdom, a royal mine, and cannot be worked without a licence from the Crown.

The effect of section 3 of 5 W. & M. c. 6 is to authorize the owners of copper, tin, iron, or lead mines—that is, mines worked for, and deriving their profit mainly from, copper, tin, iron, or lead—to work them as such, though they contain also gold or silver, the rights of the Crown being protected by giving it an option to take the ore containing gold or silver at certain fixed prices, but so that, if the Crown does not choose so to take the ore, the owners may dispose of it for their own benefit. But that section does not mean that, wherever there is any one or more of the four named base metals associated with gold or silver in a mine, and without reference to the question whether or not the mine is worth working for such base metal, the owner is to be entitled to the gold or silver in case the Crown does not exercise its option of taking the mixed ore at the statutory price.

Decision of North, J. (ante, p. 169), affirmed.

Appeal from North, J.

This was an appeal by the defendant, Mr. E. Pritchard Morgan, against a decision of North, J. The facts of the case appear from the report below. ante, p. 169.

The action, which was commenced in April, 1888, was brought on behalf of the Crown by the Attorney-General for an injunction to restrain the defendant, his agents, servants, and workmen from raising, working, or getting, and from selling or removing, or causing or permitting to be removed, from a mine called the Gwynfynydd Mine, near Dolgelley, in the county of Merioneth, or from other lands in the same county, any gold, or gold ore, silver ore, or quartz or other substances containing gold or silver, the produce of such mine or lands, without the licence of the Commissioners of her Majesty's Woods, Forests, and Land Revenues; and for an account of what had been already obtained, and payment of its value.

An injunction to extend until the trial of the action or further order was, shortly after the commencement of the action, granted by North, J., but the order provided that it was not to interfere with the defendant raising the rock to the surface or extracting the ore from it.

The Morgan Gold Mining Co. subsequently took over the defendant's interest in the Gwynfynydd Mine, which was from that time worked under a licence from the Crown, the company paying royalties. When, therefore, the action came on for trial before North, J., in July, 1890, the only question for determination was whether the defendant ought to pay the costs of the action, which question, however, depended upon the decision of the further question whether in the action the contention of the defendant or that of the Crown was the correct one; or, in other words, whether the owner of a mine, which is worked simply as a gold mine, though the gold is found mingled with the ores of baser metals, is entitled to work the mine without the licence of the Crown, or whether the ancient prerogative of the Crown in respect of "royal mines"—that is, mines in which gold or silver is found—still remains in force, and is unrepealed by the statutes 1 W. & M. c. 30 and 5 W. & M. c. 6. The old law appears from the celebrated "Case of Mines," The Queen v. The Earl of Northumberland, Plowd. 310, in which it was decided (p. 336) "that by the law all mines of gold and silver within the realm, whether they be in the lands of the Queen or of subjects, belong to the Queen by prerogative, with liberty to dig and carry away the ores thereof, and with other such incidents thereto as are necessary to be used for the getting of the ore." It was also held by a majority of the judges in that case "that if the gold or silver in the base metal in the land of a subject be of less value than the base metal is, as well the base metal as the gold or silver in it belong by prerogative to the Crown, with liberty to dig for it and to put it upon the land of the subject, and to carry it away from thence; and in such case it shall be called a 'mine royal,' for the records do not make any distinction herein, but they are general, and prove that all ores or mines of copper, or other base metal, containing or bearing gold or silver, belong to the King."

The old law being found to discourage the industry of mining for the base metals, the two statutes of William and Mary above referred to were passed.

(a.) Reported by R. H. DEANE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The first of those statutes, 1 W. & M. c. 30, repealed by its 2nd section an old Act of 5 Hen. 4, which had made it "felony to use the craft of multiplication of gold or silver." The statute 1 W. & M. c. 30 went on to provide by section 4 "that noe mine of copper, tin, iron, or lead shall hereafter be adjudged, reputed, or taken to be a royall mine, although gold or silver may be extracted out of the same." The second Act, 5 W. & M. c. 6, was entitled "An Act to prevent Disputes and Controversies concerning Royal Mines," and its preamble was as follows:—

"Whereas by a clause in" the Act 1 W. & M. c. 30 "it is amongst other things enacted that no mine of tin, copper, iron, or lead shall hereinafter be adjudged, reputed, or taken to be a royal mine although gold or silver may be extracted out of the same, but, notwithstanding the good provision by the said statute to prevent the discouraging their Majesties' good subjects who have mines of copper, tin, iron, or lead in their soils, from digging and opening the same, many doubts and questions have arisen upon the said statute whereby great suits and troubles have arisen to many owners and proprietors of such mines."

Section 2 provided "that all and every person or persons, being subjects of the Crown of England, bodies politick or corporate, that now are or hereafter shall be the owner or owners, proprietor or proprietors, of any mine or mines within the kingdom of England, dominion of Wales, or town of Berwick-upon-Tweed, wherein any ore now is or hereafter shall be discovered, opened, found, or wrought, and in which there is copper, tin, iron, or lead, shall and may hold and enjoy the same mine or mines and ore, and continue in the possession thereof, and dig and work the said mine or mines or ore, notwithstanding that such mine or mines or ore shall be pretended or claimed to be a royal mine or royal mines; any law, usage, or custom to the contrary notwithstanding." Section 3 was as follows:—"Provided always, and be it enacted and declared, that their majesties, their heirs and successors, and all claiming any royal mines under them, shall and may have the ore of any such mine or mines in any part of the said kingdom of England, dominion of Wales, or town of Berwick-upon-Tweed (other than tin ore in the counties of Devon and Cornwall), paying to the proprietors or owners of the said mine or mines wherein such ore is or shall be found, within thirty days after the said ore is or shall be raised and laid upon the banks of the said mine or mines, and before the same be removed from thence, the rates following (that is to say)—for all ore washt, made clean and merchantable, wherein is copper, the rate of £16 per ton; and for all ore washt, made clean and merchantable, wherein there is tin, the rate of 40s. per ton; and for all ore washt, made clean and merchantable, wherein there is iron, the rate of 40s. per ton; and for all ore washt, made clean and merchantable, wherein there is lead, the rate of £9 per ton; and in default of payment of such respective sums as aforesaid, it shall and may be lawful for the owners and proprietors of the said mine or mines wherein such ore is or shall be found to sell and dispose of the said ore to his and their own uses, every law, statute, or custom to the contrary notwithstanding." By a later Act, 55 Geo. 3, c. 134, the rate for lead ore was altered to £25 per ton; the other rates remaining unaltered.

The judgment of North, J., appears in the report of the case below, ante, p. 169. He held (shortly) that the Gwynfynydd Mine was a gold mine and nothing else, and, as such, was not within the scope of the Acts of William and Mary, which were enacted for the benefit of owners of copper, iron, tin, and lead mines only; that the defendant was seeking to use those Acts for the purpose of appropriating without payment the gold and silver in his land which belonged to the Crown, and that he had been in the wrong throughout, and must pay the costs of the action.

The defendant appealed.

The defendant in person.—The law as laid down in the leading authority on the subject of royal mines, The Queen v. Earl of Northumberland—the Case of Mines—Plowden, 310, at p. 336, was found to discourage subjects in the opening and working of mines, and two statutes were therefore passed in the reign of William and Mary, the effect of which was, as I contend, to create a class of gold mines which do not belong to the Crown. My mines are within those Acts, and, therefore, if the Crown declines to exercise the option given it by the latter Act, of buying the ore at the statutory price, it belongs to me, with the precious metal. If these mines were in a different situation, such as to afford greater facilities for conveying bulky produce to market, it would pay best to work them as mines for base metals, but being, as they are, on the top of a Welsh mountain, fifteen miles from a railway station, the expense of carriage is prohibitive of so working them. The case in Plowden was, no doubt, decided correctly in accordance with the law at that time in force, there being an old statute of Henry IV. which made it felony to multiply gold and silver. That enactment was, however, repealed by 1 W. & M. c. 30, s. 2. Section 3 provided that all the gold and silver extracted should be taken to the mint. Section 4 was intended, in effect, to repeal the decision in the "Case of Mines." During the last fifteen years over a million pounds worth of silver has been produced in the United Kingdom without any claim in respect of it having been made by the Crown. A royal mine now is any mine containing gold or silver, other than a mine of copper, tin, iron, or lead. The mine in question is a mine containing copper and gold and it comes within the purview of the Act 5 W. & M. c. 6. There is always a trace of gold or silver in all base metals. There is barely a quill-full of gold in these mines—the exact amount is 1 oz. 2 dwts. to the ton of ore. The profit in gold-mining is so small that the cost of a licence is practically prohibitive. The Crown was not entitled to this judgment, base metals being present in these mines in appreciable amounts. It is only on account of their locality that these mines are not workable profitably except as gold mines. At the date of the Acts of William and Mary copper was worth only £5 a ton and lead £7, and as, under the Act, the Crown had to pay £16 a ton for the copper ore, if we take the proportion of pure copper in the ore at five per cent., which is a fair merchantable percentage, the Crown would be paying £320 per ton for what was worth only £5. That shows that the intention of the Legislature was to make the price prohibitive of the Crown buying unless there were about five ounces of gold in a ton of the ore. A similar argument arises upon the price, at that time, of lead and the other metals referred to.

Cur. adv. vult.

Jan. 21.—Sir R. E. Webster, A.G., Napier Higgins, Q.C., and Vaughan Hawkins, for the Crown, were not called upon.

LINDLEY, L.J.—The question which is raised on this appeal from North, J., is really who is to pay the costs of the proceedings instituted by the Crown against Mr. Morgan for an injunction to stop him working these mines without a licence, because it has become, in fact, u[illegible] to consider whether an injunction ought to be granted or not, Mr. Morgan having assigned his interest to a company, who are working the mines under a licence from the Crown. But the question as to the right to an injunction is important for the purpose of deciding who ought to pay the costs, and North, J., came to the conclusion that the Attorney-General was in the right, and ordered Mr. Morgan to pay the costs of the litigation. Therefore, though in a sense this is an appeal as to costs, it really depends on the question of the right to an injunction.

We have heard Mr. Morgan himself, and have come to the conclusion that he is in the wrong.

At common law all gold and silver occurring in any mine in England or Wales belonged to the Crown; and if metalliferous ores contained gold or silver to such an extent as to be worth extracting, and if such ores could not be obtained without interfering with such gold or silver, the whole of such ores belonged to the Crown; and the Crown had the right to work not only gold and silver mines, but also all other mines containing gold and silver worth extracting. This was settled in the great "Case of Mines." Mines containing gold or silver to such an extent as to be worth working for their extraction were called royal mines. The best definition which I know of royal mines is given by Sir John Pettus in his work "Fodinæ Regales" (published in 1670). He says at page 75:—"Although the gold or silver contained in the base metal of a mine in the lands of a subject be of less value than the base metal, yet, if the gold or silver do countervail the charge of the refining it, or be of more worth than the base metal spent in refining it, this is a mine royal; and as well the base metal, as the gold and silver in it, belong to the prerogative of the Crown."

The rights of the Crown in royal mines seriously obstructed the working of many of the most important mines in the kingdom. To remedy the inconvenience produced by this state of the law two statutes were passed in the latter part of the 17th century—viz., 1 W. & M. c. 30, and 5 W. & M. c. 6. The first of these Acts required all gold and silver, when extracted by refiners, to be taken to the mint; but it also enacted, by section 4, that no mine of copper, tin, iron, or lead should be a royal mine, although it might contain gold or silver. This enactment did not affect the right of the Crown to gold or silver in any mine. The Act prevented the Crown from claiming any copper, tin, iron, or lead mine on the ground that it contained gold or silver; and I apprehend that the Act also abrogated the right of the Crown to any copper, tin, iron, or lead ore got from any such mine, on the ground that such ore contained gold or silver. But the gold or silver, if any, remained the property of the Crown; and it is easy to see that owners of copper, tin, iron, or lead mines containing gold or silver might still be very much embarrassed in working their mines, notwithstanding that such mines were no longer royal mines. The second Act, 5 W. & M. c. 6, was passed to remedy this state of things. [His lordship referred to the provisions of the Act, and continued:—] The preamble shows the object of the Legislature. The Legislature assumes that there is some copper, tin, iron, or lead mine worth working by the owner; and then authorizes him to work it, though it contains gold or silver; but the statute protects the Crown by giving it an option to take the ore, with the gold or silver in it, at certain prices. If the Crown does not desire to buy the ore at these prices, then the mine owner can deal with the whole ore as he pleases, though there may be gold or silver in it. Such, in my opinion, is the short effect of this statute, and so it has been hitherto understood by lawyers: see Comyn's Digest, vol. 7, p. 636, "Waife. (H.) Mines," and 1 Blackstone's Com., 284. I can find nothing in the language of the statute which warrants the construction contended for by the appellant, which is that, wherever gold or silver is associated with one of the named metals, the owner of the soil is entitled to the gold or silver unless the Crown chooses to pay the statutory prices for the mixed ore, without reference to the question whether the mine is worth working for the sake of the base metals or not. The object of the statute is not to enable owners of mines to extort money from the Crown, but to protect them from extortion by the Crown. This is plainly shown by the preamble. It is true that the statute does not use the expression "copper ore, &c.," but mentions ore in which there is copper, &c., but the section relating to the payments to be made by the Crown, coupled with the preamble, convince me that what the Crown was to buy or leave alone was copper ore, lead ore, iron ore, or tin ore, as the case might be, and not gold or silver ore containing copper, iron, lead, or tin, which the mine owner would not incur the trouble and expense of working. Again, it may be true, as the appellant alleged, that, when the Act passed, the price of the base metals was less than the statutory price to be paid by the Crown for their ores.

Assuming this to be so, the only effect would be to deter the Crown from interfering with the working of copper mines, &c., unless the gold or silver in them were present in such quantities as to make it worth the while of the Crown to pay the statutory prices for the mixed ore. This would still be in order to protect a person desirous of working the mines for the sake of the base metals contained in them. Even if, therefore, there were any evidence as to the prices to the effect suggested by the appellant, and assuming that, if the court gave him liberty now to adduce such evidence he could adduce it, I should still fail to see how it followed that the Crown could be forced by a mine owner to yield its right to gold or silver unless it would pay the statutory price for ore associated with the gold or silver, but which ore no one would dream of working for the sake of obtaining the base metal, which alone belongs to the mine owner. The mines in question in this case are admitted to be such that no one would work them for the sake of the base metals in them. That being so, the decision appealed from is correct. In the view I take of the true construction of the statute it is unnecessary to consider whether the appellant so dealt with the ore as to entitle him to remove it, on the ground that the Crown had not duly exercised its option to take it. I regard the case, not as one in which the owner of a lead mine is seeking the protection of the statute, but as one in which the owner of a gold mine is seeking to strain the Act for the purpose of depriving the Crown of its well-known rights. The appeal must be dismissed, with costs.

LOPES, L.J.—Mr. Morgan, who has argued his case with great ability, admits that his case against the Crown fails unless he can bring himself within the protection afforded to the subject by the statutes of William and Mary. His contention is that because the mines in question contain some copper, lead, and iron he is protected by the statutes. It seems that before the passing of those Acts every mine from which gold or silver was extracted was regarded as a royal mine. A mine which was discovered in which there was any portion of gold or silver was liable to be claimed as a Crown mine. Valuable mines of baser metals were concealed, and there was universal distrust. Such a state of things called loudly for legislative interference, and the Act 1 W. & M. c. 30 was passed, declaring that "no mine of tin, copper, iron, or lead" should thereafter be taken to be a royal mine, although gold or silver might be extracted out of the same. This Act had reference to mines of tin, copper, iron, or lead, and no other; it was for the benefit of proprietors of those mines only, and left gold and silver mines in the same position as they were in before the passing of that statute. The provisions of the above statute were, however, not considered sufficiently clear, and another statute was soon afterwards passed to explain the former. The object of that Act and the former Act is to secure to the subject the copper, tin, iron, and lead ores found in his soil, or the value thereof, as fixed by the statute, and at the same time to preserve for the Crown all the gold and silver, if it chooses to take it, paying the value of the baser metals associated with it. The defendant has none of these baser metals of any value in the mine; he is not working the mine for the sake of them, he is working the mine in order to obtain gold, which he seeks to appropriate to himself in contravention of the rights of the Crown. The mine in question is not a copper, iron, tin, or lead mine, it has always been regarded and described as a gold mine. The defendant paid royalty to the Crown for working it. He sold it as a gold mine to a company. The company was called the Morgan Gold Mining Co.; the mine was worked for gold only; and gold only was sold. No business man would think of working it for the sake of the baser metals. They could not be won in respect of quantity, quality, or having regard to locality, so as to make them merchantable. The defendant, therefore, is not protected by these Acts. These Acts have no reference to a gold mine such as this is. It is said that the rates fixed by section 3 of the second Act are prohibitive. To a certain extent I think they are so intended, the object being that the Crown should not be induced to take the ore unless it contained sufficient gold or silver to make it worth while to pay those rates. This was for the benefit of the subject, and secured to him the produce of his mine in all cases where there was not a substantial quantity of precious metal. The appeal must be dismissed.

KAY, L.J., after referring to the Act of 5 Hen. 4, the decision in the Case of Mines, and the provisions of the two Acts of William and Mary, continued:—Section 4 of 1 W. & M. c. 30 clearly applied only to mines of copper, tin, iron, or lead. The question is whether the later statutes refer only to mines of that kind, or whether they include all mines, for whatever purpose worked, which contain gold or silver, and which also contain some copper, tin, iron, or lead. The defendant has suggested that the price of copper at the time of this legislation was only about £5 per ton, that ore containing five per cent. of pure copper would be merchantable, and that £16 per ton of such ore (the price mentioned in 5 W. & M. c. 6) would equal £320 per ton of pure copper. Thus, he says, it would not be worth the while of the Crown to take the ore at that price unless it contained in addition 5oz. of gold at least in the ton of ore. This, says the defendant, is nearly five times as much gold per ton as the present mine produces, its yield being not much more than 1oz. per ton of ore. Therefore, the defendant argues, these Acts must have included such mines as this, and, indeed, must have included all gold mines containing copper, because ore containing 5oz. of gold per ton would not only be a gold mine, but an extraordinarily rich one. He supports the argument by like calculations as to the prices of tin, iron, and lead at the date of these statutes. The argument is ingenious. It is based upon the assumption that the quartz rock extracted from this mine is ore. That quartz rock containing only 1oz. of gold per ton of the rock, and a small and unremunerative quantity of base metal, is ore within the meaning of these statutes is, to say the least of it, doubtful. At 12oz. to the pound, 1oz. is not 1-26,000th part of a ton. Moreover, the ore for which the Crown is to pay is ore "washed, made clean, and merchantable," which strengthens the construction that the ore mentioned in the statute must be ore separated from the rock. In Johnson's Dictionary, which was written about the middle of the last century (1755) "ore" is described as "metal unrefined—metal yet in its mineral state." And he quotes from Spenser, who wrote at the end of the sixteenth century, about 100 years before these statutes:—

"Round about him lay on every side
Great heaps of gold that never would be spent.
Of which some were rude ore not purified
Of Mulciber's devouring element."

If "ore" be read "metal in its crude state separated from the rock," the illustration of the defendant entirely fails. Moreover, when the defendant alleges that "ore" (that is, according to his construction, rock) containing five per cent. of copper is merchantable, he means that it is merchantable now with all the improvements of manufacture perfected in these mining days, not that it would have been merchantable at the end of the 17th century. We have no evidence in support of these calculations of the defendant, but in trying the meaning and effect of these statutes I will assume them to be accurate. The first question is the grammatical construction of these Acts, and especially the 5 W. & M. c. 6. It seems to me reasonably clear that the first Act (1 W. & M. c. 30) was only passed to encourage mining for the base metals therein particularly mentioned, and does not refer to a mine which is worked for gold, although such mine may contain a certain quantity of such base metals, or of some of them. The second statute (5 W. & M. c. 6) is expressed to be enacted for the better explanation of the former Act. Primâ facie, therefore, it can only refer to the same mines as are mentioned in that statute. No doubt in the enacting part the language is changed to any mine "in which there is copper, tin, iron, or lead." It certainly does not refer to a mine in which none of those metals are found, although such mine might contain gold or silver.

In fair grammatical construction, it appears to me that this statute only applies to mines of copper, tin, iron, or lead—that is, mines which are worked for the purpose of raising one or other of those metals, and the profit of which is mainly derived from such working. I do not think, if the defendant's figures be right, that this grammatical construction is displaced. It only comes to this—the Crown has put such a price upon the ore as makes it certain that a man may safely mine for copper, tin, iron, and lead without danger of interference, unless it contains a very large proportion of gold. It does not follow that he may work a mine for gold because there is with the gold a small quantity of copper, tin, iron, or lead. The Acts are dealing, not with gold mines, but with mines of copper, tin, iron, and lead only. What is such a mine is not determined by them, and there may, doubtless, be imagined a case where the yield is such that the value of the gold and copper per ton of ore is nearly the same, and where it would not pay to work the mines for one of these metals without the other, and it might be difficult in such a case to say whether the mine should be called a copper mine or a gold mine. Probably any court before which the question came [illegible] inclined to give the mine owner the benefit of the doubt. The case, however, with which we have to deal raises no such difficulty. The value of the base metals in this mine is quite inconsiderable. The mine is worked for nothing but gold. In the quartz rock containing the gold, and, it may be, in combination with the gold to some degree, there are lead and copper, and, perhaps, other base metals, but the mine is not worked for the purpose of recovering any of these, nor, according to the evidence, could it be profitably worked for such purpose. It is, to all intents and purposes, a gold mine, and worked as such. Such a mine is, in my opinion, a royal mine, and is not affected by any of these statutes, and, accordingly, the defendant has from the first been in the wrong. The decision of the learned judge against him was right upon this point, and the appeal must be dismissed, with costs.

Sir R. E. Webster, A.G., pointed out that the price of copper at the time when the Acts of William and Mary were passed was really £5 per cwt., and not £5 per ton, as Mr. Morgan had stated.

Mr. Morgan, while admitting the mistake, said that he had stated the price of lead correctly, which was sufficient for the purposes of his argument.

Appeal dismissed.

In re BRITANNIA FIRE ASSOCIATION. COVENTRY'S CASE. (a.)

Company — Winding up — Contributory — Contract — Shares—Allotments made without authority—Sham transaction to deceive the public—Companies Act, 1862, s. 23.

Directors of a company arranged among themselves to enter on the register as allottees of shares the names of persons handed in by the directors, in order to make it appear that a number of shares in fact unallotted had been allotted, so as to induce the public to apply for shares. In pursuance of this arrangement A., a director, sent to the company a form of application for 200 shares, purporting to be an application by A.'s son, and signed in the son's name by A., but in fact without the son's knowledge or authority. The 200 shares were accordingly registered in the son's name, but no certificates were ever issued, and no application or allotment money ever paid, nor any call ever made or dividend paid on the shares. The son never at any time ratified A.'s act, nor in any way held himself out as the holder of the shares.

The company went into liquidation, and then A., and subsequently the son, died. After the son's death the liquidator placed the names of A.'s executors on the list of contributories in respect of the 200 shares.

Held (reversing the decision of Kay, J.), that, upon the facts as above stated, no contract to take shares, either for himself or his son, had ever been entered into between A. and the company, and, therefore, that A.'s executors could not be placed on the list of contributories.

Appeal from Kay, J.

(a.) Reported by M. J. BLAKE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

On May 13, 1869, a meeting of the directors of the Britannia Fire Association was held, at which Millis Coventry, Webb, and other directors were present.

From the evidence of Webb it appeared that at that meeting the directors, not being satisfied with the number of shares then applied for, came to an arrangement among themselves, not that they should themselves take, or make themselves responsible for, the unallotted shares, but that the unallotted shares should be placed temporarily in the names of some friends of the directors until the public applied for them. In pursuance of that arrangement a resolution was passed at the same meeting that the shares set forth in the allotment book, to the number of 10,000, should be allotted to the several "applicants" whose names were scheduled to the resolution. Among the names of the so-called "applicants" was "Samuel Coventry, of Galatz," and the number of shares stated to have been applied for by, and allotted to, him, was "200." In fact, however, no application whatever for shares had then been made by "Samuel Coventry," but on May 26, 1869, an application for 200 shares, bearing the following signature, "For Samuel Coventry, Galatz, M. Coventry," was sent to the directors. This application, in fact, had been filled up, signed, and sent by Millis Coventry (who was Samuel Coventry's father), without the knowledge or authority of Samuel Coventry.

On May 27, 1869, another meeting of directors was held—Millis Coventry being present—at which the minutes of the previous meeting of May 13 were read and confirmed.

No money was ever paid nor any dividend ever received in respect of these 200 shares, nor any certificates of them ever issued. Prior to the liquidation no notice for calls or otherwise had ever been sent to Samuel Coventry.

On March 7, 1881, a resolution was passed for the voluntary winding up of the Britannia Fire Association. The "Debtors' Call-book" contained an entry to the effect that a sum of £600 was due from "Samuel Coventry" for "arrears of calls" in respect of the "200" shares, being, in fact, the whole nominal value of the shares; against Samuel Coventry's name was appended the following note:—"These shares were put into the name of the holder in order to facilitate the general allotment."

On July 4, 1881, the liquidator of the Britannia Fire Association sent a written application to Samuel Coventry at Galatz for payment of the £600, but no notice was taken of this application.

On November 11, 1882, an order was made in the winding up that no further calls be made on the contributories.

Millis Coventry died in March, 1886, and appointed Edward Coventry and another person executors of his will.

Samuel Coventry, of Galatz, died in September, 1889.

The liquidator of the Britannia Fire Association in February, 1889, put the names of Millis Coventry's executors on the list of contributories of the association, in respect of the 200 shares in question; the executors applied to have their names struck off the list, on the ground that their testator, Millis Coventry, was under no liability in respect of the shares.

Kay, J., held that Millis Coventry, by applying for the shares in the name of a person who knew nothing of the application, had rendered himself responsible as a contributory; and his lordship therefore refused to remove the names of the executors of Millis Coventry from the list.

The executors of Millis Coventry appealed.

Renshaw, Q.C., R. M. Bray, and J. W. Baines, for the appellants.—In order to render Millis Coventry's executors liable as contributories it must be shown that Millis Coventry contracted to take the shares himself either as principal or agent; but the evidence shows that the contract was, not that Millis Coventry, but that Samuel Coventry (who was an existing person) was to take the shares; and the company acted on that footing by placing the name of Samuel Coventry on the register as holder of the shares. Millis Coventry might have been liable in damages for breach of an implied warranty of authority from Samuel Coventry to take the shares for him, but that is not the nature of the remedy now sought, which depends on contract: Lewis v. Nicholson, 18 Q. B. 503; Ex parte Panmure, 32 W. R. 236, 24 Ch. D. 363; Collen v. Wright, 5 W. R. 265, 6 Ibid. 123, 7 E. & B. 301, 8 Ibid. 647; Lindley on Companies, 5th ed., p. 241. In Cox's case, 12 W. R. 92, 4 De G. J. & S. 53, and in Barrett's case, 12 W. R. 925, 4 De G. J. & S. 416, the shares were actually taken by the person who was sought to be made responsible for them, but that is not the case here. Kelner v. Baxter, 15 W. R. 278, L. R. 2 C. P. 174, is opposed to all the other authorities previously cited.

Marten, Q.C., and Beddall, for the liquidator.—The evidence shows that the transaction amounted to a contract to make a contract in the name of another. The directors, including Millis Coventry, intended that these shares should be taken by them in fictitious names, and the persons who applied for the shares in the fictitious names are themselves liable as holders: Pugh's case, L. R. 13 Eq. 566, 20 W. R. Ch. Dig. 45; Richardson's case, 23 W. R. 467, L. R. 19 Eq. 588.

LINDLEY, L.J.—This is an appeal from the decision of Kay, J., refusing to remove from the list of contributories of this company the names of the executors of Millis Coventry, who was a director of the company from the time of its formation until its voluntary winding up. He had as a co-director a Mr. Webb, who has made a deposition in this case, and whose evidence shows what was being done as regards the matter now in question.

The company was formed some time before May, 1869; and it appears that in May, 1869, the shares of the company had not been taken up to an extent which the directors thought expedient and desirable; accordingly they proceeded to consider how the issue of shares might be increased.

Mr. Webb's evidence shows what was done, and that in fact a fraud was committed by the directors. Not having succeeded in getting off the shares, and having in hand a number of unallotted shares, they wanted to make it appear as if those unallotted shares had been allotted; and, accordingly, they put several hundreds of them into the names of their private friends without any authority at all. The object of that is disclosed by the evidence—namely, to make it appear that shares which were in truth unallotted had in fact been allotted; the directors apparently thinking that the shares would be more easily disposed of by transfer. That was a gross fraud; and it seems to me that the directors who took part in it were jointly and severally responsible. Two hundred shares were allotted in the name of Samuel Coventry. The application for them was signed as for Samuel Coventry by Millis Coventry, and the address of the apparent applicant was given as "Galatz," where Samuel Coventry lived. Now Mr. Webb says, not that it was agreed that the directors should take shares, but that they should not take shares—a circumstance which distinguishes the case from Pugh's case and Cox's case. This is not a case of A. agreeing to take shares for B., but of A. committing a fraud, and not taking shares for himself or anyone else. Now, can we say that there was, upon the facts, any agreement by Millis Coventry to take shares so as to bring the case within Cox's case, and that class of cases? I cannot say that. But unless the evidence warrants us in coming to the conclusion that Millis agreed to take these shares, we cannot put him on the list. We must not strain the facts in order to find an agreement were none exists. Looking at the facts as they appear upon the evidence, we cannot say that, according to legal principles, his name, or rather the names of his representatives, should remain on the list of contributories; and, therefore, they must come off. The facts are plain, and do not justify the names being allowed to remain on. We must allow the appeal, and the order of Kay, J., must be discharged; but, having regard to the nature of the transaction, we think that the appellants ought to have no costs either here or below.

BOWEN, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. This is not a case of estoppel; it is a question of contract or no contract, and the law which governs this case is the ordinary common law as to contracts. Section 23 of the Companies Act, 1862, says that every person who has agreed to become a member of a company, and whose name is entered on the register of members, shall be deemed to be a member of the company; but we do not really require that section to tell us that the law of contract is the law we have to apply.

Now what is the position of the liquidator in this case? In order to settle the names of the executors of Millis Coventry upon the list of contributories he has to make out a contract, not between Samuel Coventry and the company, but between Millis Coventry and the company. Here Millis Coventry had no intention whatever of taking or holding the 200 shares. The truth is the intention was not that either Millis or Samuel should be a shareholder, but that Samuel's name should be put in so that he might appear to be a shareholder in order that the public might be induced to buy shares. That the Companies Act provides a remedy in such a case as this I have no doubt, and I am by no means sure—although I will not decide the point until it has been argued—that there is not some evidence here of a criminal conspiracy indictable at law; but the remedy actually adopted has, in my opinion, been misconceived. A so-called agent, who has no authority, purporting to contract, as agent on behalf of a principal, with a person who does not know that the so-called agent is dealing without authority, is answerable to that person in damages for breach of an implied warranty of authority. That is laid down by Collen v. Wright and that class of cases. That there may have been in the present case a cause of action on that ground against Millis Coventry is quite possible. I reserve the question whether it has been lost by lapse of time or otherwise. But here there was no intention to take the shares; there was no other intention than that Samuel Coventry should appear to be a shareholder. In my opinion the order should be discharged, but without costs, as a gross fraud seems to have been committed.

FRY, L.J.—I also find myself unable to come to the same conclusion as the learned judge below. The question is, whether or not a contract has been entered into by Millis Coventry with regard to the 200 shares. The evidence of Webb, his co-director, to my mind, conclusively shows that there was no such contract. Webb expressly states that the intention of the directors was that they should not take any of the unallotted shares. In my opinion, there was no real contract at all by any of the directors to take these shares; all they agreed to do was to go through a sham procedure, in order to make it apparent to the public that certain persons who had not contracted for shares had contracted for shares, and so the name of Samuel Coventry was entered on the list of shareholders. There was no real intention on the part either of Millis Coventry or of Samuel Coventry to take shares; but the public were to be induced to believe that they, or one of them, had taken shares. There was no contract with the company. A contract arises from the intention of two minds directed towards a common object, itself indicated by certain terms. Here there was no intention by either party, the company or Millis Coventry, that he should bind himself to take shares; it was a sham transaction, a fabula acta, by means of which the public were to be deceived. I agree with what has been said by the other Lords Justices as to the nature of the transaction so far as it appears before us: whether, if Samuel Coventry had been alive, he could have given some explanation, it is impossible to say. The order of the court below must be discharged; but, having regard to the nature of the transaction, there should certainly be no costs.

SHEPHERD v. BERGER. (a.)

Landlord and tenant—Lease—Proviso for re-entry upon non-payment of rent—Distress—Construction.

A lease contained a proviso for re-entry "if and whenever any one quarter's rent hereby reserved, or any part thereof, shall be in arrear for twenty-one days, and no sufficient distress can be had or levied for the same." Three quarters' rent up to the 25th of March being in arrear, the lessor, more than twenty-one days after the last quarter became due, distrained for the arrears of rent, but realized by the distress less than two quarters' rent. The lessor thereupon, on the 25th of May, brought an action to recover possession under the proviso for re-entry.

The Queen's Bench Division having held that the lessor, by distraining, had waived the forfeiture, Held by the Court of Appeal (reversing the judgment of the Queen's Bench Division), that, upon the true construction of the proviso, the right of re-entry accrued as often as a quarter's rent was in arrear for twenty-one days and no sufficient distress could be had or levied for the same; and that, as those two conditions existed at the date of the issue of the writ, a right of re-entry accrued at that date, and the plaintiff was entitled to recover.

Appeal from the Queen's Bench Division.

The action was brought in the Mayor's Court to recover possession of certain premises demised by the plaintiff to the defendant for twenty-one years from March 25, 1889, at a yearly rent of £150, payable on the usual quarter-days. The lease contained a proviso for re-entry "if and whenever any one quarter's rent hereby reserved, or any part thereof, shall be in arrear for twenty-one days, and no sufficient distress can be had or levied for the same, whether the same shall have been legally demanded or not." Three quarters' rent up to March 25, 1890, being in arrear, the plaintiff on April 25 distrained in respect thereof, but the distress realized less than two quarters' rent. The plaintiff thereupon, on May 25, brought this action to recover possession under the above proviso for re-entry. In the Mayor's Court judgment was given for the plaintiff. The Divisional Court (Day and Lawrance, JJ.) held that the plaintiff by distraining had waived the forfeiture, and entered judgment for the defendant.

The plaintiff by leave appealed.

Henn Collins, Q.C., Morton Smith, and W. H. Griffith, for the plaintiff.

H. Kisch, for the defendant.

Certain authorities were cited upon points which were argued, but which are not dealt with in the judgment. It is unnecessary to set them out.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—It is unnecessary to decide any question in this case except the true construction of the proviso for re-entry. The plaintiff had a right to distrain when the rent reserved by the lease was in arrear. The plaintiff had that right at law independently altogether of the proviso in question. There being three quarters' rent in arrear, the plaintiff put in a distress for the whole amount. There were goods upon the premises barely sufficient to satisfy two quarters' arrears of rent. The plaintiff having sold the goods distrained, appropriated the proceeds to the first two quarters' arrears of rent. The plaintiff had a perfect right so to appropriate the proceeds, and, in fact, this was the most natural thing to do. The plaintiff's act in bringing the action was conclusive to show that he had so appropriated the proceeds. If the proviso had been that if any one quarter's rent should be in arrear, and no sufficient distress for the same, the proviso might, perhaps, have referred to the time when the distress was put in, and there would have been a single cause of forfeiture on that day, and, as there was sufficient distress to satisfy the quarter's rent, the case would not come within the proviso. That, perhaps, might have been so; I do not say that it would. But the words of the proviso are "if and whenever." The word "whenever" carries the case beyond the time of putting in the distress to any later time. The moment of the appropriation of the proceeds of the distress to the first two quarters' arrears of rent, there remained one quarter in arrear. Accordingly, when the goods were sold there were no goods upon the premises to meet a distress which he might put in for the last quarter. That state of things continued until the writ in the action was issued. At that date, therefore, there was one quarter's rent in arrear, and there was no sufficient distress upon the premises. That being so, under the terms of the proviso the plaintiff had a right of re-entry, and was entitled to judgment. The appeal must, therefore, be allowed.

BOWEN, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. This case turns entirely upon the construction of the proviso for re-entry in the lease, and the fate of the case depends upon two words in that clause, "and whenever." Supposing those words were not there, and the clause ran, "if any one quarter's rent shall be in arrear for twenty-one days, and no sufficient distress," &c., it might perhaps have been contended that, as soon as the quarter's rent was in arrear for twenty-one days, and there was no sufficient distress for the same, a single cause of forfeiture arose immediately, and that it would be necessary for the lessor to show that there was no sufficient distress at that moment to satisfy the quarter's rent. That might have given rise to some difficulty, but that difficulty does not arise in the present case, as the words are "if and whenever." Those words mean if and as often as at any moment of time the two conditions named in the proviso—viz., a quarter's rent being in arrear for twenty-one days, and there being no sufficient distress—exist, a cause of forfeiture accrues. If that is the true construction of the clause, we must take the moment of time when the writ in this action was issued, and see if there was a cause of forfeiture then. At that moment a quarter's rent was in arrear, and no sufficient distress could be had or levied for the same. It is of no avail for the defendant to urge that, if the plaintiff had not distrained just previously for the rent in arrear, there would have been sufficient distress to satisfy the last quarter. The plaintiff had a right to distrain for all the rent in arrear, and he had a right to appropriate the proceeds of the distress to the first two quarters' rent. That left one quarter's rent in arrear, and as there was no sufficient distress, the proviso for re-entry applied. There was, therefore, no answer to the plaintiff's claim for possession, and the judgment of the Mayor's Court must be restored.

FRY, L.J., concurred.

Petition.

This was an application by the provost and scholars of King's College, Cambridge, for funds in court to be expended in payment for the erection of some new buildings.

Land belonging to the college had been taken by a railway company under the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, and the amount of the purchase-money had been paid into court and invested in £19,536 India 3½ per Cent. Stock. The college had entered into a contract for the erection of some additional buildings, and the petitioners desired to have the fund in court applied towards paying the cost of the buildings.

The petition asked for the stock to be sold in four instalments, as the money was required under the contract, and that the proceeds of sale might be paid to the petitioners, they undertaking to apply it towards the cost of the buildings, and also undertaking to repay the same by thirty equal annual instalments.

Under the Universities and College Estates Act, 1858 (21 & 22 Vict. c. 44), s. 27, the universities and any college therein may, with the consent of the Copyhold Commissioners, raise money by mortgage of any land belonging to the college for any term of years, for, among other purposes, the erection of new or additional buildings, and section 28 provides for the repayment of the borrowed money by thirty equal annual instalments.

By the Amendment Act, 1880 (43 & 44 Vict. c. 46), s. 2 (1), the purchase-money of land sold by a college under the above Act shall, with the consent of the Copyhold Commissioners, be applicable in repayment of borrowed money; (2) and the like provisions shall be made by the college for replacing the same as is by section 28 of above Act required. And section 4 extends the provisions of this Act to proceeds of sale of college lands under any other Act of Parliament standing to the credit of any cause or matter in the High Court.

By section 48 of the Settled Land Act, 1882, the Land Commissioners for England are substituted for the Copyhold Commissioners, and by section 2, sub-section 1 (b), of the Board of Agriculture Act, 1889, the powers and duties of the Land Commissioners for England were transferred to the board.

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., and Gaselee, for the petitioners.—The preliminary question is whether it is necessary that the consent of the Board of Agriculture should be obtained to the proposed application of this fund. We submit it is not required, as the fund is in court, and not under the control of the board: Universities and College Estates Act, 1858, s. 27, and the Amendment Act, 1880, ss. 2, 4. The proposed application of the money might have been treated as a permanent investment under section 69 of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, and for that the consent of the board would not have been required.

Hornell, for the railway company.

NORTH, J.—I cannot hold the consent of the Board of Agriculture is not required, as to do so would be to read section 4 of the Amendment Act of 1880 as if it provided that the provisions of the Act should apply except so far as they necessitate the consent of the Copyhold Commissioners being obtained. I do not feel at liberty so to read it, and I think the consent of the board must be obtained.

STONE v. LICKORISH & BELLORD. (a.)

Costs—Taxation—Solicitor-mortgagee acting in person—Redemption action—Profit costs.

A mortgagee-solicitor who acts for himself in a redemption action is only entitled to costs out of pocket, not to profit costs—i.e., remuneration for personal trouble.

An objection to the allowance of such costs need not necessarily be taken at the hearing of the action.

Price v. M'Beth, 12 W. R. 818, not followed.

Adjourned summons.

This was an application by the plaintiff, E. B. Stone, to have disallowed certain costs, amounting to about £40, of the defendants, Messrs. Lickorish & Bellord, solicitors, on the ground that they, as mortgagees acting in person, were not entitled to profit costs.

The defendants had acted as solicitors for one J. G. Smith, who had by two deeds, dated the 21st of June and the 16th of July, 1888, respectively, in consideration of advances made and to be made by them to him or on his behalf, executed a charge in their favour upon two policies of assurance on his life in the Eagle Assurance Co. Smith was subsequently adjudicated bankrupt, and the present plaintiff, who was the assignee from H. W. Johnson, the trustee in the bankruptcy, under a deed dated the 12th of November, 1888, commenced the present action for redemption of the security. Under the ordinary judgment in the action, dated the 21st of February, 1889, an account of principal, interest, and costs had been directed, and the costs to be taxed, and there now remained a question as to the costs of the action, the subject of the present application. Upon taxation the plaintiff objected to the allowance of all the items in the defendants' bill of costs in the action except such as were for out-of-pocket expenses, on the ground that the defendants were mortgagees and acted as their own solicitors in the action, and as such were not entitled to profit costs. The taxing master allowed these costs, and the plaintiff took out a summons, dated the 25th of November, 1890, asking that the objections might be allowed and the matter referred back to the taxing master to vary his certificate accordingly.

The taxing master, in his reasons for disallowing the objections, referred to London Scottish Benefit Society v. Chorley, 32 W. R. 523, 781, 12 Q. B. D. 452, 13 Ibid. 872, and National Provincial Bank v. Games, 34 W. R. 601, 31 Ch. D. 582, and stated: "I consider this case comes within the above decisions, being costs of the litigation. I consider this case is also distinguishable from In re Roberts, 38 W. R. 225, 43 Ch. D. 52, and In re Wallis, Ex parte Lickorish & Bellord, 38 W. R. 482, 25 Q. B. D. 176, and I have so dealt with the bill by allowing the costs of litigation pure and simple to the mortgagees."

C. Macnaghten, for the plaintiff, in support of the summons.

Maidlow, for the defendants.—I raise the preliminary objection that the question is too late, and ought to have been raised at the hearing: Price v. M'Beth, 12 W. R. 818.

Macnaghten.—Price v. M'Beth is inconsistent with the present practice. The taxing master may go behind the order for taxation and look at the real position of the parties: Cradock v. Piper, 1 Mac. & G. 664; York v. Brown, 1 Coll. 260. These were cases of solicitor-trustees, but the principle is the same in the case of solicitor-mortgagees. I ask your lordship to inquire into the present practice.

Maidlow.—In In re Wallis, Ex parte Lickorish, I argued that Sclater v. Cottam, 5 W. R. 744, had been overruled inferentially by London Scottish Benefit Society v. Chorley, but the Court of Appeal declined to hear any argument as to a case being overruled inferentially or impliedly. [STIRLING, J.—The point seems to be whether Price v. M'Beth has been acted upon; it is hardly consistent with Sclater v. Cotham.] The principle I support was carried out in In re Donaldson, 27 Ch. D. 544, 33 W. R. Dig. 61, where one of some solicitor-mortgagees who were trustees was allowed his profit costs.

Macnaghten.—Chorley's case was not a mortgagee's action, it is distinguishable. There may not be any actual decision on the point now in question, but the principle of In re Wallis governs this case; it accordingly decides that the defendants are entitled in the present case to out-of-pocket costs only.

Maidlow.—In Sclater v. Cottam no objection was taken to a solicitor having his costs of the redemption action. In In re Wallis we were met with Sclater v. Cotham only when we came to item 3.

STIRLING, J.—I will make inquiries of the taxing masters as to the existing practice.

Cur. adv. vult.

Jan. 31.—STIRLING, J.—This is a redemption action in which the defendants appear themselves, being solicitors, and the usual judgment was given directing an account to be taken of principal, interest, and costs to be taxed by the taxing master. The taxation has accordingly taken place, and upon that taxation the taxing master allowed the solicitors profit costs. Thereupon objections were carried in to that taxation, and were overruled by the taxing master, and thereupon a summons was taken out by the plaintiff, the mortgagor, to review the master's decision. When the matter was argued in court the first objection taken was that it came too late: that, according to the decision of Stuart, V.C., in Price v. M'Beth, the objection should have been taken at the hearing.

Now in the report in the WEEKLY REPORTER, and also in Morgan and Davey's Treatise on Costs, there is a reference made by the learned reporter and by the learned authors respectively that that decision is inconsistent with Cradock v. Piper, where it was established by Lord Cottenham that where trustees had obtained an order for the taxation of costs in the usual form, and those trustees were solicitors appearing by themselves, it was open to the taxing master, although that objection was being taken before him, to go into the question whether they ought to be allowed profit costs or not, and that rule was laid down on the ground that there was a long continued practice of the office to that effect. The Vice-Chancellor in the case of Price v. M'Beth does not seem to have thought fit to make any inquiry as to what the practice in taxing the costs was; and observing that the decision in Price v. M'Beth had been questioned in the way I have mentioned, both in the report, and in Morgan and Davey's treatise, I thought it right that I should inquire what the practice of the taxing masters with reference to this matter was, and I have received from the senior taxing master a certificate in this form: "That the practice of the taxing master with regard to the question of law costs to a solicitor-mortgagee in an action of redemption is to entertain an objection, and not to refuse to entertain it because it has not been taken at the hearing of the action." It appears, therefore, that the decision in Price v. M'Beth does not state what the practice in the taxing office actually has been, and seeing that it is inconsistent with Cradock v. Piper I think that I am bound to consider the validity of the objection, and not to set it aside because it was not taken at the hearing. The certificate goes on in these words: "I am desired to add that upon the question whether a solicitor-mortgagee is entitled to profit costs in such an action, the taxing masters differ in opinion"; and upon that I thought it right to inquire more particularly to what extent they differ, and the result of my inquiry is this, that previous to the recent decision in In re Wallis six of the seven taxing masters, and their immediate predecessors, so far as they were aware, always allowed profit costs, but that the seventh taxing master, who had held office since 1879, has uniformly disallowed them. Since the decision in In re Wallis the result has been a further division of opinion, and that three of the six who had previously allowed those costs now disallowed them, while the remaining three adhere to their old practice. Under these circumstances I think it cannot be considered that there is any established practice in the ing masters' office in reference to the allowance or allowance of these costs, and that the matter must decided on principle.

Now upon the principle to be applied I have the idance of decisions which, though they do not vern the exact points before me, nevertheless proach very near them. In the case of In re llis Fry, L.J., divided the costs to which a mortgee was entitled into three heads—(1) the proper ts, charges, and expenses incurred by the mortgee in relation to the mortgage debt or mortgage urity; (2) the costs of litigation properly undertaken the mortgagee in reference to the security; and (3) mortgagee's costs of the redemption action. w, as regards the first two classes the decisions conclusive; as regards the costs of litigation perly undertaken by the mortgagee in reference to the security, the case is governed by the ision in Sclater v. Cottam, where Kindersley, C., held that the solicitor was only entitled to ts out of pocket, the principle being this: he s entitled to what he had disbursed, but not that which is remuneration for his personal uble. After that decision came the case of London ttish Benefit Society v. Chorley, where an action s brought against a firm of solicitors who were t mortgagees, it was simply an action for money d and received. It was defended by the solicitors nselves, and the action was dismissed with costs; d then the question arose what costs were to be ven to the solicitors, and it was held by the Court Appeal that they were entitled to profit costs, ough not the same profit costs as if they had peared by different solicitors. In that state of the thorities there came the case of In re Wallis, and ere the question was not as to costs of litigation, t as to charges and expenses claimed by the mortgee-solicitors in relation to the mortgage debt. was there held that the mortgagee-solicitors uld only have costs out of pocket. I shall read a w words of the decisions of each of the judges by hom the case was decided. Lord Esher says, "I ink it is consistent with every principle of justice at a man should not be entitled to charge for costs d expenses when he has not incurred any." Fry, J., says, "So far as I am aware no case is to be und in which a mortgagee has been allowed to arge against the mortgagor, as part of his costs, arges, and expenses properly incurred, remuneraon for work done or labour undertaken by himself rsonally. On the contrary, the court has often id, 'Though you may recover as part of your costs, arges, and expenses, payments which you have ade for work done in relation to the mortgage bt or the mortgage security, yet, if you choose to do e work yourself, you cannot charge for it.'" opes, L.J., says, "What are the ordinary terms of demption of a mortgage? Those terms are, the ment by the mortgagor of principal, interest, and s, that is 'costs' in the ordinary sense of the word, not remuneration for services rendered by the rtgagee himself."

he principle, therefore, which seems to me to run ough all these cases is this, that the mortgagee-citor is entitled to costs or expenses which he has urred, but not to remuneration for personal trouble. ciding the case on principle, it seems to me that must apply it in this case, and hold that the icitor-mortgagee is only entitled to out-of-pocket penses which he has incurred, and not to remuneran for personal trouble. I think, therefore, that e objection to the decision of the taxing master st prevail, and that the bill of costs must be sent k to him to reconsider his decision.

I have only further to deal with the costs of this application. This is a mortgagor's action for redemption; by the contract the mortgagee is entitled to costs, charges, and expenses properly incurred, and it has been repeatedly held by the Court of Appeal that a mortgagee does not lose his right to costs by bringing before the court a question as to the amount due to him in respect of principal, interest, or costs, even although he be unsuccessful in his contention. It seems to me that, having regard to the difference of opinion which has prevailed in the taxing office, that this is eminently a case to which I ought to apply this principle, and I therefore make the costs of this application costs in the action.

Practice—Solicitor—Bill of costs—Taxation—District registry—Power of district registrar of Liverpool to entertain a petition of course for delivery of a bill of costs—Removal to London—Judicature Act, 1873 (36 & 37 Vict. c. 66), s. 62—R. S. C., 1883, ord. 35, rr. 6, 6a sub-rule 2, 16; ord. 62, r. 18.

A district registrar at Liverpool has power, on a petition of course, to make an order on a solicitor for delivery and taxation of his bill of costs.

The clients carried on business at Liverpool, the solicitor resided and practised in Sheffield, and the work had been done in London and Sheffield.

Held, that, on the balance of convenience, the taxation ought not to be removed to London.

Motion.

The question in dispute was whether a district registrar at Liverpool had power, on a petition of course, to make an order on a solicitor for delivery and taxation of his bill of costs.

The solicitor, Mr. David Hunton Porrett, resided and had his office at Sheffield, and he had been employed by the Animal Products Co. (Limited), whose registered office was situated at 24, Benson-street, Liverpool, to collect debts due to the company. In that capacity he had done work for them in London and Sheffield, but he had not delivered any bill of costs for his services. He had agents in London but not in Liverpool.

The company presented a petition of course in the Liverpool District Registry, and on the 3rd of February, 1891, one of the district registrars made an order (which was served on the 10th) directing Porrett to deliver to the company within fourteen days a bill of costs of all matters of business in which he had been employed as their solicitor, and referring it to one of the district registrars at Liverpool to tax and settle the said bill.

The solicitor now moved to discharge this order.

Bardswell, for the motion.—The district registrar had no power to make an order of course. The power to entertain petitions of course is by ord. 62, r. 18, transferred to the registrars of the High Court; and ord. 35, rr. 6 and 6*a*, sub-rule 2, do not extend this power to district registrars; rule 6*a*, sub-rule 2, only refers to petitions which require to be answered. Even if they did, the registrar ought to have referred the matter to your lordship according to the directions given by your lordship to the district registrars of Liverpool and Manchester: Ann. Pr., 1890-91, p. 605. The order ought to have been drawn up, passed, and entered by the registrars of the High Court. If this practice is to prevail, solicitors may be brought to Liverpool from all parts of England and great inconvenience will result. In the alternative we ask for an order to remove the matter to London under ord. 35, r. 16, so that our agents may attend to it.

Warmington, Q.C., and P. O. Lawrence, for the company, were not called upon.

KEKEWICH, J.—I cannot disturb this order. The first point depends upon the alteration made by ord. 35, r. 6*a*, sub-rule 2, to which I will presently refer, in ord. 62, r. 18. The order here made was made upon a petition of course—that is to say, a petition which required no answering, and which required no service, that is, it had no respondent in the sense of there being a person on whom the petition had to be served, or who could appear to oppose the petition, and the order was made without the appearance of any respondent. These orders were formerly made on petition of course at the rolls. They have now been transferred to the office of the registrars of the Chancery Division, and the second branch of rule 18 of order 62 deals with that point; the first branch dealing only with petitions which require to be answered. The second part of the rule says that any orders on petitions which, according to the practice formerly prevailing in the Chancery Division, were drawn up, passed, and entered in the office of the secretaries of the Master of the Rolls, shall be drawn up, passed, and entered by or under the direction of the registrars of the Chancery Division. Therefore, an order made on such petitions is a registrar's order, and is not one of the orders that can be made by a chief clerk. An alteration has been made with regard to petitions in proceedings issued out of the Liverpool and Manchester district registries, and with regard to such petitions requiring to be answered, the district registrar has been substituted for the registrars of the Chancery Division; so that such petitions, when presented in the Liverpool and Manchester district registries may be answered at once, instead of being sent up to London to be answered and then remitted to be served.

But ord. 35, r. 6*a*, sub-rule 2, does not deal in any way with orders on petitions not requiring to be answered—that is to say, the petitions dealt with by the second branch of rule 18 of order 62—for it says that "where a cause or matter hereafter commenced in the Chancery Division is proceeding in the district registry of Liverpool, or in the district registry of Manchester, the district registrar shall act in respect thereof, and throughout all the proceedings therein, as a chief clerk of the judge of the Chancery Division to whom the cause or matter is assigned." I need not discuss whether, under that rule, the district registrar could have made an order in the same way as a chief clerk, because the rule goes on to say that he is to act not only as chief clerk, but also as registrar and taxing master, "according to directions to be given from time to time by such judge." Therefore, it is clear that when once you have a cause or matter commenced in the Liverpool District Registry thereupon the district registrar becomes empowered to act as a registrar of the Chancery Division, and comes distinctly within the second branch of rule 18 of order 62, and can make an order which formerly was made by the secretaries of the Master of the Rolls. But Mr. Bardswell pointed out that, however that might be, it is not usual for the district registrar to make such an order as this, and that he ought not to have made it, and that in that sense the order i irregular.

The directions given by me to the district regis trars, though they have not the force of rules, a intended to lay down what is and what is not withi their cognizance, and I am glad to find that they a known to the profession, for it is convenient for the to be informed as to what my officers have directio to do. One of these directions, as stated in th Annual Practice, 1890-1, p. 605, is this:—

"Delivery and Taxation of Costs.—On an applic tion against a solicitor for delivery and taxation of bill of costs and delivery up of deeds, the distri registrar shall hear the application, complete th evidence, and then refer it to the judge."

Upon that it is said that the district registrar ough not to have made this order. Whether I had petitio of course in my mind when I drew up that direction cannot say, but the language of it is distinctly agai Mr. Bardswell's contention. In the first place, t registrar is to "complete the evidence." Now, up a petition of course there is no evidence, and the fore the words "complete the evidence" cannot ha any connection with a petition of course. Th again, the words "delivery and taxation of a bill costs" are mentioned and connected by the copu tive "and," with the words "delivery up of deed which latter words are inconsistent with a petition course. Again, the registrar is directed to hear application; but there is no hearing of a petition course. All that the district registrar can do un that direction is to see that the application is proper form, and that the order goes in a proper fo The whole language, in my opinion, points to so thing where there is not only a discretion, but wh something can be said on both sides. I cannot th that can prevent the district registrar from making order on a petition of course when the judge can nothing himself but say, "Common order," and t the registrar must send the petition up to Lond and so cause useless expense.

Accordingly it appears to me on all these grou that this motion fails upon the question of irre larity, and must be refused.

The other point raised is that this taxation ough have been removed to London. I am always aver referring to my own language in other cases, ex where by so doing I can avoid saying the same th over again, and it is only for that reason that I r to the case of Neath and Bristol Steamship Co., 58 L N. S. 180, 36 W. R. Dig. 42, which is mentioned in Annual Practice (p. 610), and where I endeavoure lay down the rule that there are two classes of c in which the power of transfer, of causes or ma pending in the Liverpool and Manchester dis registries, should be exercised—first, when the c considers that parties have improperly commen proceedings in such registries in order, under altered practice, to advance their litigation; secondly, when the balance of convenience is favour of transferring the case to London.

Now, with regard to the first of these two cl of cases, I have here a petition for taxation by a c pany whose domicile—or at any rate, its place of b ness—is in Liverpool. There is no reason to supp and it is not suggested, that the petition was prese to the Liverpool District Registry in order to ob any unfair advantage. It is true that the compa debtor—or, rather, the gentleman whose bill of c they require to see—lives in Sheffield. It may said that they might have sued him, and that in ordinary course they would sue him, in Sheffield; on the other hand, this is not an ordinary case of su a person for debt. He is their creditor. With any special circumstances to convince me to the c ary, I do not think that this case comes within the rst class of cases to which I have referred.

Upon the question whether it falls within the other lass of cases there is a little more difficulty. It is said hat it would be more convenient if the taxation were o take place in London. A solicitor living in Sheffield ight or might not go to London more easily than to iverpool. Mr. Porrett has agents in London as all ountry solicitors have. I gather, however, that he ould attend the taxation himself, and that he would ot employ his London agents except as a matter of rm. Therefore I do not think there is very much in e London agency argument. I am not convinced at it is more difficult to get from Sheffield to Liverol than from Sheffield to London; on the other hand, e company's books are in Liverpool, and are, I suppse, constantly required for the purposes of their siness. Consequently it would not be of much nvenience to them to have the taxation proceeded ith in London. Therefore I do not think I ought to sturb this order on the ground of the balance of nvenience.

I therefore refuse this motion, with costs, and Mr. rrett must deliver his bill on or before the 3rd of arch.

BOYDELL v. MILLAR. (a.) ts—County courts—Action of contract begun in High Court and afterwards remitted to county court—Judgment for less than £50—Change of solicitors—Right of solicitor who had acted in High Court to High Court costs against client—County Courts Act, 1888, s. 118.

An action for some £30 for work done was commenced the High Court, and was afterwards remitted to a unty court, where judgment was given for the plaintiff £30 and costs. Before the order to remit was made plaintiff changed his solicitor, and the solicitor who acted for him in the High Court ceased to act for him the action. The registrar of the county court taxed costs of the proceedings in the county court on the unty court scale, but he refused to tax the costs of solicitor who had acted for the plaintiff in the gh Court on the High Court scale. In an action ught in a county court by this solicitor to recover from client the costs incurred by him in the High Court on High Court scale,

Held, that the solicitor was entitled to recover these ts from his client, as such costs did not come within ction 118 of the County Courts Act, 1888, not being ts for work done in any county court.

Appeal by plaintiff from Clerkenwell County Court.

The plaintiff, who is a solicitor, brought an action ainst a former client in the Clerkenwell County urt to recover a bill of costs, amounting to £16 12s. 2d.

The present plaintiff had acted as the defendant's licitor in a claim for some £35 for work done, which e defendant had against a Mr. McIver. As it was pposed that the claim would not be disputed, and at judgment might be obtained under order 14 if e action were brought in the High Court, the action Millar v. McIver was brought in the High Court.

McIver did not appear and judgment was signed for default of appearance, but afterwards, on the application of McIver, this judgment was set aside and McIver was allowed to come in and defend on paying the amount of the claim into court, and it was a part of the order that the costs occasioned by the setting this judgment aside should be the plaintiff's costs in any event. After this order an application was made by McIver to have the action remitted to a county court; this application was adjourned, and during this adjournment the present defendant, Millar, changed his solicitor, the present plaintiff, and the present plaintiff ceased to act for Millar in the action, and did not, in fact, act for him in the county court. After this change of solicitors the action was remitted, under section 65 of the County Courts Act, 1888, to Brompton County Court, where it was tried, and where judgment was given for the then plaintiff, Millar, for £30, and costs.

On the taxation of the costs by the registrar of the Brompton County Court, the registrar taxed the costs of the proceedings in the county court on the county court scale at £6, and that sum was paid over by McIver to Millar in respect of the costs of the action. At this taxation the present plaintiff was represented, and a request was made on his behalf that his costs which he had incurred in the High Court before he ceased to act as solicitor in the case should be taxed and allowed to him as against his former client on the High Court scale. The registrar refused to tax or allow these costs, and it was alleged by the present plaintiff that if these costs had been taxed on the High Court scale, as between himself and his client, they would have amounted to £16 12s. 2d., the amount for which the present action is brought.

The present plaintiff then brought this action in the Clerkenwell County Court to recover these costs from his former client; the whole of the costs now sued for were incurred in the High Court.

The county court judge was of opinion that these costs came within section 118 of the County Courts Act, 1888, and that, not having been allowed on taxation by the registrar, they could not be recovered. He accordingly nonsuited the plaintiff, but gave leave to appeal.

The plaintiff appealed.

R. M. Bray, for the plaintiff.—The rule in the High Court which provides that if less than £50 is recovered only county court costs are allowed, applies only to costs between party and party, and does not prevent a solicitor recovering High Court costs as against his own client. The scales of costs in use in the county court apply to costs incurred in the county court only, and do not touch costs in the High Court, and the scales of costs referred to in section 118 affect only costs incurred in the county court, and do not affect costs incurred in the High Court. If there had been no transfer to the county court, then, although High Court costs may not have been recoverable as between party and party without an order of a judge, such costs as between solicitor and client would have been recoverable from the client. There may be a different scale of costs recoverable as between solicitor and client from what would be recoverable as between party and party: In re Langlois & Biden, ante, p. 181, 1891, 1 Q. B. 349. Here the plaintiff has done work in the High Court; there is no scale in the county court applicable, and section 118 does not affect the right to recover these costs, as that section refers only to costs incurred in the county court.

S. Lynch, for the defendant.—Ord. 50, r. 7, of the County Court Rules, 1889, deals with the taxation of costs by the registrar in a case where the action has been transmitted to a county court. That rule provides that in taxing the costs incurred in the High

(a.) Reported by Sir SHERSTON BAKER, Barrister-at-Law.

Court, the registrar shall tax according to the scales in use in the High Court, except where the plaintiff, in an action founded on contract, recovers less than £50. The plaintiff in that action did recover less than £50, and there was no order of a judge to allow High Court costs, so that there was no power to tax the costs incurred in the High Court at all. Costs between solicitor and client may also be taxed by the registrar, and he is the only proper officer to tax them. The case comes within section 118, and as these costs were not allowed by the registrar, they cannot be recovered. Ord. 50, r. 7, applies to all taxations, to taxations between solicitor and client as well as between party and party.

Bray replied. Cur. adv. vult.

Feb. 16.—CAVE, J., read the following judgment:—This is an action in the county court by the plaintiff, who is a solicitor, to recover a bill amounting to £16 against the defendant. At the trial the retainer was admitted, but it was alleged that the costs came within section 118 of the County Courts Act, 1888, and not having been allowed on taxation, as therein provided, could not be recovered from the client. The learned judge was of this opinion and nonsuited the plaintiff.

The action in respect of which these costs were claimed was commenced and certain proceedings were taken in the High Court, but after a time an order was obtained remitting the action for trial to the county court of Brompton. After the order was obtained the plaintiff ceased to act for the defendant and never in fact acted as his solicitor in the county court. Under these circumstances it seems to me to be unnecessary to consider what the plaintiff's position would have been if he had gone on with the action in the county court. He did not do so, and, therefore, I think it is impossible to bring the case within section 118, as none of the plaintiff's charges are for work done in any county court. What, then, was the judge to do? If the defendant had applied to him for an adjournment to enable him to get an order of this court referring the bill to a master for taxation, the judge might very reasonably have adjourned the trial to enable this to be done. If the defendant did not desire this, the learned judge was, it seems to me, bound to try the case himself, and decide upon the reasonableness and propriety of the charges. The case must go back to be tried by the county court judge, unless the defendant desires to have the usual reference to a master to tax, and the defendant must pay the costs of the appeal, and such of the costs below as may have been thrown away.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J., concurred in the above judgment.

Appeal allowed. Order that the case should go back to the judge for a new trial.

Shipping—Limitation of liability—Practice—Calculation of amount of plaintiffs' liability in the case of steamships measured for purpose of registry since December 31, 1889—Merchant Shipping (Tonnage) Act, 1889 (52 & 53 Vict. c. 43), s. 3.

In a case where the owners of a British steamship, built since March, 1889, and measured for the purpose of registry since December 31 in that year, sought to limit their liability under the Merchant Shipping Acts for the consequences of improper navigation, the court it appearing on the certificate of registry that the gross tonnage of the steamship was stated to be 1,922·82 tons, refused, no other evidence as to the gross tonnage of the steamship having been given, to allow the plaintiffs, in calculating the amount of the tonnage of their ship for the purpose of the suit, to deduct from such 1,922·82 tons any of the deductions ordered to be made from the measurement of tonnage by the 3rd section of the Merchant Shipping (Tonnage) Act, 1889, or any other deductions other than certain deductions which the defendants admitted ought to be made from such amount of 1,922·82 tons.

This was an action of limitation of liability instituted by the owners of the British steamship Umbilo for the purpose of limiting their liability under the Merchant Shipping Acts for the consequence of a collision between The Umbilo and the barque Ethel.

On behalf of the plaintiffs an affidavit was brought in from which, and from a copy of the register of The Umbilo annexed as an exhibit to such affidavit, it appeared that The Umbilo was a British steamship built in 1890, and registered on the 1st of March in that year, and that the particulars of tonnage stated on her register were as follows:—

The action now came on to be heard before the President (the Right Hon. Sir James Hannen).

Lauristen Batten, for the plaintiffs, contended that the "gross tonnage of The Umbilo, without deduction on account of engine room," on which the plaintiffs' liability was limited under the Merchant Shipping Acts, was not the "gross tonnage" stated on the certificate of registry for the convenience of

Cur. adv. vult.

Dec. 18.—HANNEN, P.—This is a suit by the wners of the screw steamship Umbilo for the limitaion of their liability in respect of the damage caused the defendants' barque Ethel by a collision etween that vessel and The Umbilo without the ctual fault or privity of the plaintiffs.

The question in the case is, what deduction should e made from the gross tonnage of The Umbilo in comuting the amount to which the plaintiffs' liability hould be limited? By the Merchant Shipping Act mendment Act, 1862, s. 54, it is enacted that the stimated tonnage is to be "in the case of steamships he gross tonnage without deductions on account of ngine room." It was not disputed that the plaintiffs ere entitled, in computing the gross tonnage of their essel, to deduct the space appointed for the berthing f the crew, but the plaintiffs further contended that hey are entitled to certain other deductions under the Merchant Shipping (Tonnage) Act, 1889 (52 & 53 Vict. c. 43). By the 3rd section of that Act it is nacted that "in measuring or remeasuring a ship or the purpose of ascertaining her register tonnage, he following deductions shall be made from the paces included in the measurement of the tonnage . . (1) Any space used exclusively for the ccommodation of the master. (2) Any space used xclusively for the working of the helm and the nchor gear, or for keeping charts, signals, and other nstruments of navigation, and boatswain's stores. 3) The space occupied by the donkey engines and oiler, if connected with the main pumps of the ship." For the defence it was argued that this enactment did ot apply to the computation of the "gross tonnage," pon which the liability of the owner is based, and it ppears to me that this argument is well founded. y the 1st section of the Act of 1889 it is enacted hat "in the measurement of a ship for the purpose of ascertaining her registered tonnage no deduction shall be allowed for any space which has not been first included in the measurement of her tonnage." That is, in her gross tonnage. But, as I have already pointed out, that gross tonnage affords the measure of the shipowners' liability. The deductions claimed by the plaintiffs must, therefore, be reduced by 14·78 tons.

* In support of this argument it is not immaterial o notice that the term "gross tonnage" does not ccur in the statutory form of certificate of registry ontained in the first schedule to the Merchant hipping Act, 1854; that the present form of certifiate of registry is a later form issued by the Comissioners of Customs and consented to by the Board f Trade under section 96 of the Act of 1854, and hat the tonnage on which the liability of steamships nder the Merchant Shipping Acts is to be calculated as been the subject of a decision of the Court of ession in Burrell v. Simpson, 4 Sess. Cas., 4th series, 177, whilst by the effect of sections 21 and 26 of he Act of 1854, and sections 3 and 7 of the Merchant hipping (Tonnage) Act, 1889, the tonnage of any ship neasured for the purpose of registry under those Acts s, except so far as the Merchant Shipping Act, 1867, has introduced a modification, to be deemed the "tonnage" of such ship.

In re SOLTYKOFF. (a.)

Bankruptcy petition—Infant sued on bill of exchange—Necessaries supplied—Indorsee of bill as petitioner—Non-liability of infant—Infants' Relief Act, 1874 (37 & 38 Vict. c. 62)—Bills of Exchange Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 61), s. 22.

The indorsee of a bill of exchange cannot sue or present a petition in bankruptcy against a person upon his acceptance, whilst an infant, of the bill, even though the original consideration for the bill were the supply of necessaries to the infant.

Appeal from the dismissal, by Mr. Registrar Linklater, of a petition in bankruptcy.

The petitioning creditor, Margrett, was the indorsee of four bills of exchange, amounting in all to £2,000, accepted by Soltykoff when an infant in consideration of goods, alleged to have been necessaries, supplied to him by the indorser of the bills. The petitioner had sued and obtained judgment upon the said bills as indorsee, and not upon the original contract.

The registrar dismissed the petition, on the ground of the infancy of Soltykoff at the time of the making of the bills.

Against this order the petitioner now appealed.

Bigham, Q.C., and Kisch, for the appellant.—Though the cases admittedly appear against the appellant's contention that an infant will be made liable to the indorsee of a bill of exchange, provided the consideration originally given for the bill had been necessaries supplied, they were all decisions at Nisi Prius, and should be overruled.

They cited Trueman v. Hurst, 1 T. R. 40; Williamson v. Watts, 1 Camp. 552; Barnes & Co. v. Toye, 13 Q. B. D. 410, 32 W. R. Dig. 97; Stevens v. Jackson, 4 Camp. 164; Bateman v. Kingston, 6 L. R. Ir. 328, 28 W. R. Dig. 107.

Finlay, Q.C., and Herbert Reed, for the respondent, were not called upon.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—In this case the creditor presented a petition in bankruptcy upon a debt contracted upon certain bills of exchange between the indorser of the bills and the acceptor, the person against whom the petition has been here presented. At the time of such acceptance this person was an infant. The registrar held that, that being so, he could not be made amenable to the petitioner. What was the relation between the parties? Assume that the original consideration for the bills of exchange had been necessaries supplied to the acceptor as an infant, the petitioning creditor did not supply these, nor does he sue on that contract; he sues as indorsee on a bill of exchange, in accordance with the custom of merchants. It is immaterial whether the drawer of the bill had any consideration for it or not. The relation between the parties is simply that of indorsee and acceptor of the bill of exchange.

It has been held for a long time, and through a long series of cases, that an infant cannot make himself liable upon negotiable instruments such as bills of exchange and promissory notes. It is argued that the decisions cited are not binding upon us as having been decided at Nisi Prius. Perhaps that is so; but it would nevertheless be wrong of us, even if we desired to do so, to overrule such well-established case law.

I approve of those decisions, and I go further and say that even if an infant be sued in consideration of necessaries supplied upon a bill of exchange or promissory note as such, both the cases and the principle of law show that the infant could not bind himself by such a contract. I mean that if, having supplied necessaries to an infant, the contractor sued and relied upon a bill of exchange or promissory note and offered no other evidence of the contract, the infant could not be made liable on such instruments, either to the party who supplied the necessaries or to anyone else holding the instruments.

The cases and principle of law there laid down are further supported by the Infants' Relief Act, 1874, which necessarily implies that infants are not liable upon such instruments. The Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, is to the same effect. This appeal must be dismissed.

BOWEN, L.J.—I am entirely of the same opinion, and upon the same principle, which may be summarized as follows. The contract here is not a contract upon the original consideration—that is to say, it is not a contract in itself for necessaries to be supplied to the infant. But the Infants' Relief Act, 1874, and the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, s. 22, confirm by implication the law laid down in the long series of cases.

LOPES, L.J.—I agree. The petitioning creditor was the indorsee of these bills, and sued as such. The question of "necessaries" does not arise at all. I go further and say that, even if there were originally a contract for necessaries between the parties, the infant would not be liable upon a bill of exchange or promissory note. The person who supplied the necessaries would have his other remedy, such as by action for goods sold and delivered. All the authorities, as well as the recent Acts alluded to, bear out this contention.

Appeal dismissed.

Landlord and tenant—Breach of covenant not to underlet—Proviso for re-entry—Relief against forfeiture—Negligence.

In a lease the lessees covenanted not to underlet the premises or any part thereof without the consent in writing of the lessor, such consent not to be arbitrarily withheld in the case of a respectable and responsible person, and there was a proviso for re-entry in case the lessees did not observe and perform the covenants. The lessees underlet part of the premises without the consent of the lessor under these circumstances: The defendants left the matter in the hands of their solicitor, who had the custody of the original lease. Owing to the negligence of the solicitor and his managing clerk in not examining the original lease, the necessity of obtaining the lessor's consent escaped their attention. It was admitted that the sub-tenants were respectable and responsible persons, and that no injury had been occasioned to the lessor by the omission to ask his consent. Appeal from the judgment of Day, J., in favour of the plaintiff, at the trial of the action without a jury.

The action was to recover possession of certain premises under a proviso for re-entry, upon breach of covenant in a lease. The facts are fully set out in the judgment of Kay, L.J. It is sufficient to state them here shortly as follows:—The plaintiff demised a warehouse to the defendants for a term of years. The lease contained a covenant by the defendants not to assign, underlet, or part with the possession of the premises or any part thereof without the licence and consent in writing of the plaintiff for that purpose first had and obtained, which consent the plaintiff agreed should not be arbitrarily withheld in the case of a respectable and responsible person; and there was a proviso for re-entry in case the defendants did not well and truly observe and perform the covenants. The defendants underlet part of the premises to a tenant, and for this purpose obtained the consent in writing of the plaintiff. Subsequently the defendants underlet another portion of the premises to another tenant, and the defendants' solicitor, to whom the carrying out of the underlease was left, omitted to get the consent of the plaintiff, having forgotten that such consent was necessary. The plaintiff then brought this action to recover possession. It was admitted that the sub-tenant was a respectable and responsible person. It appeared that the plaintiff, upon being applied to for his consent after the execution of the underlease, and after the omission had been discovered, refused to give his consent.

Day, J., held that there had been a breach of covenant entitling the plaintiff to re-enter, and that the defendants had not brought themselves within any ground upon which equity would grant relief from the forfeiture.

The defendants appealed.

Pollard and Rufus Isaacs, for the defendants.—The true construction of the covenant is that the lessee will not sublet except to a respectable and responsible person. The consent of the lessor in such a case need not be first obtained. If the lessor subsequently arbitrarily refuses his consent, there is no breach. [They referred to Treloar v. Bigge, 22 W. R. 843, L. R. 9 Ex. 151; Lehmann v. McArthur, 16 W. R. 877, L. R. 3 Ch. App. 496; Burford v. Unwin, 1 Cab. & Ell. N. P. 494.] Further, the words "observe and perform" apply to affirmative, and not to negative, covenants. The present is a negative covenant, and so the right of re-entry does not arise: West v. Dobb, 18 W. R. 1167, L. R. 5 Q. B. 460; Hyde v. Warden, 26 W. R. 201, 3 Ex. D. 72; Evans v. Davis, 27 W. R. 285, 10 Ch. D. 747. Again, assuming that there has been a breach of covenant, equity will give relief against the forfeiture. Equity will give relief where there has been mistake, surprise, fraud, or oversight—i.e., where the breach has not been wilful—and where no damage has resulted from the breach: Hack v. Leonard, 9 Mod. 91; Wafer v. Mocato, 9 Mod. 112; Rose v. Rose, Amb. 331; Northcote v. Duke, Amb. 511; Eaton v. Lyon, 3 Ves. 690; Sanders v. Pope, 12 Ves. 282; Hill v. Barclay, 18 Ves. 56; Bracebridge v. Buckley, 2 Price, 200; Rolfe v. Harris, 2 Price, 206n; Bargent v. Thomson, 9 Jur. N. S. 1192, 12 W. R. Ch. Dig. 51; Hughes v. Metropolitan Railway Co., 25 W. R. 680, 2 App. Cas. 439.

Channell, Q.C., and Forman, for the plaintiff, were only called upon to argue whether there had been a "mistake" upon which equity would grant relief.—There has been no "mistake" here. "Mistake" is analogous to "accident." The failure to observe an obligation which the party has undertaken to observe is not within the doctrine of "mistake" upon which equity will grant relief. The defendants left the matter in the hands of their solicitor, and he forgot that the consent of the plaintiff was necessary. The case of recovery of money paid under mistake is not analogous. Forgetfulness is not "mistake." Mistake does not include the result of negligence: Gregory v. Wilson, 9 Hare, 683; Nokes v. Gibbon, 5 W. R. 400, 3 Drew, 681; Shearman v. M'Gregor, 1 W. R. 302. 11 Hare, 106; Kelly v. Solari, 9 M. & W. 54; Brownlie v. Campbell, 5 App. Cas., at p. 952, 29 W. R. Dig. 232; Townsend v. Crowdy, 8 C. B. N. S. 477, 8 W. R. C. L. Dig. 46; Peachy v. Duke of Somerset, 2 W. & T. L. C., 6th ed., p. 1245; Dumpor's case, 1 Sm. L. C., 9th ed., p. 43. Further, equity will only grant relief in cases of mistake or accident where compensation is a complete satisfaction. The court has never granted relief from forfeiture for breach of covenant not to assign or sublet without licence, as the damage cannot be estimated. The Conveyancing Act, 1881, omits the case of forfeiture for assigning without licence. Until the Conveyancing Act, 1881, equity never granted relief in the case of breach of covenant to insure against fire, as the damage could not be estimated.

Cur. adv. vult.

Dec. 19.—Lord ESHER, M.R.—The plaintiff demised to the defendants certain premises in London, the lease containing a covenant that the defendants would not underlet the premises or any part of them without the consent of the plaintiff. There was a proviso for re-entry upon breach of any of the covenants. The defendants having underlet a part of the premises without the consent of the plaintiff, the present action was brought claiming possession. It appears that the defendants left the matter as to carrying out the underlease in the hands of their solicitor. The solicitor happened at the time to be away from London, and his managing clerk drew the underlease without looking at the superior lease, and being ignorant of the covenant requiring the consent of the lessor. There was a proviso that the consent of the lessor was not to be arbitarily refused. Some argument was addressed to us as to the distinction between affirmative and negative covenants, which might have raised questions of some nicety, but it is unnecessary to consider those questions, as the proviso of re-entry obviously applies to negative as well as to affirmative covenants. As to the stipulation that the lessor would not arbitrarily refuse his consent, I take it to mean that he would not wholly unreasonably refuse his consent. The premises in question were let to the defendants, who are responsible tenants. The defendants sublet to equally respectable and responsible persons. No reasonable objection could possibly have been made to them as sub-tenants. If the plaintiff's consent had been asked in time he would never have thought of refusing it. He would have had no valid ground for objecting to the sub-tenants, and his refusal would have been wholly unreasonable. The objection of the plaintiff is a mere afterthought arising from some unexplained motive, and the plaintiff's rights have not been prejudiced in any way by the omission to ask his consent. Still, there has been a breach of covenant, and the plaintiff has a right of re-entry. It is impossible to deny that at law the plaintiff has a right to recover possession.

The question however remains whether equity will relieve the defendants from the forfeiture. It is not very easy to ascertain the true doctrine upon which equity will grant relief. Equity relieves on the ground of fraud, accident, or mistake, and I think there should be added this qualification, where there can be complete compensation, or where there is no injury requiring compensation. The present case does not come under the head of fraud; nor does it, in my opinion, come under the head of accident, as it arose from something done or omitted to be done by one of the parties. Does it come under the head of mistake? And, if it does, is it such a mistake as a court of equity would relieve against? I have examined all the authorities, and I can find no definition of the word "mistake." But taking that word in its ordinary sense, is mere forgetfulness mistake? In my opinion it is not. In both there is a certain state of mind in the person. In the case of forgetfulness there is merely a passive state of mind—the person has forgotten. He has not, as in the case of mistake, thought one state of things to exist whereas in fact another state of things existed. To my mind mere forgetfulness is not mistake, and I cannot find any case saying that it is, and that it is a ground upon which equity will relieve. On that ground I should be prepared to hold that the court will not grant relief. A further argument was advanced that, even if this were a case of mistake, the court would not grant relief when the mistake was the result of the negligence of the person asking for relief, or of his agent. I am very unwilling to fetter the wide discretion of the court of equity in this respect. The argument is, that though no injury has been caused, equity cannot relieve against the effect of the mistake because there has been negligence. To adopt that argument would be to cripple the salutary powers of the court. In the present case there was negligence on the part of the solicitor's clerk, as indeed the solicitor himself admitted. There was negligence therefore on the part of the defendants' agent, but not on the part of the defendants themselves. Is that invariably to prevent the court granting relief, assuming that no injury has been done, or no injury that cannot be fully compensated for? I should be sorry to lay down such a rule. Suppose, for instance, notice were necessary, and the defendant wrote out the notice and gave it to an agent to deliver, and the agent negligently laid it aside and omitted to deliver it, would the court of equity be deprived of its power to grant relief though no damage ensued? I decline to say so, and speaking for myself, if this were a case of mistake, I should grant relief. But, as I have said, this is not a case of mistake, but of mere forgetfulness, and the defendants have not brought their case under any head of equity that I can find. The plaintiff therefore has a right to insist upon the forfeiture, and the appeal must be dismissed.

LOPES, L.J.—I concur in the judgment which Kay, L.J., is about to read.

KAY, L.J., read the following judgment:—

The plaintiff is a lessor, who has brought an action of ejectment upon a power of re-entry in the lease for breach of a covenant against assigning or underletting without consent.

The lease, dated the 12th of August, 1881, was of a warehouse in the City to Sir Henry Isaacs and his brother, trading as Messrs. Isaacs & Son, and the power of re-entry is in case the lessees "do not well and truly observe and perform" their covenants. The covenant alleged to have been broken is "not to assign, underlet, or part with the possession of the premises, or any part thereof, without such consent as aforesaid, which consent the lessor hereby agrees shall not be arbitrarily withheld in the case of a respectable and responsible person." "Such consent as aforesaid" is expressed a few lines earlier in a preceding covenant thus: "Without the licence and consent in writing of the lessor, his executors, administrators, and assigns, for that purpose first had and obtained." The grammatical construction, therefore, is that the consent to assign must be first had and obtained, and I think the nature of the case would make this clear without the words "first had and obtained." If it had simply been "shall not assign without the lessor's consent," that would primâ facie mean a consent obtained before the assignment. It seems that the original lease was left by Messrs. Isaacs with their solicitor, Mr. Sydney, who kept it in a safe, of which he had the key. Some years ago Messrs. Isaacs underlet part of the ground floor of the warehouse to a tenant named Francis, and on this occasion the plaintiff's consent was applied for and obtained. He went to Sydney's office and signed a written consent. Recently, Messrs. Isaacs were desirous of underletting another portion of the premises to persons named Henderson & Liddell, and instructed Sydney to prepare a proper underlease. He being temporarily absent, the matter was conducted by his clerk, Gamble, who had not got the lease or any copy of it, and who prepared a fresh underlease from a copy of that to Francis, which did not, upon the face of it, notice the necessity of obtaining the plaintiff's consent. Gamble was ignorant of this necessity. Before the underlease was signed, however, Sydney returned, and the completion of the matter was managed by him. He made, in his own writing, certain alterations in the draft, and obtained the execution of the underlease. He had forgotten that the plaintiff's consent was necessary, and omitted to look at the lease to Messrs. Isaacs, which was in his safe, and accordingly the matter was concluded without the consent of the plaintiff being obtained or asked for. Mr. Sydney, in his evidence, said that it was usual in such a case to examine the original lease, but he supposed that Gamble had done all that was necessary. He added, with a frankness which was creditable to him, that no doubt the omission to look at the lease was great neglect. There was, therefore, primâ facie a breach of the covenant not to underlet without the plaintiff's consent. The plaintiff did not discover what had been done till October, 1889, when, passing along the street he saw the names of Henderson & Liddell put up on the door. He communicated with Messrs. Isaacs without delay, and they, by letter dated October 30, 1889, applied for his consent to what they had done. This he refused by a letter of the 31st of October, 1889.

The plaintiff admits that Henderson & Liddell are respectable and responsible persons, and it has been argued that, this being so, his consent was not required. I do not agree with that argument. The terms of the covenant are quite clear. If the intended lessees are respectable and responsible persons the consent is not to be "arbitrarily withheld." Those words imply that the consent must be asked for before the assignment, and that it may be withheld even though the intended lessees are proper persons if such withholding is not arbitrary. Many cases may be supposed in which it would not be. Respectable and responsible persons might desire to carry on a trade which would be injurious to the plaintiff, or which would depreciate the property. The plaintiff might have valid reasons for objecting to an underlease of a portion only of the warehouse. The underlessees might wish to use it for some purpose, not being a trade, which would altogether change the character of the premises; and many other reasons for objecting might be suggested.

Another point made was that the proviso for re-entry refers only to the breach of affirmative and not of negative covenants. This is founded on certain obiter dicta in Hyde v. Warden, 26 W. R. 201, 3 Ex. D. 72. Speaking for myself, I should think that, an extremely narrow construction if the word "perform" only, had been used. Perform has not necessarily an active meaning. We say that a man performs his duty by not answering revilings, by being silent when he ought not to speak, and by many other abstentions from acting as well as by active proceedings. But where the words are "observe and perform," as here, there is no reasonable ground for confining those words to the breach of an affirmative covenant.

Then if, as I think, there was a clear breach of the covenant, and a consequent right in the plaintiff to re-enter, is this a case in which equity would relieve against the forfeiture? The plaintiff has been called and has not been able to show that any actual damage has been done, or that he has any valid reason for objecting if his consent had been duly asked. Messrs. Isaacs and Sydney have all deposed that at the time of granting this underlease they had forgotten, though they certainly once knew, that the plaintiff's consent was necessary. Gamble did not know this. It has been argued (1) that this was a mistake which enables equity to relieve against the forfeiture; and (2) that it would be a proper exercise of that discretionary jurisdiction to do so in this case, as no damage has been done to the plaintiff by the underlease. I do not desire to cast the least doubt upon the jurisdiction of the court to relieve in cases of what it calls mistake. What we have to determine is, whether such relief would be a proper exercise of that jurisdiction in this case.

Long ago courts of equity assumed jurisdiction to relieve against forfeiture and penalties where the only object was to secure payment of a definite sum of money, even though there was no fraud, accident, surprise, or mistake. On this principle it relieved against payment of the whole penalty on a money bond before the statutes 4 & 5 Anne, c. 16, ss. 12 and 13, and 8 & 9 Will. 3, c. 11, which enabled courts of law to give the same relief. Also against forfeiture for non-payment of rent, and by 4 Geo. 2, c. 28 its powers in this respect were somewhat restricted by limiting the time for their exercise to six months after execution in ejectment. At first there seems to have been some hesitation whether this relief might not be extended to other cases of forfeiture for breach of covenants such as to repair, to insure, and the like, where compensation could be made, but it was soon recognized that there would be great difficulty in estimating the proper amount of compensation; and since the decision of Lord Eldon in Hill v. Barclay, 18 Ves. 56, it has always been held that equity would not relieve merely on the ground that it could give compensation upon breach of any covenant in a lease except the covenant for non-payment of rent. But of course this left unaffected the undoubted jurisdiction to relieve in cases of breach occasioned by fraud, accident, surprise, or mistake. At present, the only one of these we have to deal with is mistake; and the questions are (1) whether the facts I have described amount to mistake; and, if so, (2) whether in its discretion the court will relieve. Very wisely, as I presume to think, the courts have abstained from giving any general definition of what amounts to mistake. It is an easily arguable question whether mere forgetfulness of such a covenant, even if not negligent, can properly be called mistake.

The case of Kelly v. Solari, 9 M. & W. 54, however, and the observations of Lord Blackburn in the House of Lords in Brownlie v. Campbell, 5 App. Cas. 952, establish that in an action to recover money paid by mistake it is sufficient to prove that at the time of the payment the person paying was actually ignorant that the money was not due, although he had the means of knowledge, and it was owing to his own carelessness or forgetfulness that he was, in fact, ignorant. There undoubtedly forgetfulness of the previous payment is treated as mistake. But in those cases the payee is in possession of money which he had no right to receive, and which really belongs to the person who paid it, and no amount of carelessness on the part of the payer can justify the payee in retaining it. I feel great difficulty in saying that if this be mistake at law it would not be considered mistake in equity. It is an entirely different question whether, on the ground of such a mistake, equity, in the exercise of its discretionary jurisdiction, would relieve a man from a forfeiture incurred by his own gross carelessness. Vigilantibus non dormientibus leges subveniunt. Equity is bound to consider all the circumstances of each case. To a suitor asking to be relieved from forfeiture, the result of carelessness so gross that it might almost be called wilful, it can hardly be favourably disposed. I have spoken of the right of re-entry of a landlord as a "forfeiture" of the lease, but the use of the word "forfeiture" in cases of this kind is somewhat misleading. This is not like a condition in a will, non-compliance with which causes a forfeiture. It is a contract between landlord and tenant that if the latter does or omits to do certain specified acts the landlord may re-enter. Lord Eldon, in Hill v. Barclay, 18 Ves. 62, dealing with Lord Erskine's observations as to relieving against breach of a covenant to repair, said:—"A particular case might perhaps occur, such as are put by Lord Erskine in Sanders v. Pope, in which it would be demonstrable that the landlord would sustain no injury by the relief; but it is taking a prodigious liberty with a contract by which a tenant has undertaken forthwith to repair." I understand that to mean, that it is a very strong proceeding for equity to interfere with the contract of the parties that the landlord may re-enter for breach of covenant, and that it can only do so in very exceptional circumstances.

In Earl Beauchamp v. Winn, L. R. 6 H. L. 223, the Court of Chancery had refused to rescind an agreement which it was sought to set aside on the ground of mistake common to both parties. The mistake alleged on the part of the earl was that he thought he had merely a right over the surface of a certain common, called East Common, instead of being owner of the soil, as he really was. This depended upon the doubtful construction of an ancient grant in 1799, which was among his title deeds, but which the Lord Chancellor was of opinion he was not guilty of any negligence in not having consulted. The Lord Chancellor said (p. 230): "This is not a case of mistake, therefore, but of ignorance, and ignorance resulting from a party's own omission to avail himself of information within his power." At p. 233 he says: "The cases in which equity interferes to set aside contracts are those in which either there has been mutual mistake or ignorance in both parties affecting the essence of the contract, or a fact is known to one party and unknown to the other, and there is some fraud or surprise upon the ignorant party." At p. 235 the Lord Chancellor adds that if the earl had mistaken his right to the East Common, and that he was in law the owner of the soil, instead of having merely a right over the surface, there was jurisdiction in equity to set aside the agreement. The House came to the conclusion that there was not any mistake, and affirmed the decision. The Lord Chancellor's former words as to the ignorance not being mistake are probably a statement of the argument which had been addressed to the House rather than his own opinion. However, he carefully excepts the case of ignorance arising from negligence of the person who seeks relief.

In the well-known case of The Duke of Beaufort v. Neeld, 12 Cl. & F. 248, an exchange was made of lands under the Inclosure Act (6 & 7 Will. 4, c. 115), section 35 of which requires the consent in writing of the proprietor. The Duke of Beaufort signed a written consent. The commissioner directed the exchange, and Neeld entered upon the lands exchanged. The duke sent a written notice to the commissioner declaring that his consent had been signed "under a misapprehension." The duke then brought an action of trespass and ejectment, in which judgment was given against him. He then filed a bill to rescind the written consent. During the argument Lord Brougham said, "Equity has not relieved against gross improvidence." Lord Lyndhurst, C., in giving judgment, said that the duke stated that when he signed the consent he did not know that the piece of land in question was included in it, because it was mentioned, not by name, but by a number which referred to a map not then in his possession. But he says it was his duty to make inquiry, and "if he did not choose to exercise due caution in that respect, he cannot turn round and say, 'I really did not know the contents of the paper when I signed it; I signed it incautiously.' He cannot now with propriety say that, so as to free himself from the consequences of his own act." Lord Brougham said: "He need not look if he does not choose; but then, if he does not look, he must bear the penalty of being held to have looked, and if he either shuts his eyes or carelessly sees, he shall not be allowed in a court of law or equity to say 'It is a mistake, I never knew it,' because he might have known it, and he ought to have known it, and if he signs his name and could have looked and did not look, still he is bound by his act." Lord Campbell in the same case said: "But then we come to the consent which was signed by the duke's own hand, and at that time I believe what the duke says, that he was ignorant of what he was doing. Because he is a man of unblemished honour, I have no doubt that everything he says is strictly and correctly

But he has the means of knowing; he wilfully shuts his eyes (I do not say that offensively at all), with the means of knowledge within his power, and it being his duty to have ascertained the fact, can he be heard to say, 'I was ignorant; relieve me from the effects of the mistake which I have made.'" The equitable relief sought in that case was refused partly on this ground. It is a decision of the highest tribunal that equity will not relieve when the mistake arises from the negligence of the suitor who seeks its help.

I am clearly of opinion that Messrs. Isaacs must be held responsible for any negligence of Mr. Sydney. Their plea for relief therefore, explicitly stated, would run thus: "We admit that we were aware of the necessity of obtaining the plaintiff's consent before making the underlease. The lease to us which imposed that obligation was in our possession. We had forgotten this provision of it. The ordinary course of business required that we should examine the lease before granting the underlease. We admit that we neglected to do so, but we say that no harm has been done to the plaintiff, and therefore equity should relieve against the forfeiture." There must have been thousands of cases in which leases have been forfeited owing to non-performance of covenants through bonâ fide forgetfulness. Counsel have not cited to us, nor have I been able to find, a single instance in which relief has been given under such circumstances. It is impossible not to see that such relief would be an incentive to negligence. If we were to grant it, hereafter lessees might avoid looking at their leases lest they should be reminded by them of obligations which it would be more convenient to ignore. Many suits would be instituted for relief upon this ground, which, until now, is unknown in the records of the court as one upon which relief would be granted.

The course of legislation upon this subject of forfeiture of leases by breach of covenant is most significant. At first, as I have pointed out, the remedial jurisdiction of equity against penalties was extended to courts of common law. Next, the relief it gave in cases of forfeiture for non-payment of rent was limited in time. Then ensued a long period, in which equity seems to have refused relief in cases of breach of any of the other covenants in a lease. Very hard cases occurred, in which unconscionable landlords insisted on their legal rights; especially hard were these forfeitures for breach of the covenant to insure where no damage had ensued. By 22 & 23 Vict. c. 35, ss. 4-9, extended to courts of common law by 23 & 24 Vict. c. 126, it was enacted that "a court of equity shall have power to relieve against a forfeiture for breach of a covenant or condition to insure against loss or damage by fire where no loss or damage by fire has happened, and the breach has, in the opinion of the court, been committed through accident or mistake, or otherwise without fraud or gross negligence, and there is an insurance on foot at the time of the application to the court, in conformity with the covenant to insure, upon such terms as to the court may seem fit." The terms of that enactment making it lawful to give this relief when the breach has been committed "through accident or mistake, or otherwise without fraud or gross negligence," show plainly that equity had not been accustomed to relieve in such cases on the ground of accident or mistake; and, further, they provide that relief shall not be given, even in cases of accident or mistake, when there has been gross negligence. Now, by the Conveyancing Act, 1881, these enactments are repealed, but a locus penitentiæ is given to the lessee by requiring, in case of any breach of covenant, that the lessor shall serve upon him a notice specifying the breach and requiring him to remedy it, and to make compensation in money, before exercising his right of re-entry; otherwise the High Court may grant relief upon proper terms. But it is expressly provided that this does not extend to a covenant against assigning, underletting, parting with the possession, or disposing of the land leased. Forfeiture for breach of this covenant is left to be dealt with according to the ordinary law and practice of courts of equity.

Upon the whole, therefore, assuming, what I do not think it necessary to affirm or deny, that the High Court had jurisdiction to relieve in this case if in its discretion it thought fit to do so, for the reasons I have given I am of opinion that to grant such relief would not be a proper exercise of that discretion, and accordingly I think that this appeal should be dismissed, with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

MILLER v. DELL. (a.)

Statute of Limitations—Conversion—Accrual of cause of action—Title deeds.

The plaintiff's son, having wrongfully obtained possession of a lease of certain premises of which the plaintiff was in possession, deposited it in 1881 with B. to secure an advance. B. having afterwards become bankrupt, his trustee in 1889 transferred the lease to the defendant. The plaintiff demanded the return of the lease, and the defendant refused to give it up.

Held, that the cause of action against the defendant did not accrue to the plaintiff until the demand and refusal to give up the lease; and therefore that the Statute of Limitations was no bar to the action.

Application that judgment should be entered for the plaintiff or for a new trial.

The action was brought for detinue and conversion of a lease. The plaintiff was the owner of certain leasehold property, and agreed with his son to assign the lease to him upon the performance of certain terms and conditions. These, however, were not performed, but the son, having in 1881 obtained possession of the lease, deposited it with a man named Bates, to secure the repayment of a loan made to him by Bates. He at the same time signed a memorandum of deposit which was in the ordinary form, and by which he agreed to execute a legal mortgage of the premises when called upon to do so.

Bates subsequently became bankrupt, and in 1889 his trustee in bankruptcy transferred all his interest under the memorandum of deposit and the lease itself to the defendant. Subsequently the plaintiff demanded from the defendant the return of the lease, but the defendant declined to part with it. The present action was then commenced, and the defendant pleaded the Statute of Limitations.

At the trial, which took place before Charles, J., and a jury, Charles, J., entered judgment for the defendant, on the ground that the plaintiff's cause of action had accrued more than six years before action brought—namely, when the lease was wrongfully deposited with Bates by the plaintiff's son.

The plaintiff moved for judgment or for a new trial.

Crump, Q.C., and Morton Smith, for the plaintiff.—The plaintiff's cause of action was the refusal by the defendant to give up the lease. It is immaterial that he had at one time a good cause of action against Bates. Wilkinson v. Verity, 19 W. R. 604, L. R. 6 C. P. 206, on which Charles, J., placed reliance, only refers to acts done by the same defendant. The only detinue and conversion in this case was the refusal of the defendant to part with the deed.

They referred to Spackman v. Foster, 31 W. R. 548, 11 Q. B. D. 99.

R. Bray, for the defendant.—The statute began to run against the plaintiff when his son deposited the lease with Bates. That was a conversion for which a cause of action immediately arose: Wilkinson v. Verity; McCombie v. Davies, 6 East, 538.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—In this case the plaintiff has brought an action against the defendant for wrongful conversion of this document. The defendant's acquisition of the lease from Bates' trustee in bankruptcy and his refusal to give it up when it was demanded from him by the plaintiff both occurred well within the six years prescribed by the Statute of Limitations. The defendant, however, relies on the fact that the document was originally wrongfully converted, more than six years before action brought, both by Bates and by the plaintiff's son, who secretly abstracted it from his father's possession, and deposited it with Bates to secure an advance. This was the first wrongful conversion of the document, and it is said that the statute began to run againt the plaintiff from that date. In support of this contention the case of Wilkinson v. Verity was cited, and on that authority Charles, J., has decided in the defendant's favour. Willes, J., there said that as a general rule when there has once been a complete cause of action arising out of contract or tort the statute begins to run, and subsequent circumstances which, but for the prior wrongful act or default, would have constituted a cause of action are disregarded. In that case the defendant committed an act of conversion more than six years before action brought, and subsequently, within that period, committed another by refusing to give up the converted article when demanded from him by the plaintiff. There were, therefore, two acts of wrongful conversion, but both committed by the same defendant. All that that case decided was that where a defendant in an action for conversion had committed two acts, both of which would give rise to a cause of action in respect of the same subject-matter, and one of those acts was committed more than six years before action brought, but the other was committed within that period, the first and not the second act must be regarded; and, therefore, that the Statute of Limitations was in that case a bar to the action.

It is now sought to extract from that case the doctrine that if one man commits an act of wrongful conversion, and some time afterwards another person commits another wrongful conversion in respect of the same thing, the only cause of action is the first wrongful conversion, and that if that took place more than six years before action brought the action against the second wrongdoer is barred because it is too late to bring an action against the first wrongdoer.

The Statute of Limitations does not give any right to the property. If the real owner of a chattel, of which he had been wrongfully deprived more than six years ago, were, without any assault or trespass, to recover possession of it, the person who had held it for all those years would have no right of action against him, although the real owner's right to sue for it would be barred by the Statute of Limitations. I think, therefore, that Charles, J., misconceived the meaning of the case of Wilkinson v. Verity, and that there was no authority which entitled him to decide in the defendant's favour. The case of Spackman v. Foster, in which the facts seem very much like the facts in the present case, is in point, but on a question of even greater difficulty which it is not necessary for us now to decide. This was a lease, a document of title, and the evidence of title. It may be a question whether, even after the expiration of six years, a document of title can be held against the person entitled to the land. That point will, however, some day require consideration, and I do not feel inclined to decide it now. It is sufficient for the present to say that the Statute of Limitations does not apply to this claim, and that the decision of Charles, J., was wrong. This appeal must be allowed, and judgment entered for the plaintiff.

LOPES, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. I think that the Statute of Limitations is no bar to this action. The plaintiff's cause of action against the defendant was the demand by the plaintiff and the refusal by the defendant to give up the lease, to which the plaintiff was clearly entitled. That demand and refusal occurred within the period fixed by the statute. The form of plea given by Schedule B., Form 39, of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1852, is: "That the alleged cause of action did not accrue within six years before this suit." The plaintiff's cause of action against the defendant has accrued within that time, and therefore the Statute of Limitations is no bar. The case would be different if the action had been brought against the plaintiff's son, and the plaintiff would then have lost his remedy by lapse of time. In my opinion there is nothing in the case of Wilkinson v. Verity to support the decision of Charles, J. I therefore agree in thinking that this appeal must be allowed.

KAY, L.J.—I concur. In my opinion this case is almost identical with that of Spackman v. Foster. I think that that case is good law, and is entirely in point, and I agree, therefore, in thinking that this decision must be reversed.

Appeal allowed, and judgment entered for the plaintiff.

In re WANZER (LIMITED). (a.)

Company—Winding up—Sequestration for rent by Scotch landlord—Companies Act, 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 89), ss. 87, 163.

An English company leased a shop in Scotland from a Scotch landlord, but, before the first quarter's rent was payable, an order to wind up the company was made and a liquidator appointed, who took possession of the shop. The Scotch landlord thereupon, without obtaining the leave of the court under section 87 of the Companies Act, 1862, took proceedings for a sequestration to secure the payment of the rent of the shop.

Held, on the motion of the liquidator, that the sequestration was void by virtue of section 163 of the Companies Act, 1862; but the court gave leave to the landlord, under section 87 of that Act, to enforce his hypothec for the rent by proceeding with the sequestration, unless security was given for payment thereof, on the terms of paying the costs of the motion.

Motion.

This was a motion by the liquidator of Wanzer (Limited), a limited company, to restrain by injunction a Scotch landlord from taking any further proceedings on a petition for sequestration, commenced and prosecuted by him before the Sheriff's Court at Glasgow; and for a declaration that what was done under the proceedings was void to all intents, and that the landlord might be ordered to withdraw

The Wanzer (Limited), an English company, under an agreement dated the 17th of April, 1890, took a shop, No. 34, Gordon-street, Glasgow, for three years from Whitsunday, 1890, at a rent of £230, payable half-yearly; and soon afterwards they entered into possession.

In the following August, before any rent was due, a petition was presented and an order was made in this country for the winding up of the company, and on the 1st of September the provisional liquidator, who afterwards became official liquidator, took possession of the shop.

On the 16th of October the landlord, having been informed by the liquidator's agent that he was likely to leave the shop, commenced proceedings by petition in the Sheriff's Court of Lanarkshire, at Glasgow. The petition was headed by the name of the landlord, which was a company, and their manager, called the pursuers, against the Wanzer Co. as defenders. It stated that the pursuers, petition the court to sequester the whole of the stock, furniture, and effects which are, or have been, since Whitsunday, 1890, on the premises, and to grant warrant to the officer on the court to inventory and secure the same in security, and for payment to the pursuers of the £115, being the half-year's rent to accrue due at Martinmas, and the other £115 to accrue due at May, 1891, with interest and expenses; and to grant warrant to an auctioneer named to sell the whole or so much of the sequestrated effects as should be sufficient to satisfy the demand, but so that no sale was to take place till the Martinmas rent or the Whitsunday rent, 1891, had become due and remained unpaid. Then, after satisfaction by payment, sequestration might be recalled. Following upon that a document was put in, under which the landlord claimed to have a right of hypothec over the whole of the furniture on the premises. On the same day the sheriff-substitute for the county ordains that the defenders should be served with a copy of the petition, and that, if they intended to show cause why the prayer of the petition should not be granted, they should take certain proceedings, in default of which the petition would be conferred against them, and then "meantime sequestrates and grants warrant to sequester the goods on the premises for the rent of this current year."

The officer of the court then took possession on the same day, and executed a formal document to "inventory and secure" the goods, which were stated "to remain under sure fence and sequestration" to secure the rent, interest, and expenses. Thereupon the official liquidator brought on the present motion, the question for decision being whether the sequestration was not void under the provisions of sections 87 and 163 of the Companies Act, 1862. There were in evidence opinions of Professor Rankine and Mr. Balfour (the Dean of Faculty), of the Scotch bar, on cases submitted to them as to the Scotch law with respect to sequestration, and the effect thereon of sections 87 and 163 of the Companies Act, 1862, which opinions are stated by his lordship in his judgment.

The Companies Act, 1862, which applies to Scotland as well as to England, enacts by section 87: "When an order has been made for winding up a company under this Act, no suit, action, or other proceeding shall be proceeded with or commenced against the company except with the leave of the court and subject to such terms as the court may impose"; and by section 163, "where any company is being wound up by the court, or subject to the supervision of the court, any attachment, sequestration, distress, or execution put in force against the estate or effects of the company after the commencement of the winding up shall be void to all intents."

Napier Higgins, Q.C., and C. E. E. Jenkins, for the motion.—The Scotch sequestration is void by virtue of section 163 of the Companies Act, 1862, which includes such sequestration by a Scotch landlord as has taken place in this case. The landlord could only proceed after obtaining leave of the court under section 87 of that Act: In re Exhall Coal Mining Co., 13 W. R. 219, 4 De G. J. & S. 377; Lloyd v. Lloyd & Co., 25 W. R. 872, 6 Ch. D. 339; In re South Kensington Co-operative Stores, 29 W. R. 662, 17 Ch. D. 161; In re Brown, Bayley, & Dixon, 30 W. R. 5, 18 Ch. D. 649; In re Oak Pitts Colliery Co., 30 W. R. 759, 21 Ch. D. 322; In re Lancashire Cotton Spinning Co., 36 W. R. 305, 35 Ch. D. 656. A mortgagee of a company can generally obtain such leave of the court for the purpose of pursuing his remedy in case of the winding up of the company, but this is not extended to a landlord: In re Exhall Coal Mining Co.; In re Lancashire Cotton Spinning Co.

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., and Chadwyck Healey, for the Scotch landlord.—A sequestration by a Scotch landlord is not within the meaning of section 163 of the Companies Act, 1862. A Scotch landlord has greater rights than an English landlord for the purpose of obtaining security for the payment of rent, and a proceeding by him for that purpose does not come within that section. But if it does, then we ask for the leave of the court, under section 87 of that Act, to enable the landlord to enforce the special right given to him by the Scotch law.

They referred to Lloyd v. Lloyd & Co.

Napier Higgins, Q.C., replied.

NORTH, J., after stating the facts, and reading the 163rd section of the Companies Act, 1862, proceeded as follows:—The first question is, is this a proceeding for a sequestration under that section which covers Scotch proceedings as well as English? Upon that point I do not find a definite opinion expressed by any witness for the landlord that it is not a sequestration. I find in the opinion given by Professor Rankine that, in answer to a question as to whether there was any case since the Companies Act, 1862, in Scotland, applying to a trustee or liquidator claiming under the 163rd section, he says "No"; and after referring to another statute, which I do not think is very material, he adds: "And that poinding of the ground, a diligence which proceeds on the same principles as landlords' sequestration, has been held not to be struck at by the 163rd section of the Companies Act, 1862, on the ground (which is equally applicable in the present case) that it operates no new preference, but simply makes available a preference already existing." He does not say that, according to Scotch law, a sequestration in respect of landlords' rent does not come within that section; and the opinion also given on the same side by Mr. Balfour does not do so either. He says:—"I also agree with Mr. Rankine in thinking, for reasons similar to those given in regard to poinding of the ground in the case of Athole Hydropathic Co. v. Scottish Provincial Assurance Co. (13 Court. Sess. Cas., 4th series, 818), that a landlord's sequestration is not the putting in force of an execution against the estate and effects of the company within the meaning of section 163 of the Companies Act, 1862, and that, consequently, the memorialists' process of sequestration is not void under that section." But he does not say that the Scotch law is that the word "sequestration" there does not include a landlord's sequestration for rent. It is very difficult to see why it should not. He does say—in fact both these learned gentlemen say—that a proceeding by way of poinding the ground, under a heritable bond, is not an execution, and upon that ground is not within that section; and far be it from me to say that poinding of the ground under such a bond is an execution; but this is not the question I have to decide.

Then it is suggested that the word "sequestration" is an English word, used in an English Act, and that it must have the same meaning that it would have in England, and as in England there is no sequestration by a landlord in respect of his rent, therefore sequestration here cannot apply to such a case. I do not follow that. Sequestration is a word large enough to apply to all sequestrations; this is called a proceeding in sequestration, and how it can be said that such a sequestration is not a sequestration I do not quite understand. Then look at the words in company with which it is found. It is "any attachment, sequestration, distress, or execution." Now a distress is the remedy that a landlord has by law to take possession of property, and to levy the rent that is due to him out of it. I do not say the two proceedings are the same. I think that it is clear they are not. The Scotch hypothec that a landlord has is distinguishable in some points from a right of distress; but they are both in pari materiâ, and it is very difficult to see on what ground a Scotch landlord is to have a different right given to him in respect of sequestration for rent from that which an English landlord has in respect of distress, unless upon the ground that I will consider presently.

Then there is another thing to be borne in mind. Under the Bankruptcy Act in Scotland in 1856 the landlord's right was intended to be unaffected by that Act. That is expressly provided in section 119, which says, "Nothing in this Act contained shall affect the landlord's right of hypothec." But there are no such words in the Companies Act of 1862, which was passed only five or six years later; and one would expect that, if the landlord's right of hypothec was to be excepted, we should find something of that sort in the Act itself.

Then it is suggested that the landlord's proceeding is not a sequestration upon this principle; that the sequestration given to a landlord by the Scotch law does not create any new preferential right, but merely renders available a right already existing. I cannot understand how, for that reason, a sequestration for rent can be said not to be a sequestration. It may be a very good reason why, if such a sequestration is within section 163, the court, under section 87, should give leave to proceed; but that is a totally different thing. In my opinion, the word "sequestration," used in the 163rd section, does apply to the landlord's right of sequestration to secure rent, given to him by the Scotch law, and does render it void to all intents.

But I have said this with respect to the 163rd section alone. That does not end the case, because, according to decisions which are binding upon me, the 163rd section and the 87th section are to be construed together; and, therefore, "void to all intents" is to be read, as qualified by the 87th section, as meaning "void to all intents, unless the court shall otherwise direct"—that is to say, unless the court authorizes the institution of the proceedings which lead up to the sequestration, or authorizes their continuance if already instituted before the sequestration takes place.

Then we must turn to the 87th section, which enacts: "When an order has been made for winding up a company under this Act, no suit, action, or other proceeding shall be proceeded with, or commenced against, the company, except with the leave of the court, and subject to such terms as the court may impose." The question upon that section is, whether this action in Scotland is a proceeding within the meaning of the section. This is not a question of Scotch law. I am satisfied that it is a proceeding; and although it is not a question of Scotch law, I have the satisfaction of having Mr. Balfour's opinion to the effect that, if a Scotch court had construed this section, they would hold that this section was a proceeding within the meaning of the 87th section.

Therefore, it comes to this, that the proceeding is one which is not to be commenced or proceeded with without the sanction of the court, and the court has not given any sanction. That being so, the 163rd section applies, and the liquidator is entitled to the order that he asks for.

But, then, that does not end the case, because it would still be open to the landlord to apply to the court for leave to proceed under the 87th section, and Mr. Hardy has asked me now to consider that application as made, if I am against him on the first point, as I am.

Then it is necessary to consider whether, if the application had been made, leave would have been granted. That leads me to consider what is the precise position of the landlord in Scotland with respect to proceeding by way of sequestration for his rent. Now, as to that, I think it proved on the evidence that the effect of the Scotch law is to give the landlord "a real security without possession," as it is called, upon the property demised, and the stock, in respect of his rent; and there is this peculiarity about it in Scotland that does not exist in England; that it is a right to do this by way of anticipation before the rent is due. In that respect it differs altogether from the English right of distress, which can only be put into force after the rent has actually become due. In Scotland it may be done before the rent becomes due, and in this case that was the course adopted, for, the first rent becoming due on the 11th of November, this proceeding is taken a month before that time.

In my opinion this is a case in which by Scotch law the landlord has a security given to him for rent to become due; and, in my opinion, he is by Scotch law a secured creditor.

Then the question is, what the result of that is; and I am reminded of the cases in which a mortgagee is allowed, pretty much as a matter of course, if the relief he asks for is not conceded, to commence proceedings after the winding up, or after the winding up to continue proceedings commenced before, for the purpose of realizing his security. It is said that the mortgagee's right depends upon this, that he is only taking proceedings to recover his own property; whereas the landlord in Scotland has r whatever in the furniture and stock of his tenant; but has merely a right to be enforced by a judicial proceeding. In my opinion, that does not affect the case. He has a security which he has a right to enforce, which the Scotch law gives him, and it seems to me more like the position of a debenture-holder than anything else, although it is not exactly the same as that. I think, therefore, that if the landlord had, before commencing these proceedings, asked for leave to take proceedings by way of sequestration, the court would have given him leave to do so.

The question is, whether I should give it now. I am prepared to do so upon terms. Down to this time the landlord has been entirely in the wrong, because he has commenced and prosecuted proceedings which, in my opinion, he had no right to do, and in respect of which proceedings costs have been incurred. But I do not think it necessary to put the landlord to commence fresh proceedings, as I should now give him leave to do if he asked for it. I am prepared to put him now in the same position as if there was a motion pending before me at his instance to obtain leave to continue his proceedings for a sequestration; but I can only give him that leave upon the payment of the costs of the liquidator in the proceedings in which, down to this time, the landlord has been entirely in the wrong.

Rachel Parker, the mortgagee, made her will dated the 19th of August, 1880, and appointed the plaintiffs, B. Wignall and J. Wells, her executors, and thereby directed that her debts should be paid out of her real estate, and bequeathed all sums of money which might be due to her at her decease, and all other her funds and securities for money, unto the London Missionary Society and the British and Foreign Bible Society in equal shares, and devised all her real estate unto her nephew, the defendant, R. J. Parke.

The testatrix died on the 31st of January, 1883, and her will was duly proved by the plaintiffs above named. At her death she was seised of certain real estate, and was entitled to personal estate, consisting of cash and certain securities, including a sum of £150 secured by a waterworks mortgage of the borough of Preston. In the administration of her estate the question arose whether the money secured by the waterworks mortgage was or was not pure personalty, to pass under the bequest for charitable purposes, and the matter now came before the court upon an originating summons taken out by the executors.

The waterworks mortgage was in the following terms:—

"BOROUGH OF PRESTON.—WATERWORKS MORTGAGE.

"By virtue of the Preston Waterworks Act, 1853, the Local Government Supplemental Act, 1869.—The mayor, aldermen, and burgesses of the borough of Preston, in the county of Lancaster, in exercise of the powers of the said corporation, and in consideration of the sum of one hundred and fifty pounds, hereinafter called the principal sum, paid to the treasurer of the said corporation by Rachel Parker, of . . . herein called the mortgagee, for the purposes of the said Acts, or one of them, do grant and assign to the mortgagee, her executors, administrators, and assigns, such proportion of the rents, rates, and waterworks by the said Acts, or any of them, which the said corporation are authorized to charge, levy, purchase, and make, and also of the general district rate in the same Acts, or one of them, mentioned, as the principal sum doth or shall bear to the whole sum which is, or shall be, borrowed under the powers of the said Acts, or any of them, upon the credit of the said rents, rates, and waterworks, or of the said general district rate, by any of the said Acts authorized to be charged, levied, purchased, and made. And do also grant and assign to the mortgagee, her executors, administrators, and assigns, such proportion of the general district rate by the Public Health Acts, 1848 and 1875, or either of them, or any Act incorporated therewith, authorized to be made, as the principal sum doth or shall bear to the whole sum which is, or shall be, borrowed upon the credit of the said general district rate by the said last-mentioned Acts, or any of them, authorized to be made, to hold the said premises hereby assigned unto the mortgagee, her executors, administrators, and assigns, until the whole of the principal sum, with interest for the same after the rate of three pounds ten shillings per centum per annum, shall be fully paid and satisfied to the mortgagee, her executors, administrators, and assigns."

The principal moneys were to be paid on the 1st of December, 1885, and the mortgage was dated the 30th of November, 1882.

The following are the material sections of the various statutes, the effect being either stated or the sections set out verbatim; the first Act hereinafter mentioned being the Act authorizing the local board of health, now represented by the Corporation of Preston, to purchase and take over the works of the then existing Preston Waterworks Co.

16 & 17 Vict. c. xlviii., sess. 1852-1853, (Preston Waterworks Act, 1853), (local and personal).—The preamble recites the proposed purchase by the local board of Preston from the company of the proprietors of the Preston Waterworks of the undertaking of the company, a company incorporated by an Act of 2 Will. 4, and authorized to raise money by an Act of 6 Vict. c. 32 (local and personal). It recites that by the Public Health Act, 1848, and the Public Health Supplemental Act, 1850, No. 2, the local board of health for the borough of Preston had been constituted for the district comprising the said borough exclusively, and that it was expedient that further and better provision should be made for the supply of water, and that the necessary powers for that purpose should be vested in the said local board; and further recited that it was expedient that the agreement for the purchase of such undertaking should be carried into effect, and that the supply of water should be placed under the control, regulation, and management of the said local board, and that the board should be authorized to alter, extend, and enlarge the said waterworks, the property of the said company.

Section 3 incorporates "the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, and the Waterworks Clauses Consolidation Act, 1847, so far as the same are not repugnant to the provisions herein contained."

Section 4.—". . . Be it enacted, that it shall be lawful for the said local board, subject to the provisions and restrictions in this Act, and the Acts incorporated therewith contained, to make and maintain the said waterworks, together with all proper reservoirs," &c.

Section 12.—"That the local board shall, when the undertaking and works of the company shall come into their possession, and at all times thereafter, supply to every dwelling-house within the said borough entitled to demand a supply, as hereinafter mentioned, at the request of the owner or occupier thereof, water for domestic purposes upon the rents, rates, and assessments, and in manner herein provided . . ."

By section 39 the rates which the local board are entitled to levy for the supply of water for domestic purposes are specified.

By section 41 the rates and rents are to be paid in advance.

Section 43.—"It shall and may be lawful for the local board to make any rate for the purposes of this Act, or of any Act incorporated therewith, prospectively to raise money to pay interest, charges, and expenses to be incurred thereafter, or retrospectively to raise money to pay interest, charges, and expenses which may have been incurred at any time within six months before the making of the rate."

By section 45 the charges for water for flushing sewers, &c., are to be included in the general district rate.

Section 51.—"It shall be lawful for the local board to borrow, for the purposes of this Act, upon the security of the rents, rates, and works authorized by this Act to be charged, levied, purchased, and made, or on the security of the general district rates authorized to be made by this Act, or by the Public Health Act, 1848, or on all or any of the said securities, such sum as shall be necessary for paying to the said company the purchase-money for their undertaking, and any further sum or sums of money, not exceeding the sum of £80,000, over and above or exclusive of such sum as shall be necessary for paying to the said company the purchase-money for their said undertaking; and the provisions of the Commissioners Clauses Act, 1847, with respect to the mortgages to be executed by the commissioners, shall be applicable to the borrowing of such sum or sums of money by the board, and shall be read and construed as if the words 'the local board of health for the district and borough of Preston' had been in every case inserted instead of the word 'commissioners.'"

Section 53.—"It shall be lawful for the said local board, and they are hereby required in estimating the amount required to be raised by means of general district rates for the purposes of the said borough, under the provisions of the Public Health Act, 1848, and in making such rates, to include the money required for the purposes of this Act in one and the same assessment, as the money authorized to be levied by the Public Health Act, 1848, by means of a rate or rates, called "general district rates," therein mentioned, and to collect the same as part thereof, in like manner as if the same were expressly charged by the said Act upon such rate or rates."

By section 54 the local board is required to keep a separate account to be called "the water account," and by section 55 all moneys borrowed under the Act are to be charged on the water account.

By section 56 provision is made for the establishment of a sinking fund for the payment off of the moneys so borrowed.

By section 58 the local board is empowered to appoint officers and servants, and to impose penalties upon them; and section 59 provides for the application of such penalties.

The Commissioners Clauses Act, 1847 (the following sections of which closely resemble the analogous sections of the Companies Clauses Act, 1845,) provides, by section 75, a form of mortgage which has been closely followed in that now forming the subject of decision.

Sections 86 and 87 provide, where interest or principal is in arrear, for the appointment of a receiver of "the rates or sums liable to the payment" of such interest or principal.

By the Preston Improvement Act, 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. Vict. c. lxxxvii.), (local and private), the board was authorized to construct additional waterworks. Section 2 incorporated the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, the Lands Clauses Consolidation Acts Amendment Act, 1860, so much of the Waterworks Clauses Act, 1847, as relates to the construction of waterworks and the accommodation of lands adjoining the waterworks, the Waterworks Clauses Act, 1863, and the provisions of the Commissioners Clauses Act, 1847, with respect to the mortgages to be executed by the commissioners.

Section 14 enacts: "The local board may defray the expenses of constructing the waterworks out of any moneys which they are already authorized to borrow for the completion of the works for supplying water to Preston, and they may exercise for the purposes aforesaid such borrowing powers accordingly; and all moneys received or expended by them under this Act for waterworks purposes shall be included in 'the water account' referred to in the 54th section of the Act of 1853."

By section 15 the then existing provisions as to the sinking fund for moneys borrowed for waterworks purposes were repealed, and by section 17 new provisions were made for this purposes.

Section 21 provides for the making of regulations by the local board for preventing the waste, &c., of water by persons supplied, and section 22 contains provisions for the imposition of penalties in such cases.

The waterworks undertaking of the Corporation of Preston consists of reservoirs, machinery, and mains situate outside the borough, and main water pipes and appliances connected therewith laid and fixed within the borough. The water rents payable to the corporation are assessed upon the rateable value of the properties supplied, and are collected by the officials of the corporation.

Cur. adv. vult.

STIRLING, J.—The question raised by this summons is whether a borough of Preston waterworks mortgage for £150, part of the estate of the testatrix, Rachel Parker, ought to be treated as pure personalty so as to pass under a bequest for charitable purposes. The mortgage is dated the 30th of November, 1882, and is in the following form:—[His lordship read the mortgage.] It is objected that it creates a charge on the "rents" and "works"; no question arises as to a charge on the rates under the Public Health Act. The Preston Waterworks Act, 1853, is the earliest in date of the statutes in pursuance of which the mortgage purports to be given, and also the most important for the decision of the present case. [His lordship read the preamble to that Act, and read or stated the effect of sections 3, 4, 12, 39, 41, 43, 45, 51, 53, 54, 55, 56, 58, and 59.] The Commissioners Clauses Act, 1847, by section 75, prescribes a form of mortgage, which has been closely followed in that now before me. Sections 86 and 87 provide, where interest or principal is in arrear, for the appointment of a receiver of the "rates or sums liable to the payment" of such interest or principal, and these clauses closely resemble the analogous sections of the Companies Clauses Act, 1845. [His lordship read or stated the effect of the preamble, and sections 2, 14, 15, 17, 21, and 22 of the Preston Improvement Act, 1869.]

The question raised is, in substance, whether such a mortgage falls within what was laid down by the Court of Appeal in Attree v. Hawe.

Previously to that case there had been a great conflict of opinion as to whether debentures given by railway companies and other public bodies fell within the provisions of 9 Geo. 2, c. 36. In Walker v. Milne, 11 Beav. 507, Lord Langdale held that mortgages by a canal company, containing an assignment of the undertaking and the rates arising by virtue of the Act incorporating the company, did not create interests in land within the meaning of the statute of George II., saying (p. 518): "These securities are framed by authority of the Act of Parliament, plainly with a view to the concern continuing, and not with a view of coming to a court of equity to have it broken up and possession taken by the court." On the other hand, Knight-Bruce, L.J., when Vice-Chancellor, in Ashton v. Lord Langdale, 4 De G. & Sm. 402, declined to follow Walker v. Milne, and held that such mortgages did charge hereditaments—viz., the tolls, if not the land itself by the use of which the tolls are obtained.

In 1867 was decided Gardner v. London, Chatham, and Dover Railway Co., which threw much light on the nature of an ordinary debenture of a railway company containing an assignment of "the undertaking of the company, as defined by the special Act, and the tolls and sums of money arising upon or out of the undertaking by virtue of the Act relating thereto." It was contended that, under such an assignment, the debenture-holders were entitled to a receiver of the proceeds of surplus lands, but the Court of Appeal held otherwise. In arriving at this conclusion it became necessary to consider what one effect of such a debenture was. Lord Cairns (then Lord Justice) says, in his well-known judgment (15 W. R., at p. 329, L. R. 2 Ch. App., at p. 217): "The tolls and sums of money ejusdem generis—that is to say, the earnings of the undertaking—must be made available to satisfy the mortgage; but in my opinion the mortgagees cannot, under their mortgages, or as mortgagees—by seizing, or calling on this court to seize, the capital, or the lands or the proceeds of sales of land, or the stock of the undertaking—either prevent its completion or reduce it into its original elements when it has been completed." Turner, L.J., agreed with the reasons on which this judgment was founded.

In this state of the authorities, Malins, V.C., held, in Holdsworth v. Davenport, that a debenture of a waterworks company, containing an assignment of the undertaking, and the rents, rates, and sums of money arising by virtue of the several Acts relating thereto, did not create an interest in land within the meaning of the statute of George II. His lordship said (p. 1·0):—"I think all questions are now removed by Gardner v. London, Chatham, and Dover Railway Co., which decided that a mortgage-debenture made by a railway company in the form given in Schedule C. of the Companies Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, does not give the debenture-holder a specific charge upon the surplus lands of the company, or the proceeds of the sale of them, so as to entitle him to an order for a receiver of the sale moneys or interim rents. Therefore a mortgagee has only a right to take the tolls, and it follows that he has not an interest which is within the Mortmain Act." On the other hand, in Chandler v. Howell, Hall, V.C., declined to follow Holdsworth v. Davenport, and held that a mortgage by commissioners of the town of Aberystwith containing an assignment of "works, rents, and rates," authorized to be created, reserved, made, and collected by an Act of Parliament, did create an interest in land. In In re Mitchell, Mitchell v. Moberly, 25 W. R. 903, 6 Ch. D. 655, Bacon, V.C., held that a debenture-mortgage made by a railway company in the form given in the schedule to the Companies Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, was pure personalty, expressing his preference for the decision of Malins, V.C., in Holdsworth v. Davenport, to that of Hall, V.C., in Chandler v. Howell, if those decisions were irreconcilable, which, however, he does not appear to have thought they were. Attree v. Hawe, which related not to debentures, but debenture-stock, came, in the first instance, before Hall, V.C., who followed his own decision in Chandler v. Howell. In the Court of Appeal James, L.J., says (p. 347):—"It is to be observed that in the cases of Walker v. Milne, Gardner v. London, Chatham, and Dover Railway Co., and Attree v. Hawe all the judges rely on this, that a different construction of the security would enable the mortgagee to break up and destroy that which was intended by the Legislature to be maintained as a going concern. The head-note to the report of Attree v. Hawe in the Law Reports says that Chandler v. Howell was overruled; it was not, however, expressly overruled, and the learned counsel for the appellants say, in their argument, that 'Chandler v. Howell might well stand with a reversal of the present decision.'" The Court of Appeal did, however, expressly approve of the decision in Walker v. Milne, and it is to be, I think, inferred from the judgment that their lordships approved of the decision of Malins, V.C., in Holdsworth v. Davenport.

The question in the present case, therefore, appears to me to reduce itself to this, whether, notwithstanding difference of language, the mortgage given by the Corporation of Preston to the testatrix is not, in substance, a mortgage of the general undertaking, similar to those which formed the subject of discussion in Gardner v. London, Chatham, and Dover Railway Co., and of decision in Holdsworth v. Davenport. If it be not, then it is an assignment of specific items of property included under the terms "rents, rates, and waterworks" which by the Acts, or any of them, the corporation are authorized to "charge, buy, purchase, and make," and consequently of the works themselves and the site thereof. In opposition to this view of the construction it may be observed that the assignment is to the testatrix, "her executors, administrators, and assigns," not to "her heirs." It would seem, then, that the framers of the mortgage did not imagine they were dealing with anything in the nature of real estate.

A more serious objection is that upon this construction the mortgagees would have it in their power to seize the works and break them up. Can such an intention be attributed to the Legislature? These works have been placed in the hands of a public body, the Corporation of Preston, for an important public purpose, which some, at least, may consider of not less importance than that for which a railway company is incorporated—viz., the providing of an adequate supply of water within the populous and growing borough of Preston. On the corporation is imposed (section 12 of the Preston Waterworks Act, 1853) the obligation of supplying to every dwelling-house within the borough water for domestic purposes. To enable them to discharge that duty they are empowered, not merely to collect rents as the price of the water supplied, but (section 43) to impose rates for the purposes of the Act. They are to appoint officers and servants for the purposes of the Act (section 58), and (sections 21 and 22 of the Preston Improvement Act, 1869) to make and enforce regulations for preventing the waste, misuse, or undue consumption or contamination of the water. It seems to me that the Legislature plainly contemplated that the waterworks should, notwithstanding the mortgages authorized by section 51, continue as a going concern under the control and management of the corporation and upon their responsibility, and that it would be inconsistent with that object if such a construction were placed on the section just referred to, and the mortgages given in pursuance of it.

I think, then, that the words "rents, rates, and works" authorized by the Act to be charged, levied, purchased, and made are to be read and construed in the same way as the words "the undertaking authorized and the rents and rates arising by virtue of the Act." In coming to this conclusion I am fortified by the decision of Chitty, J., in In re Yerbury's Estate.

On behalf of the respondents, much reliance was placed on the case of In re David and on section 55 of the Act of 1853. As regards In re David, it is to be observed that the mortgage there in question contained an assignment simply of the several rates, tolls, rents, and other moneys arising and accruing by virtue of the Acts. There was no assignment of the undertaking nor anything equivalent to such an assignment. There was therefore wanting that which formed the basis of the judgments in Walker v. Milne, Gardner v. London, Chatham, and Dover Railway Co., and Attree v. Hawe; and it was held that, under the circumstances, the mortgage created a specific charge on certain tolls which formed part of the subject-matter of the security. In this case, on the construction of the Preston Waterworks Act, 1853, and the mortgage, I come to a different conclusion. As regards section 55, it is one which (so far as appears by the reports) was not found in the Acts of Parliament under which were issued the securities which formed the subject of decision in Walker v. Milne, Gardner v. London, Chatham, and Dover Railway Co., Holdsworth v. Davenport, and In re Mitchell. I think the case of In re David affords the answer to the arguments founded on it. The provisions of the Swansea Harbour Act, 1854, resembled those of the Act of 1853; and in particular section 108 contained a provision under which moneys to the credit of the Swansea Harbour Fund were to be applied, firstly, in paying interest on borrowed moneys. It was said, however, by the Lord Chief Justice and by Fry, L.J., that these provisions merely operated as directions to the trustees of the fund as to the mode in which the fund was to be applied, and did not affect the construction of the mortgages.

In the present case, with respect to section 55, it seems to me that is a direction to the corporation as to the mode in which the moneys to the credit of the waterworks account are to be dealt with. In support of that view, I may make two observations. Firstly, those moneys to be placed to the credit of that account include, not only "rents" and "rates" within the meaning of section 51, but also all (section 54) "sums of money to be recovered under the provisions of the Act"; and consequently sums (such for example as the penalties and forfeitures referred to in section 59) not included in the mortgages. Secondly, the expenses of carrying the Act into execution are made and charged on the moneys in question no less than the principal money borrowed, and the interest thereon; and although the interest is made a first charge, still, as between payment of principal and payment of expenses, the corporation would have the like discretion as is vested in the directors of a railway company, according to the judgments of Lord Cairns in Gardner v. London, Chatham, and Dover Railway Co., and James, L.J., in Attree v. Hawe. In my opinion the mortgage debt is pure personalty, and the summons must be answered accordingly.

M'MAHON v. NORTH KENT IRONWORKS (LIMITED). (a.)

Company — Receiver — Debenture — Principal not immediately payable—No interest unpaid.

Where debentures include all the property of the company, and the company is insolvent, the debenture-holders are entitled to the appointment of a receiver of the property and assets of the company, although the principal secured by the debentures is not immediately payable, and there is no interest in arrear.

Motion.

This was an application by debenture-holders for an order appointing a Mr. Young receiver of the company's property, although the money secured by the debentures was not immediately payable.

Each of the debentures provided that the company would "on the 1st day of January, 1892, or on such earlier day as the principal moneys hereby secured become payable, in accordance with the conditions indorsed hereon," pay to the registered holder £100, and that the company would in the meantime pay interest at five per cent.; the company thereby charged, by way of floating security, all its property, whatsoever and wheresoever, both present and future, including its uncalled capital for the time being, with the principal moneys and interest thereby secured.

The conditions provided that the debentures should rank as a first charge, and be a floating security; that the principal moneys thereby secured should "immediately become payable (a) if the company makes default for six calendar months in the payment of any interest hereby secured, and the registered holder hereof before such interest is paid by notice in writing calls in such principal money; or (b) if an order is made, or an effective resolution is passed, for the winding up of the company."

None of these events had happened, and the principal was, therefore, not immediately payable. Nor was there any interest in arrear. The company was admittedly insolvent, and its works were closed. A creditor's winding-up petition had been presented, and adjourned to enable the company to pass resolutions for a voluntary winding up. The motion was made in an action brought by a debenture-holder on behalf of himself and all other the debenture-holders to enforce their securities.

Marten, Q.C., and Eve, for the plaintiffs.—We are entitled to the order under the circumstances, although the money is not immediately payable: In re Panama, New Zealand, and Australian Royal Mail Co., 18 W. R. 441, L. R. 5 Ch. App. 318.

K. H. Heath, for the company, did not oppose the motion.

KEKEWICH, J.—In my opinion, upon principle, the application is right, though I am not aware of any direct authority upon the point. As a matter of principle a mortgagee has a right to the protection of his security if it is in jeopardy. Accordingly I appoint Mr. Young receiver of the property and assets of the company comprised in the plaintiffs' security until judgment or further order.

BUDD v. LUCAS. (a.)

Trade-mark—Merchandise Marks Act, 1887 (50 & 51 Vict. c. 28), s. 2, sub-section 1 (d); s. 5, sub-section (1) (d)—False trade description—Invoice of goods.

A false trade description, contained in an invoice delivered with goods, may be an application of a false trade description within the meaning of section 5, sub-section (1), of the Merchandise Marks Act, 1887, although such invoice may not be physically attached to the goods.

Case stated by justices.

The appellant, a licensed victualler, ordered six barrels of beer of the respondent, a brewer, and, in pursuance of such order, the respondent caused to be delivered to the appellant six casks of beer, and the respondent's carman, immediately after delivering them into the appellant's cellar, delivered to him an invoice in which the casks were described as six "barrels," a barrel meaning, according to the usage of the beer trade, thirty-six gallons. One of the six casks delivered would not contain thirty-six gallons, being too small to contain that quantity. The cask had no mark upon it except a number and the name of the respondent's predecessors in the business. The justices refused to receive evidence of previous deliveries by the respondent of casks of insufficient size, and held that the delivery of the invoice was not an application of a false trade description within the meaning of the statute, but stated a case on the application of the appellant.

The questions for the opinion of the court were:

(1) Whether the delivery of the invoice with the casks was an application of a false trade description within the meaning of the Merchandise Marks Act, 1887?

(2) Whether the justices were right in excluding evidence as to previous transactions between the parties?

(3) Whether, assuming that the first question was answered in the affirmative, the respondent was criminally responsible for the acts of his servants?

Poland, Q.C., and Graham, for the appellant.—(1) The statute does not require that the description should be physically attached to the goods. The delivery of the invoice is a sufficient application of the trade description. (2) The evidence as to previous transactions was wrongly rejected: Reg. v. Francis, 22 W. R. 663, L. R. 2 C. C. R. 128. (3) Although the master may not be liable for independent wrongdoing by his servants, he is responsible for having supplied them with casks of deficient capacity.

Channell, Q.C., and Lyttleton, for the respondent.—The description on the invoice is not an application of a false trade description within the meaning of the statute, which aims only at actual false marking of the goods. The full title of the Act shows that the word "apply" was intended to refer only to a physical application. Under any circumstances, the respondent is not liable in the absence of a personal intent to defraud.

Poland, Q.C., replied.

POLLOCK, B.—This case raises a question of very great importance as to the true construction of the Merchandise Marks Act, 1887. The earlier Merchandise Marks Act, that of 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 88), no doubt, dealt with trade-marks, and with nothing else. But the present Act is much wider in its scope: it deals with many things that are not trade-marks, or anything like them. For instance, section 20 renders a person liable to a penalty who falsely represents that goods are made by a person holding a royal warrant. A representation may be within that section although made by word of mouth. Again, in this Act is, for the first time, to be found the expression "trade description," which is treated as something distinguishable from trade-marks or other marks, and is defined to mean "any description, statement, or other indication, direct or indirect," as to the quality or quantity of the goods. Then the definition of the term "apply" in section 5 seems to suggest that it is not to be confined to a physical application, for it provides that a person shall be deemed to apply a trade description to goods who (inter alia) "uses" it "in any manner calculated to lead to the belief that the goods in connection with which it is used are described by that trade description." No doubt the description must be used in connection with goods; but I think we should be cutting down the intention of the Act if we were hold that the delivery of an invoice or other description of the goods at the time of, or immediately after, the delivery of the goods themselves, was not a use in connection with the goods within the meaning of the section. Our answer to the first question submitted to us must, therefore, be that the delivery of the invoice with the cask may have been an application of a false trade description. Whether it was so or not depends upon certain questions of fact which it is for the justices to decide.

Upon the second question, the justices were clearly wrong. There can be no doubt that the evidence tendered was admissible upon the issue of the intent to defraud.

With regard to the last question, all we can say is, that, in our opinion, there is nothing in the present Act to alter the general rule of law, that a master is not criminally responsible for the unauthorized acts of his servants. There are, no doubt, certain Acts of Parliament, such as the Licensing Acts, which do introduce an exception in that respect into the general rule, but this is not one of those Acts.

CHARLES, J.—I am of the same opinion. To the question whether the delivery of the invoice along with the casks was an application of a false trade description within the meaning of the Act, we cannot, in the present state of the case, give a categorical answer. All that we can say is, that it may have constituted the offence with which the respondent is charged. No doubt there was not any physical application of a trade description to the goods, but I do not think that that is necessary. To my mind it is clear, from the language of section 5, sub-section 1 (d), that something more is contemplated than an actual physical connection; and, if so, then I think that the delivery of the invoice with the goods might be a use of a false trade description of the goods delivered. With regard to the other questions, I agree with my brother Pollock.

Case remitted to justices.

MONTGOMERIE v. UNITED KINGDOM MUTUAL STEAMSHIP ASSOCIATION. (a.)

Insurance—Marine insurance—Mutual insurance association—Insurance effected by member—Right of action by person interested, though not a member.

The defendants, a mutual marine insurance association, granted a policy of insurance in the form of a deed poll to a member of the association, who obtained it on behalf of the plaintiff and others, who were part owners of the steamship insured. The policy was granted on condition "that the association shall be liable in the whole only to the extent of so much of the said funds as the said association is able to recover from the members of the said class"; and one of the rules annexed to the said policy was an arbitration clause, that "the sum, if any, to be paid by this club in satisfaction of any claim shall, in the first instance, be settled by the committee and the member," &c., "and payment shall only be claimed according to the customary mode of payment in use in this club." By the 4th article of association, which is incorporated with the policy, a member is defined as "a person who, on behalf of himself or any other person or persons, insures or enters for protection any ship or ships, or share or shares of a ship, in the association"; and the memorandum of association stated that the association was established for "the insurance of ships of members and of ships which the members may be entitled to insure in their own names." The plaintiffs, as part owners of the ship insured, brought an action in their own names on the policy against the defendants.

Held, that the action was not maintainable, as the terms of the policy excluded liability on the part of the defendants to any person other than the "member" with whom the contract was made.

This was a case tried before Wright, J., without a jury. The action was brought by the plaintiff and others, who were part owners of a ship called William Hartmann, to recover a loss on the said ship under a policy of insurance granted by the defendants to the firm of Perry, Raines, & Co., which was a "member" of the defendant association.

The facts and arguments sufficiently appear in the judgment.

Sir C. Russell, Q.C., Barnes, Q.C., and Joseph Walton, for the plaintiffs.

Cohen, Q.C., and James Fox, for the defendants.

WRIGHT, J.—The action is brought on a policy in the form of a deed poll, by which the United Kingdom Mutual Steamship Assurance Association (Limited) covenanted with Perry, Raines, & Co. to pay losses in certain events. Perry, Raines, & Co. are described as having become a member of the association, and as having entered for insurance in class 1 a steamship, The William Hartmann; and the covenant is in consideration of the premises and of the observance by the insured of the rules and regulations. The agreement is that the members having ships entered in the class shall, according to the provisions of the articles of association, and the rules indorsed on the policy, and subject to a proviso, be liable to make good losses upon the ship which may attach to the policy. The proviso is: "In accordance with the articles of association and the rules of the class, this policy and the other policies of the association and class are granted on this condition, and it is hereby specially agreed that the association, under all their policies of insurance of the said class, shall be liable in the whole only to the extent of so much of the said funds as the said association is able to recover from the members of the said class." The question is, whether the plaintiff Montgomerie and the other plaintiffs, who are not named in the policy as covenantees, are entitled to maintain an action in their own names against the United Kingdom Mutual Steamship Association for the amount of the loss which happened to The William Hartmann in the year 1883.

There is no doubt whatever as to the general rule as regards an agent, that where a person contracts as agent for a principal the contract is the contract of the principal, and not that of the agent, and primâ facie, at common law, the only person who may sue is the principal, and the only person who can be sued is the principal. To that rule there are, of course, many exceptions. First, the agent may be added as the party to the contract if he has so contracted, and is appointed as the party to be sued; secondly, the principal may be excluded in several other cases.

He may be excluded if the contract is made by a deed inter partes, to which the principal is no party. In that case, by ancient rule of common law, it does not matter whether the person made a party is or is not an agent. This, however, does not apply here, as this instrument is a deed poll. Another exception is as regards bills and notes. If a person who is an agent makes himself a party in writing to a bill or note, by the law merchant a principal cannot be added. Another exception is that by usage, which is treated as forming part of the contract or of the law merchant, where there is a foreign principal, generally speaking the agent in England is the party to the contract and not the foreign principal, but this is subject to certain limitations. Then a principal's liability may be limited, though not excluded. If the other party elects to sue the agent, he cannot afterwards sue the principal. Again, where the principal is an undisclosed principal, he must, if he sues, accept the facts as he finds them at the date of his disclosure, so far as those facts are consistent with reasonable and proper conduct on the part of the other party. Again, if the principal is sued he is entitled to an allowance for payments which he may have made to his agent if the other party gave credit originally to that agent. Also, and this is very important, in all cases the parties can by their express contract provide that the agent shall be the person liable, either concurrently with or to the exclusion of the principal, or that the agent shall be the party to sue either concurrently with or to the exclusion of the principal.

These principles apply to marine insurance with very little modification, the chief modification of which I am aware being with reference to satisfaction. In matters of insurance, apparently in the interests of the assured, a person may become a principal by ratification although the agent did not insure and did not purport to insure on his behalf expressly or by name, if the agent, in fact, insured on behalf of those who might be interested, though the party was not at that moment ascertained; and a principal on whose behalf an insurance was actually made can ratify the insurance even though at the time of ratification he knows that the subject of insurance—the vessel or whatever it may have been—has been lost. I do not know of any other exception, unless it be that a deed poll in the case of an insurance can be sued upon, not merely by the covenantee or other person who is named in it, but by the person interested on whose behalf the insurance was made. Primâ facie, therefore, the plaintiffs are entitled to sue in this case, but they may be excluded by the terms of the contract and the real question is whether that is the case here.

Now it was held in United Kingdom Mutual Steamship Assurance Association v. Nevill, 35 W. R. 746, 19 Q. B. D. 110, on this very form of contract that the principal, in this case the plaintiff Montgomerie, is excluded from being sued for the premiums, and there appears to be a presumption that rules of that kind are what may be shortly described as correlative. If the plaintiff Montgomerie could not have been sued for the premium, or what is equivalent to the premium, namely, his contribution to the funds of the association, there appears to be a presumption that he and his co-plaintiffs would not be entitled to sue for that which is the consideration for the contribution, namely, the moneys insured.

As Lord Blackburn said in the case of Elbinger Actien Gesellschaft v. Claye, L. R. 8 Q. B. 313, at pp. 316, 317, 21 W. R. Dig. 209, "The right to sue and liability to be sued upon a contract are reciprocal." He points out certain exceptions and afterwards says: "I must say, I think, that the two things are correlative. A man cannot make a contract in such a way as to take the benefit unless also he take the responsibility of it."

The question then is, Have the parties so contracted that Montgomerie and his co-plaintiffs cannot sue, the alternative being that the action should have been brought in the name of Perry, Raines, & Co.? I have come to the conclusion that the parties have so contracted. I think that the rules annexed to the policy and the articles of association which are incorporated with the policy show plainly that it was the intention of the parties that the association should look to the member only for contribution, and should have to deal with, and be entitled to say that they would deal with, the member only in respect of the settlements of losses. Now, the member here is, I think, clearly Perry, Raines, & Co., and, with respect to this particular contract—which was that sued on in United Kingdom Mutual Steamship Assurance Co. v. Nevill, as distinguished from that discussed in Great Britain 100 A1 Steamship Insurance Association v. Wyllie, 37 W. R. 407, 22 Q. B. D. 710—the rule on which I place particular reliance is the arbitration clause. It was plainly in the contemplation of the parties that all settlements under these policies should be made by arbitration, and, when you have to consider who it is that the parties intended should be entitled to sue, it is natural to look to the clause which provides the machinery under which the proceedings against the company are to be taken. The arbitration clause commences as follows:—"The sum, if any, to be paid by this club in satisfaction of any claim shall, in the first instance, be settled by the committee and the member"—not the party entitled—"if he agree to accept such sum (if any) as may be allowed by the committee in full satisfaction of his claim, shall be entitled to demand payment as soon as the amount to be paid has been so ascertained and settled, and not before, and payment shall only be claimed according to the customary mode of payment in use in this club." It then provides that, in case of difference, the matter in dispute is to be decided by two arbitrators, one appointed by the committee and the other by the member making the claim; and these words follow:—"Provided always, and it is hereby expressly agreed, that no action shall be commenced or other proceedings taken in any court or tribunal for recovery of any claim or demand under or by virtue of a policy in this club unless and until the amount thereof in dispute has been decided by arbitration, and the obtaining such decision is hereby declared to be a condition precedent to the right of any member to maintain any such action or other proceeding." The clause has not been insisted upon as an answer to the action; I refer to it as showing who it is that the parties thought was the proper person to deal with the association.

I now turn to the articles of association which are incorporated into the contract. But it may not be altogether immaterial to observe that the memorandum of association speaks only of "insurance of the ships of members, and of ships which members may be authorized to insure in their own names." This leads to the inference that the distinction was present to the mind of the framer of that document. Though a member may insure on behalf of someone else, it is the member, and not the person on whose behalf he insures, that is intended to be insured by the association. As regards the articles of association, by the interpretation clause "member" means member of the association. By the 3rd article of association, "The association shall consist of the several persons who shall for the time being be insured or protected, or shall have entered, or agreed to enter, ships for insurance or protection." Primâ facie that would seem to provide that everyone who had his interest protected by a policy should be in some sense a member of the association. But this is followed by the 4th article: "Definition of members.—Every person who, on behalf of himself, or any other person or persons, insures or enters for protection any ship or ships, or share or shares of a ship, in the association shall, as from the date of the commencement of such insurance or protection, be deemed to have become a member of the association." It appears to me that this is an express provision that those persons only are to be deemed to be members who have on behalf of themselves or anyone else insured or entered for protection any ship or ships. By the 40th article: "Every engagement or liability of a member of the association in respect of any insurance or protection shall, for all the purposes relative to enforcing such engagement or liability, be deemed to be an engagement or liability by or on the part of such member to the association, and not to any other member or members, and all moneys payable thereunder shall be paid to the association." By the 41st article: "All claims in respect of insurance or protection shall be made and enforced against the association only, and not against any members thereof, but"—now come the words which at first sight appear to me to suggest a different construction—"the association shall not be liable to any member or other person for the amount of any loss, claim, or demand, except to the extent of the funds which the association is able to recover from the members or persons liable for the same, and which are applicable to that purpose." But although primâ facie "member or other person" would mean member or other person interested, it appears to me to be consistent with the clause that the words "liable to any member or other person" point to liability to the "other person" through the hands of the member, and it is material to observe that in United Kingdom Mutual Steamship Association v. Nevill, 19 Q. B. D., at p. 119, Fry, L.J., expressly deals with these words, and, after considering the terms of the policy, points out that in his judgment the words "member or other person" mean member or person succeeding to or representing a member in the same way as personal representatives or a trustee in bankruptcy. I need only now refer briefly to the judgments in that case. Lord Esher, M.R., says, at pp. 115, 116: "I think that in the case of such a contract as this under seal it is not allowable to go behind the instrument to make undisclosed principals responsible, because they are not parties, and have not attached their seals to the contract under seal." I do not think, however, that this consideration is the ground of his decision. In this case, if there had been a deed inter partes, it would have been an answer at once that Montgomerie and his co-plaintiffs were not parties to the deed. Lord Esher, M.R., also says, at p. 116: "The association can only sue the member as an assured for what is equivalent to the premium."

It seems to follow that if they cannot sue him as an insurer, neither can they sue the person alleged to be his undisclosed principal as an insurer. If such person can be sued at all it must be as an assured for what is equivalent to the premium. But can he be so sued? He goes on to give judgment to the effect that the principal, corresponding to Montgomerie and the other co-plaintiffs in this case, could not be sued for contributions, and then he says, "I do not think that he is a party to the contract as an undisclosed principal, although he may be a cestui que trust in respect of the proceeds the member may receive. Not being a party he cannot sue or be sued on the contract." The only point for decision in that case was whether he could be sued, but the Master of the Rolls does in terms say that he cannot sue. Fry, L.J., appears to take the same view, though I cannot find that either he or Lopes, L.J., actually express an opinion on that particular point. But Fry, L.J., does deal expressly with the words "member or other person," in article 41, in the manner which I have mentioned.

In the case of Great Britain 100 *A*1 Steamship Insurance Association v. Wyllie, and in the case before Mathew, J., of Ocean Iron Steamship Assurance Association v. Leslie, which is reported in the note to the former case, the question arose upon a Lloyd's policy, which is a totally different form of policy to the deed in this case, and a different conclusion was arrived at. In these cases the decision in United Kingdom Mutual Steamship Assurance Association (Limited) v. Nevill was expressly stated to be entirely consistent with the decision in the Great Britain 100 *A*1 Steamship Insurance Association v. Wyllie, and the decision in the former case was put by the Court of Appeal in the latter case, and by Mathew, J., in Ocean Iron Steamship Assurance Association v. Leslie, on the ground that the association had contracted themselves out of the right to sue Nevill, who, but for the express contract, would have been liable to be sued for his contribution under the general rule of the law, as it was held in these cases that Wyllie and Leslie could be sued for theirs.

For these reasons I think that the action cannot be maintained by Montgomerie, and the co-plaintiffs against the defendants, and that the defendants are, therefore, entitled to judgment.

PAINE v. CHISHOLM. (a.)

Practice—Appeal—Costs—Power to give costs on higher scale—Special grounds—Discretion of judge—Ord. 65, r. 9.

An appeal lies to the Court of Appeal from the order of a judge allowing costs on the higher scale, on the question whether there are any "special grounds arising out of the nature and importance or the difficulty or urgency of the case," under ord. 65, r. 9. If such special grounds are found to exist, the Court of Appeal has no power to interfere with the exercise of the judge's discretion.

Appeal from the decision of Stephen, J.

The action was brought for damages for fraudulent misrepresentation in the sale of a public-house by the defendant to the plaintiff. The trial took place before Stephen, J., and a jury, and lasted eight days, about thirty witnesses being called on either side. The jury returned a verdict for the defendant, and Stephen, J., gave judgment accordingly, and also granted, under ord. 65, r. 9, the defendant's application for costs on the higher scale.

The plaintiff appealed.

The following cases were cited on the question of costs:—In re Terrell, 31 W. R. 208, 22 Ch. D. 473;

(a.) Reported by A. P. PERCEVAL KEEP, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Harrison v. Leutner, 31 W. R. 837, 24 Ch. D. 594; Williamson v. North Staffordshire Railway Co., 32 Ch. D. 399, 34 W. R. Dig. 44.

Feb. 24.—The COURT (Lord ESHER, M.R., and BOWEN and FRY, L.JJ.) dismissed the appeal on the question of fact, but reserved the question of costs for further consideration.

March 9.—Lord ESHER, M.R.—This case is one of considerable importance. The appeal was brought from Stephen, J., and we dismissed the appeal. The further question was then raised whether the learned judge was right in granting the successful party costs on the higher scale. It therefore became a mere question of costs, and we have first to say whether an appeal lies from the decision of a judge giving costs on the higher scale. I think that it does, and on grounds analagous to those on which we held that an appeal would lie on a question of "good cause" under ord. 65, r. 1, when an action had been tried by a judge with a jury. It was then held that an appeal lay on the question whether or not "good cause" existed, but that if once "good cause" were shown to exist the court would not interfere with the exercise of discretion by the judge.

The question now before us turns on ord. 65, r. 9, which is to the effect that costs on the higher scale may be allowed "if, on special grounds arising out of the nature and importance, or the difficulty or urgency of the case," the judge shall so order.

The conditions, therefore, on which the judge may order costs on the higher scale are if there be "special grounds arising out of the nature and importance, or the difficulty or urgency of the case." Those conditions must exist to entitle the judge to exercise his discretion, and if those conditions do not exist he has no discretion which he can exercise. On the question whether there were such special grounds as are contemplated by the rule an appeal therefore will lie, but if those conditions exist the judge would have a discretion with which we could not interfere. We have, therefore, to see whether we agree in this case with Stephen, J., as to the existence of those conditions. For my part, I could wish that the difference between the higher and lower scale were abolished. I think that the granting of costs on the higher scale ought to be regarded with strictness, and rarely exercised. The case of Williamson v. North Staffordshire Railway Co. is, to my mind, a good instance of the method in which the power given by the rule should be exercised. I can see nothing in the nature and importance of this case to constitute special grounds within the meaning of the rule. It was an ordinary case of fraudulent representation, raising questions of no importance but to the parties themselves. There was no difficulty about it, and it cannot be said that it was in any way urgent. Therefore, none of the conditions mentioned in the rule existed, and there were no special grounds on which the judge could order costs on the higher scale. I think, therefore, this part of the judgment must be corrected, and costs on the higher scale disallowed.

BOWEN, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The action was a simple one, of a kind which is constantly going on in the High Court, and I confess I should view with alarm the proposition that in such an action costs on the higher scale should be allowed. In some cases costs are in the absolute discretion of the court, and no appeal lies. There are other cases which are on the border line, where the court has vested in it a discretion on certain conditions, and unless those conditions exist there is no discretion. In those cases we have said that we are bound to inquire whether the conditions exist which give rise to the discretion, and that, if they do exist, then no appeal lies from the exercise of the discretion. The most familiar form of these cases is that arising under ord. 65, r. 1. These cases are of two kinds. In the first an executor, administrator, trustee, or mortgagee complains to the court of appeal that he has been deprived of costs, and the court of appeal has held that it will inquire whether he has unreasonably instituted, or carried on, or resisted any proceedings, within the meaning of the rule, in order to see whether the necessary conditions have been fulfilled to give rise to the exercise of the discretion. So also in cases tried with a jury the question arises whether there was "good cause" for depriving a successful party of his costs. In this latter class of cases we have said that, though we could not examine into the exercise of the discretion, we had power to see whether there was good cause or not, upon which alone discretion could be exercised. The present rule is in pari materiâ. The judge may allow costs on the higher scale if there are special grounds arising out of the nature and importance, or the difficulty or urgency of the case.

If the case is one in which no special grounds arise in any of those ways we must say that those conditions are not fulfilled. What, then, is the extreme latitude of the words used in the rule. Here is, as I have said, a simple case of fraudulent misrepresentation, requiring no extraordinary industry or skill. In Williamson v. North Staffordshire Railway Co. Fry, L.J., points out that special grounds must exist, and that costs cannot be granted on the higher scale merely on account of the difficulty of the case. The importance or difficulty of the case is not in itself a special ground. Cotton, L.J., there said: "Although this case is one of importance and difficulty, I do not think that there are in it special grounds arising out of the nature and importance, or the difficulty or urgency of the case," and therefore he refused to give costs on the higher scale.

No definition of special grounds was there laid down, but the question comes to this, whether, in a simple case like the present, there can be any such special grounds as are contemplated by the rule? I think that there can not. I am sorry to have to differ from the decision of the learned judge.

FRY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. I think the attention of the learned judge was not called to the terms of this rule. The first question is whether an appeal lies. I think that the discretion given by the rule depends on a contingency. Whether that contingency has arisen or not is a subject for appeal. It may be difficult to define the precise meaning of the words "special grounds," but obviously the words were not intended to apply unless there was something peculiar in the case. Then it must be observed that they must be special grounds arising out of the nature and importance, or the difficulty or urgency of the case. I can see no such special grounds here, and therefore I think we must say that the judge had no power to exercise his discretion by giving costs on the higher scale.

CLINK v. RADFORD & CO. (a.)

Shipping — Charter-party — Construction of cesser clause—Demurrage—Detention at port of loading.

In an action brought by shipowners against charterers for damages for detention at the port of loading, the defendants relied on the cesser and lien clauses as freeing them from responsibility.

Held, that the word "demurrage" in the lien clause did not cover undue detention at the port of loading, and, therefore, that the charterers were not exempted from liability.

Where it is possible, the cesser and lien clauses should be construed as co-extensive.

Appeal from judgment of Pollock, B., at trial with jury.

The action was brought by shipowners against charterers to recover damages for detention at port of loading. The defendants relied on the cesser clause in the charter-party.

By the charter-party the plaintiffs' ship was chartered by the defendants for a voyage from Newcastle, N.S.W., to San Francisco. She was to load "in the usual and customary manner a full and complete cargo of coals." The cargo was to be unloaded "at an average rate of not less than 100 tons per working day, . . . or charterers to pay demurrage at the rate of 4d. per ton register per diem, except in case of unavoidable accident." The cesser clause was in the following terms:—"The charterers' liability under this charter-party to cease on the cargo being loaded, the owners having a lien on the cargo for freight and demurrage."

At the trial the jury found that the ship had been detained by the charterers at the port of loading sixteen days beyond what was usual and customary, and the judge held that the cesser clause had no application to damages for detention at the port of loading, and gave judgment for the plaintiffs.

The defendants appealed.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—In this case it seems to me that, without going in detail into the cases, some rules have been clearly laid down by them which enable us to decide the point before us. The principal rule that we have to apply is as to the interpretation in a charter-party of what is known as the cesser clause. The rule on which the courts have acted is this: that unless a cesser clause is expressed in terms so plain and unambiguous that it cannot in any way be evaded, the court will always be inclined to construe it as not applicable to the breach complained of, if by so construing it the shipowner would be left without any remedy for a clear breach of the contract. In other words, the court will not assume, unless it is obliged by the unmistakable language of the clause to do so, that the shipowner intended by the cesser clause to give up his undoubted rights without any mercantile reason or recompense. That being so, the question in this, as in all similar cases, will depend on whether it will appear that the shipowner has any remedy over if the cesser clause be strictly construed. If he has not, the court will not construe the cesser clause in its fullest possible meaning so as to leave him absolutely without a remedy, because it could not have been the meaning of the parties that the cesser clause should have such an effect. That is, I think, the rule laid down in all the cases and adopted by the Court of Appeal. That reduces the question to a simple one. Here we have a breach by the charterer in not loading, as the jury have found, within a reasonable time. If the charterer is not liable for that breach, has the shipowner any remedy for it? That depends on whether the word "demurrage" in this charter-party can be applicable to detention at the port of loading. Looking at the whole charter-party, what are the rights and liabilities of the parties at the port of loading? The charterers must load in the usual and customary manner—that is to say, in a reasonable manner—a full and complete cargo. No doubt an unreasonable delay amounts to a breach of the charter-party, but is there any demurrage applicable to that breach. I think that there is none. There is no mention of any demurrage days, nor is any rate for detention fixed, and therefore I think that in that part of the charter-party, at any rate, there is no demurrage which is in any sense applicable to the breach which has occurred. There is no mention of demurrage at all with regard to detention at the port of loading. Then we come to the provisions of the charter-party relating to the unloading of the ship. There is a provision that not less than 100 tons per working day shall be discharged. That indirectly gives a certain number of days within which the unloading must take place. Then comes a provision that demurrage shall be paid at a certain rate per ton. That is to say, that if the time given for discharging the cargo is exceeded, demurrage at a fixed rate must be paid for all subsequent days. That, therefore, is the demurrage applicable to the discharge of the cargo. It is unreasonable, I think, to say that it also applies to detention at the port of loading. The demurrage is confined to delay at the port of discharge, and has no reference at all to the port of loading. Then what does the word "demurrage" in the cesser clause mean? Surely it refers to demurrage as used in this charter-party—that is to say, demurrage at the port of discharge. No lien, therefore, is given for any damage caused by delay at the port of loading. Therefore, if the cesser clause is to be construed so as to release the charterer from liability for delay at the port of loading, the shipowner would be left without any remedy for the undoubted breach which has occurred. That being so, in accordance with the rule I have stated, the court must say that the cesser clause has no application to the present action, and that the plaintiff is entitled to succeed. An additional reason for holding that the lien has no application to these damages is found in the fact that it is exceedingly inconvenient to apply a lien to an unascertained and unascertainable amount. As I have said, I think it unnecessary to go through all the cases, but I wish to strike once more at that of Bannister v. Breslauer, and to say that if that decision conflicts with the view which I have expressed, that case cannot, in my opinion, be supported.

(a.) Reported by A. P. PERCEVAL KEEP, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

BOWEN, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. We have to construe the cesser clause in this charter-party. There is no doubt that if the parties so choose they may frame a cesser clause in such a way as to emancipate the charterer from all liability without giving the shipowner any lien to compensate him for what he has given up. A cesser clause deals with the cesser of liability and the creation of a lien, and the principle which has been followed by the courts in construing such clauses is one which is obviously reasonable to all commercial minds. Any reasonable man would expect that the lien given by the clause would be commensurate with the liability abandoned by it. That is the principle on which the courts have acted, and which, I think, appears in all the cases. It certainly has been constantly recognized in the long chain of valuable judgments on the subject delivered by the Master of the Rolls.

Applying that principle to the case before us, one would not expect to find the shipowner placing himself at the mercy of the charterer without receiving any equivalent. The question is therefore reduced to a very simple one of construction. If the lien that is given by the clause is to be commensurate with the release of liability, we must examine the extent of the lien in order to ascertain the extent of the liability. The lien is for demurrage. Is the word "demurrage," according to its true construction, to include damages for detention at the port of loading? "The word 'demurrage,'" said Cleasby, B., in Lockhart v. Falk, "no doubt properly signifies the agreed additional payment (generally per day) for an allowed detention beyond a period either specified in or to be collected from the instrument, but it has also a popular or more general meaning of compensation for undue detention." It is, in fact, an elastic word, and can be stretched. Cleasby, B., goes on:—"When the charter-party contains no clause allowing demurrage at a specified rate it has been held that the word 'demurrage' in the exception clause applies to detention, and that the charterer is discharged as soon as the cargo is on board." That was the case in Bannister v. Breslauer. We have, therefore, to look at the charter-party in order to see in which sense it is to be construed. Primâ facie the lien is only created as a convenient means of obtaining payment of liquidated sums, or sums which are capable of being ascertained, and although by agreement it may be extended to unliquidated sums, that is an inconvenient course to pursue. All the cases, with the exception of Bannister v. Breslauer, are cases in which there was in the charter-party some practical means of assessing the damages due for the delay. Bannister v. Breslauer can only be supported (if at all) on the ground that no other meaning could be given to the word "demurrage" in that particular charter-party. The present charter-party contains provisions as to demurrage—in its strict sense—at the port of discharge, but there is no provision relating to demurrage at the port of loading. Therefore, in my opinion, the word "demurrage" in the cesser clause must be construed in its strict sense, which is the more convenient and natural sense, and must be limited to matters which come under the term as previously used in the charter-party. It follows, therefore, that the cesser clause has no application to the present action.

FRY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. It seems to me that the rule to be applied is well ascertained. The cesser and lien clauses must, unless there is express reason to the contrary, be read as co-extensive. If not, we should have a liability destroyed, and no lien created in compensation. If that were so, what would be the use of the stipulation as to loading. It would, I think, to any mind be unreasonable to hold the contrary; the court will not, unless it is driven to it, so construct a cesser clause. The clause must, if it is reasonably capable of bearing the meaning, be read as creating a lien co-extensive and commensurate with the liability which is released by it. As Amphlett, B., said in Kish v. Cory, "There are two ways, and two ways only, in which that injustice could be remedied—either to say the charterers' liability to cease does not go beyond the freight and demurrage properly so called which was subject to the lien, or to say that demurrage where mentioned in the lien clause includes what may properly be called detention." The next point is as to the meaning of the word "demurrage" in the cesser clause. The word has two significations, as has already been said. It is plain to my mind that the word in the cesser clause is the same as the word in the charter-party; that is to say, it relates to demurrage strictly so called, demurrage at the port of discharge, and not demurrage at the port of loading. Except when driven by stress of circumstances, the court will never apply a lien to unliquidated damages. This cesser clause lends itself easily to the more restricted meaning of the word "demurrage." The clause speaks of demurrage "under this charter-party." Those words must be addressed to payments made in accordance with the terms of the charter-party, and not to unliquidated damages arising from a breach of its provisions.

Appeal dismissed.

SERRAINO v. CAMPBELL. (a.)

Shipping—Bill of lading—Usual excepted perils—"All other conditions as per charter"—Charter-party containing further excepted peril—Exception of loss occasioned by negligence.

By a bill of lading goods were to be delivered, "the act of God, the Queen's enemies, fire, and all and every other dangers and accidents of the seas, rivers, and navigation of whatever nature and kind soever excepted, unto order or assigns, they paying freight for the said coals, and all other conditions as per charter, with average accustomed." The charter-party contained a clause specifying the same exceptions as the bill of lading, with the following addition:—"Negligence clause as per Baltic Bill of Lading, 1885." This negligence clause excepted strandings and collisions, and all losses and damages caused thereby, even when occasioned by the negligence, default, or error in judgment of the pilot, master, mariners, or other servants of the shipowners. The vessel stranded in consequence of the negligence of the master or crew, and the goods were lost. In an action by the indorsees of the bill of lading against the shipowner for the loss of the goods,

Held (affirming the judgment of Huddleston, B.), that the words in the bill of lading, "all other conditions as per charter," incorporated only such conditions as were to be performed by the receiver of the goods, and did not incorporate the negligence clause; and that the shipowner was therefore liable.

Russell v. Niemann, 17 C. B. N. S. 163, 12 W. R. C. L. Dig. 121, approved.

(a.) Reported by F. G. RUCKER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Appeal by the defendants from the judgment of Huddleston, B. (ante, p. 112).

The question was whether the words in a bill of lading, "all other conditions as per charter-party," incorporated into the bill of lading a clause, contained in the charter-party, excepting loss occasioned by negligence.

French, Q.C., and Joseph Walton, for the defendants.—The negligence clause is incorporated into the bill of lading by the words of reference. The result of the authorities is that the words "all other conditions as per charter" introduce into the bill of lading all the conditions of the charter-party which are not inconsistent with the rest of the bill of lading: Gray v. Carr, 19 W. R. 1173, L. R. 6 Q. B. 522; Porteus v. Watney, 27 W. R. 30, 3 Q. B. D. 534; Gullischen v. Stewart, 32 W. R. 763, 13 Q. B. D. 317; Gardner v. Trechmann, 15 Q. B. D. 154, 33 W. R. Dig. 190. The negligence clause is not inconsistent with the exceptions specified in the bill of lading; it merely adds one more excepted peril. The case of Russell v. Niemann, 17 C. B. N. S. 163, 12 W. R. C. L. Dig. 121, cannot be held to be good law since the decision in Gray v. Carr. The remarks of Lords O'Hagan and Blackburn in the unreported case of Taylor v. Perrin, approving of Russell v. Niemann were merely obiter dicta.

They also cited Delaurier v. Wyllie, 17 Court Sess. Cas., 4th series, 167, and Hamilton v. Mackie, 5 Times L. R. 677.

J. G. Barnes, Q.C., and Lawson Walton, Q.C., for the plaintiffs.—The true effect of the words of reference is to introduce into the bill of lading only those conditions which are to be performed by the consignee. This was the meaning of the decision in Gray v. Carr, and all the other cases are consistent with it. It has never before been suggested that Russell v. Niemann had been overruled. The negligence clause is inconsistent with the bill of lading, which is a contract to carry, unless prevented by certain excepted perils. It cannot have been the intention of the parties to the bill of lading to vary their contract by introducing another excepted peril.

They also cited Smith v. Sieveking, 3 W. R. 411, 4 W. R. 25, 4 E. & B. 945, 5 E. & B. 589.

Cur. adv. vult.

Dec. 19.—Lord ESHER, M.R.—In this case the plaintiffs, who are consignees of cargo by indorsement of a bill of lading, sue the shipowner for non-delivery of the cargo according to the terms of the bill of lading. The defence is that the goods were lost owing to a cause which brings the case within one of the exceptions. As a matter of fact, the ship stranded owing to the negligence of the master or some of the crew. The words on the face of the bill of lading specifying the exceptions are—"the act of God, the Queen's enemies, fire, and all and every other dangers and accidents of the seas, rivers, and navigation of whatever nature and kind soever excepted." On the construction of that alone, it is clear that a stranding of the ship through the negligence of the master or crew does not come within the exceptions. But then follow these words, and on them the defendant relies: "unto order or assigns, they paying freight for the said coals, and all other conditions as per charter, with average accustomed." The shipowner says that these words bring into the bill of lading an exception in his favour to be found in the charter-party. The charter-party incorporates the negligence clause of the Baltic Bill of Lading; that is to say, among the exceptions contained in the charter-party is stranding, although caused by the negligence of the master or crew. The question is, can the defendant say that this exception is brought into the bill of lading?

Those words, "all other conditions as per charter-party," have been the cause of much litigation. A meaning was put on them in Gray v. Carr. It was there contended that the effect of the words ought to be limited by reference to the preceding words, "he or they paying freight," and that they were only applicable to matters ejusdem generis with the payment of freight. But the decision came to this, that the words brought into the bill of lading all the conditions in the charter-party which were to be performed by the receiver of the goods. The cases which have followed are merely instances showing a practical mode of carrying out that decision. First, all the conditions of the charter-party are to be read into the bill of lading; then, if some of them are too large, so as not to be applicable to a bill of lading at all, they are to be struck out. These cases have not enlarged the doctrine of Gray v. Carr, but have in some respects limited it.

Further, I think that the decision in Gray v. Carr followed the interpretation put on these words by Willes, J., in Russell v. Niemann. I think that that learned judge did not mean to limit the application of the words to such matters as the payment of freight, but that his meaning was the same as that of the majority of the court in Gray v. Carr—viz., that the words applied to all conditions to be performed by the consignee. And I have come to the conclusion that that is the construction which we ought to put on the words.

Now an exception of perils caused by negligence is not a condition to be performed by anybody. No exception of perils is a condition to be performed by anybody. Therefore these words do not incorporate any exception of perils; and the negligence clause, which is one of the exceptions of perils in the charter-party, is not introduced into the bill of lading. This exception in the charter-party seems to me to be absolutely useless, and I can only conclude that when the shipowners granted bills of lading in this form, they neglected to see the effect of what they were doing. The bill of lading specifies certain excepted perils, and the words of reference to the charter-party not applying to excepted perils at all, the exception of perils is not enlarged. The defendant is therefore liable to the plaintiffs for the loss of this cargo. I think that our decision is in accordance with Russell v. Niemann, and that that case is not overruled by or inconsistent with Gray v. Carr. The appeal must be dismissed.

The plaintiffs in this case are indorsees of a bill of lading and owners of goods carried in the defendants' vessel to be delivered at Trapani, in the island of Sicily, shipped by Messrs. Fisher, Renwick, & Co. The goods were lost by the negligence of the defendants, the vessel having stranded at Mazzara.

The charter-party, which was in the ordinary form, was signed by Fisher, Renwick, & Co. "as agents for the charterers." It contained in print the usual exceptions, "the act of God, the Queen's enemies, fire, and all and every other dangers and accidents of the seas, rivers, and navigation of whatever nature and kind soever during the said voyage," and in writing at the end, "Negligence clause as per Baltic Bill of Lading, 1885."

It was contended on the part of the defendants that the plaintiffs were parties to the charter-party, Fisher, Renwick, & Co. being their agents, and, therefore, that the plaintiffs, as principals, were bound by all the terms of the charter-party; but, if they were not actual parties to the charter-party as principals, they were to the bill of lading, which, it was contended, incorporated all the provisions of the charter-party, including the Baltic clause. There was no evidence to show that Fisher, Renwick, & Co. were agents, apart from the fact that they so described themselves. The contract between Fisher, Renwick, & Co. and the plaintiffs was contained in letters and telegrams discussing the price, and concluded with a letter of December 12, in which Fisher, Renwick, & Co. wrote:—"Referring to telegrams exchanged between us, we confirm sale to your good selves of a cargo of large Newcastle steam coal at 19s. 6d. per ton c. i. f. Trapani"; and the invoice was made out by Fisher, Renwick, & Co. as vendors to the plaintiffs as purchasers.

This makes it clear beyond doubt that the contract was a contract of sale and purchase, and that Fisher, Renwick, & Co. were principals to the charter-party, and that the plaintiffs were not directly bound by it.

It was, however, contended that the bill of lading incorporated all the provisions of the charter-party, including the Baltic clause. The bill of lading provided that the goods shipped by Fisher, Renwick, & Co. were to be delivered at the port of Trapani, "the act of God, the Queen's enemies, fire, and all and every other dangers and accidents of the seas, rivers, and navigation of whatever nature and kind soever excepted, unto order or assigns, they paying freight for the said coals, and all other conditions as per charter, with average accustomed." The question is whether "all conditions as per charter" imported into the bill of lading the Baltic clause.

The Baltic clause provided that "strandings and collisions, and all losses and damages caused thereby," were to be excepted, "even when caused by the negligence, default, or error in judgment of the pilot, master, mariners, or other servants of the shipowner."

As a general rule it may be laid down that when bills of lading are in the hands of strangers to the charter-party, either as original shippers, or as indorsees to whom the property has passed, they show the contract under which the goods are being carried; and the shipowner's claims, exemptions, and lien on the cargo given by the charter-party are not preserved as against such shippers or indorsees, except so far as those terms of the charter-party are expressly incorporated in the bill of lading.

In Russell v. Niemann one of the questions was whether the exception contained in the bill of lading was expanded by the exception in the charter-party. The exception in the bill of lading was "the act of God, the King's enemies, fire, and all and every other dangers and accidents of the seas, rivers, and navigation of whatever nature and kind soever excepted." The exception in the charter-party was "the act of God, enemies, fire, restraint of princes, and all and every dangers and accidents of the seas, rivers, and navigation of whatever nature and kind soever during the said voyage excepted." After the exception in the bill of lading were the words, "paying freight for the said goods and all other conditions as per charter-party." Willes, J., in giving judgment said, "We now proceed to give judgment on the second point, which is whether the exception contained in the bill of lading is expanded by the exception in the charter-party. That depends on whether the words "and other conditions as per charter-party" include all the stipulations and conditions contained in that instrument, or whether they are not limited to conditions ejusdem generis with that previously mentioned—viz., payment of freight, conditions to be performed by the receiver of the goods. It is a mere question of language and construction, and we think it enough to say that the latter is the construction which we put upon those words." Here is a distinct decision of Willes, Byles, and Keating, JJ. If this case has not been overruled, and there is no other case inconsistent with it, it remains law and governs this case. It was suggested that Gray v. Carr is inconsistent with it. It is not in any way inconsistent. Russell v. Niemann was cited in argument, but was not referred to in any of the judgments. Gray v. Carr was in the Exchequer Chamber, and was decided in 1871, Russell v. Niemann in 1864. It is scarcely conceivable that Willes, J., who concurred in the judgment given by Brett, J., describing it as a judgment written with such full and accurate acquaintance with the mercantile and maritime law applicable to the subject that he would not attempt to add anything to it, should have forgotten his previous decision, which had been cited before him, or meant to overrule it, or thought the case he was then deciding inconsistent with it. Russell v. Niemann is entirely in accordance with Gray v. Carr.

The question in Gray v. Carr was whether the shipowner's lien was preserved as against the bill of lading holder, whether the contract in the bill of lading which the holder is presumably bound to perform incorporated the terms of the charter-party as to the loading, as well as those which related to matters subsequent to the shipment. Great differences of opinion were expressed as to the effect of a bill of lading which made the goods deliverable "unto order or to his or their assigns, he or they paying freight and all other conditions or demurrage (if any should be incurred) for the said goods, as per the aforesaid charter-party." The question was whether this entitled the shipowner, as against the bill of lading holders, to the benefit of a clause in the charter-party by which the owners were to have "an absolute lien on the cargo for all freight, dead freight, demurrage, and average," in respect of certain demurrage which had been incurred at the port of loading before the bill of lading had been granted. The Queen's Bench and a majority of the Exchequer Chamber held that the clause entitled the shipowner to a lien for the demurrage at the port of loading, and that by the terms of the bill of lading this right was preserved against the consignees. On the other hand Willes and Brett, JJ., held that the words would be satisfied by making them apply to damages in the nature of demurrage for delay at the port of discharge. It will be observed that this decision in no way touches the decision in Russell v. Niemann, where it was held that the words "all other conditions as per charter-party" did not include all the stipulations contained in the charter-party, but were limited to conditions ejusdem generis with those previously mentioned—viz., conditions to be performed by the receiver of the goods.

It cannot be said that the Baltic clause is such a condition. It is not a condition to be performed by the consignees. The words "all other conditions" must be construed with reference to the preceding words "paying freight for the coals," and include only such conditions as are ejusdem generis with the payment of freight, conditions to be performed by the receiver of the goods.

It seems to be unnecessary to refer to the other cases cited. Suffice it to say that none of them are inconsistent with Russell v. Niemann. I will only add that Russell v. Niemann was recognized and approved of in the case of Taylor v. Perrin, a case unreported, but the shorthand writer's notes of which I have seen. Lord O'Hagan describes Russell v. Niemann as a perfectly well-decided case. Lord Blackburn says: "The case which has been referred to, Russell v. Niemann, in which Willes, J., gave judgment, as it appears to me, perfectly correctly, decided that the reference to the charter-party is meant to bring in those conditions which would apply to the person who has taken the bill of lading and is taking delivery of the cargo, such as the payment of demurrage, the payment of freight, the manner of paying, and so on, but is by no means to be taken to incorporate all the conditions of the charter-party."

I am of opinion that this case is governed by Russell v. Niemann, and that the judgment of the learned judge was right, and that this appeal should be dismissed.

KAY, L.J., delivered the following written judgment:—We have to construe a bill of lading, dated December 20, 1887, which expresses that certain steam coals have been shipped on The John Banfield, then in the river Tyne, and bound for Trapani, which were to be delivered there in good order, "the act of God, the Queen's enemies, fire, and all and every other dangers and accidents of the seas, rivers, and navigation, of whatever nature and kind soever, excepted, unto order or assigns, they paying freight for the said coals, and all other conditions as per charter-party." The question is, what is the effect of these last words?

"They paying freight and all other conditions" primâ facie signifies they paying freight and performing or observing all other conditions. "They" are the consignees, or their assigns, to whom this bill of lading is given. It is a contract between the shipowners and the consignees. The actual difficulty arises thus. The charter-party (amongst other conditions) contains one as to excepted risks in much larger terms than the exception of risks in the bill of lading. It is a contract between the defendants and Fisher, Renwick, & Co. that the ship shall load coal in the Tyne and proceed to Trapani, and deliver the coal there to the order of Fisher & Co., or their assigns, for a freight at a specified rate per ton, "the freighter to pay all customary dues and duties on the cargo and the ship and all other charges (the act of God, the Queen's enemies, fire, and all and every other dangers and accidents of the seas, rivers, and navigation, of whatever nature and kind soever, during the said voyage, always excepted)." The charter-party (amongst other things) provided that the liability of Fisher & Co. as to all matters and things in every respect, as well before and after as during the shipment, is to cease as soon as the cargo is shipped, and then follow these words, which create the difficulty, "Negligence clause as per Baltic Bill of Lading, 1885."

The Baltic Bill of Lading contains this negligence clause: "Strandings and collisions, and all losses and damages caused thereby, are also excepted, even when occasioned by negligence, default, or error in judgment of the pilot, master, mariners, or other servants of the shipowners." But for this addition the excepted risks in the charter-party and in the bill of lading which has to be construed would be in the same terms, save that the words "during the voyage" are added in the charter-party. The additional exception of strandings and collisions occasioned by negligence is not among the risks expressly excepted in the bill of lading. Is this additional exception imported into the bill of lading by the words, "and all other conditions as per charter-party"? If the clauses as to excepted risks in the charter-party are to be written into the bill of lading, in addition to the clause on that subject already there, that would be to repeat the clause already in the bill of lading, and to add this further clause, "excepting certain risks occasioned by negligence." Can it, by any fair mode of construction, be said that the referential words, "all other conditions as per charter-party," oblige us to do this?

Apart from authority, I should say, that as the bill of lading has expressed what risks are to be excepted, which means that the goods shall be delivered to the consignee unless prevented by some of these excepted risks, this express contract could not be altered by such general words of reference, which cannot fairly be construed to incorporate into the bill of lading conditions in the charter-party relating to matters already expressly provided for in the bill of lading.

Even grammatically this reading may be the only true one. It is "other conditions." Other than what? Other than freight, certainly. But why not also other than the matters expressly provided for in the bill of lading? Suppose it had expressly provided for freight at a less amount than in the charter-party, would these words introduce the extra amount stipulated for in the charter-party?

A contract must be read without bias in favour of either of the parties to it. But where one of those parties has introduced a stipulation for his own benefit, it is an equally well-settled rule that, if the meaning be doubtful, the other party to the contract shall have the benefit of the doubt. The same rule is expressed in other words by saying that if the shipowner meant to add to the risks specifically enumerated in the bill of lading, he was bound to make this quite clear on the face of the contract; see per James, L.J., in German v. Chapman, 26 W. R. 150, 7 Ch. D. 276.

The plaintiffs are the owners of the cargo and the indorsees of the bill of lading. They sue the shipowner for damages because the cargo was lost by stranding of the ship owing to negligence of the officers and crew, the damages claimed being the value of the cargo, less freight. If the view I have indicated be the true construction of the bill of lading, they must recover, because the negligence clause, though in the charter-party, is not imported into the bill of lading.

It was suggested at the bar that the charterer and consignee were really the same person; but counsel did not insist upon this, and I do not think it could be maintained. But the argument has been that the matter is settled against the consignee by authority which is binding upon us.

The precise question arose in Russell v. Niemann, where the bill of lading excepted certain specified risks, and then contained the words, "paying freight for the said goods and all other conditions as per charter-party." The charter-party excepted the same risks and others, and the question was, whether the further exception of other risks was introduced into the bill of lading. The court, consisting of Willes, Byles, and Keating, JJ., held that it was not; the judgment of the court upon this point, delivered by Willes, J., being that the words "all other conditions as per charter-party" were "limited to conditions ejusdem generis with that previously mentioned—viz., payment of freight—conditions to be performed by the receiver of the goods."

It is urged that this decision has been overruled. No case expressly overruling or dissenting from it has been cited; and in 1883 Lord Blackburn, in his speech in the House of Lords in an appeal in Taylor v. Perrin, gave to it the sanction of his high authority. However, that was not one of the actual grounds on which the case in the House of Lords was decided, and, therefore, is not binding as a judgment of the House of Lords, and we have accordingly to consider the cases which, though they do not profess to overrule Russell v. Niemann, are said to be inconsistent with it. In all of them it is treated as a question construction of the particular bill of lading. The contest in many of them was whether the consignee was liable for demurrage, the general rule being that he is not, to quote the words of Lord Campbell, "unless the bill of lading makes the goods deliverable on payment of demurrage, or contains equivalant words." In Wegener v. Smith, 15 C. B. 285, 3 W. R. Dig. 214, the words in the bill of lading were that the goods were to be delivered "against payment of the agreed freight and other conditions as per charter-party." This was held to mean, some payment beyond freight stipulated for in the charter-party, which must be demurrage. In Smith v. Sieveking Lord Campbell, C.J., delivered the judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench, entirely approving the last case, and holding that demurrage at the port of loading was not payable by the consignee where the words in the bill of lading were "paying for the goods as per charter-party," because by those words "the reference to the charter-party must be considered merely to ascertain the rate of freight," and paying for the goods did not mean paying for the detention of the ship by the charterer. These authorities, and all others that I have consulted, concur in showing that the immediate context of the words in the bill of lading to be construed is of great importance, and that, where the words are placed, as in this case, in a clause which begins, "the consignees paying freight and all other conditions," &c., the bill of lading must be read to refer to conditions to be observed by the consignee.

Gray v. Carr was one of the cases most relied on by the appellants. There the words in the bill of lading were "he or they paying freight and all other conditions, or demurrage (if any should be incurred) for the said goods as per the aforesaid charter-party." The words "and all other conditions" were added in writing in a printed form. The shipowner claimed against the consignees named in the bill of lading a lien on the cargo (1) for demurrage at the port of lading, (2) for dead freight—i.e., freight for part of the ship which ought to have been filled with cargo, but was not—and (3) for damages for detention beyond the demurrage days. The majority of the judges in the Exchequer Chamber held that a lien was given by the charter-party for demurrage proper, but not for detention beyond the demurrage days, nor for dead freight, and that the right of lien for demurrage was imported by the bill of lading into the contract between the owner and the consignee. The difficulty as to this was that the charter-party did not provide for demurrage at the port of discharge, but only at the port of loading; and very weighty reasons were given by the present Master of the Rolls against construing the bill of lading so as to make the consignee liable for demurrage incurred before his goods were on board and before the bill of lading was signed. It was pointed out that in Wegener v. Smith the demurrage claimed had accrued in the port of delivery by default of the consignee: but in Gray v. Carr demurrage was actually mentioned in the bill of lading; the word is used, and the reference to the charter-party as to demurrage could not have any meaning except to secure to the owner as against the consignee the lien given by the charter-party for the only demurrage there contemplated—viz., demurrage at the port of loading.

However, the principal matter which we have now to consider is whether this case overruled or weakened the authority of Russell v. Niemann. The decision is certainly not in the least inconsistent with it. Russell v. Niemann was cited, but none of the judges intimated any disapproval of it, and it seems to me that the two cases may very well stand together.

The next case relied on is Porteus v. Watney in the Court of Appeal. The words in the bill of lading were:—"On paying freight for the said goods, and all other conditions as per charter-party." The charter-party provided for demurrage at the port of discharge. The ship seems to have been employed as a general ship, and the goods of the particular consignee were in the main hold, under the goods of other shippers who failed to take away their goods in proper time; so that, without any fault of the defendants, three days' demurrage was incurred before they obtained delivery. They were held liable. That is to say, the condition as to demurrage at the port of delivery was imported into the bill of lading by the words "all other conditions." This decision, again, seems to me quite consistent with Russell v. Niemann. Demurrage at the port of delivery might reasonably, according to that case, be held to be one of the payments to be made by the consignee under the words "paying freight for the said goods and all other conditions as per charter-party," and, though it was a hard case on the particular consignee, that could not be a sufficient reason for saying that he had not so contracted.

In Gullischen v. Stewart Brothers, under like words, an attempt was made to import into the bill of lading a clause in the charter-party making the responsibility of the charterers cease as soon as the cargo was on board, and thus leaving the shipowner no right of action against the consignee for demurrage at the port of discharge. This attempt was defeated by the judgments of Pollock, B., and Lopes, J., who both held that, in considering what clauses were to be imported into the bill of lading, the cesser clause must be rejected. Their decision was affirmed in the Court of Appeal, Lord Coleridge, C.J., saying:—"Those words are incorporated which are consistent with the liabilities arising upon the bill of lading, and not those which are inconsistent." Lord Esher, M.R., said:—"The clause as to cesser of the charterers' liability is not incorporated." Bowen, L.J., said:—"The bill of lading incorporates certain provisions of the charter-party, but not the clause as to cesser of liability."

In Gardner v. Trechmann the words were "other conditions as per charter-party"; and it was argued that those words made the consignee liable for an amount of freight stipulated for in the charter-party which exceeded the amount specified in the bill of lading. This was rejected, Lord Esher, M.R., saying that the general reference to the charter-party only brought into the bill of lading "those clauses of the charter-party which are applicable to the contract in the bill of lading; and those clauses of the charter-party cannot be brought in which would alter the express stipulations in the bill of lading." Cotton and Lindley, L.JJ., agreed. The last words I have quoted appear to me to confirm the conclusion at which I have arrived in the present case. They are perfectly consistent with Russell v. Niemann, which is, as I think, supported by this decision of the Court of Appeal. Hamilton v. Mackie seems to have decided that these words of reference would not introduce into the bill of lading a clause for reference to arbitration of any dispute upon the charter-party.

I must say that, in my opinion, it is inexpedient to lay down a rigid rule of construction, such as that contended for by the appellants. We have been urged to hold that the authorities which I have examined have determined that all the clauses of the charter-party, or at least all those that can be made to relate to a contract between the shipowner and the consignee, are to be read into a bill of lading containing these usual words of reference, and then those clauses which are inconsistent, which it is argued means contradictory to something in the bill of lading, are to be disregarded. If, for "disregarded," you say "rejected," that is equivalent to not reading them in at all. I do not agree that this is the true result of the authorities. I hold the true result to be, that in each case the court must decide, from the context and such surrounding circumstances as it is bound to regard, which clauses of the charter-party are to be incorporated into the bill of lading by such words as "all other conditions as per charter-party," and that where, as in Russell v. Niemann and in the present case, certain risks are expressly excepted in the bill of lading, it is not a legitimate construction of the clause of reference to give it the effect of importing other and larger exceptions because they are contained in the charter-party.

In my opinion the appeal should be dismissed.

NATIONAL BANK v. SILKE. (a.)

Cheque—Crossing—Negotiability—Words restricting negotiability—Bills of Exchange Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 61), ss. 8, 29, 35, 73, 81.

A cheque payable to order or bearer can only be rendered not negotiable by writing across the face of the cheque a direction, in clear and unambiguous language, that the cheque is not negotiable.

The defendant drew a cheque on his own bank for £450, payable to the order of M., and wrote across the face of the cheque, between two parallel cross lines, the words "The account of M. at the N. Bank." M. indorsed the cheque and sent it to the N. Bank, who were his bankers, to be placed to his credit. At that time M.'s account at the N. Bank was slightly overdrawn. The N. Bank placed the cheque to M.'s credit, but, before they had presented the cheque for payment at the bank of the defendant, M. drew on the N. Bank for, and received payment of, a sum slightly less than the amount of the cheque in question. When the N. Bank presented the defendant's cheque at the bank of the defendant, payment was refused by the direction of the defendant, which had been given to his bank in the meantime.

The N. Bank had applied to M. to repay them the sum they had advanced him on the cheque in question, and, M. not complying, the N. Bank, in its own name, sued the defendant, as the drawer of the cheque, for the amount of the cheque.

Held, that the words written across the face of the cheque did not restrict its negotiability; that the N. Bank were holders of the cheque for value in due course; and, consequently, that they were entitled to recover from the defendant, as the drawer, the amount of the cheque.

Appeal from the decision of Day, J.

The defendant Silke had drawn a cheque on the Alliance Bank, Camden Town branch, for £450, payable "to the order of J. F. Moriarty," and had written across the face of the cheque the words "Account of J. F. Moriarty, National Bank, Dublin." Moriarty, on receiving the cheque, wrote his name on the back of it, and sent it by post to the National Bank, Dublin, who were his bankers, requesting them to credit his account with the amount of the cheque, and the National Bank, on the day they received the cheque, wrote to Moriarty that they had placed the cheque to his credit. On the day Moriarty sent the cheque to the National Bank his account had been slightly overdrawn; and the day after the cheque had been received by the National Bank, but before the bank had sent it to London to be cashed, Moriarty drew on his account at the National Bank for, and received payment of, a sum of £400. When the defendant's cheque was presented by the National Bank at the Alliance Bank, London, payment of it was refused by the direction (given in the meantime) of the defendant. The National Bank immediately informed Moriarty that the cheque for £450 had been returned to them unpaid, and requested him to send them a remittance. Moriarty failing to comply, the National Bank brought this action to recover the sum of £450 from the defendant, as the drawer of the cheque, the plaintiff bank claiming to be bonâ fide holders of the cheque for value in due course.

Section 8 of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, provides: "(1) When a bill [of exchange] contains words prohibiting transfer, or indicating an intention that it should not be transferable, it is valid as between the parties thereto, but is not negotiable. (2) A negotiable bill may be payable either to order or to bearer. . . . (4) A bill is payable to order which is expressed to be so payable, or which is expressed to be payable to a particular person, and does not contain words prohibiting transfer or indicating an intention that it should not be transferable."

By section 35: "(1) An indorsement is restrictive which prohibits the further negotiation of the bill, or which expresses that it is a mere authority to deal with the bill as thereby directed, and not a transfer of the ownership thereof, as, for example, if a bill be indorsed 'Pay D. only,' or 'Pay D. for the account of X.,' or 'Pay D. or order for collection.' (2) A restrictive indorsement gives the indorsee the right to receive payment of the bill, and to sue any party thereto that his indorser could have sued, but gives him no power to transfer his rights as indorsee unless it expressly authorizes him to do so."

By section 73: "A cheque is a bill of exchange drawn on a banker payable on demand. Except as otherwise provided in this part" [that is, Part III. of the Act, which is headed "Cheques on a Banker"], "the provisions of this Act applicable to a bill of exchange payable on demand apply to a cheque."

Day, J., held that the plaintiffs were entitled to recover.

The defendant appealed.

Crump, Q.C., and T. Willes Chitty, for the appellant.—The words "The account of J. F. Moriarty, National Bank," written across the face of the cheque render the cheque not negotiable, and prevent Moriarty transferring to anyone else the right to sue on the cheque: Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, s. 8, sub-sections (1) and (4). The effect of that section is to alter the law as laid down in the case of Bellamy v. Majoribanks, 7 Ex. 389, on which case Day, J., relied. The words of the crossing indicate an intention that Moriarty alone is entitled to the money, and that the National Bank are merely collectors for him. The National Bank are not holders of the cheque in due course within section 29 of the Act of 1882, and have no right to sue on the cheque themselves. [LINDLEY, L.J.—Does section 8 apply to cheques payable on demand?] Yes, that section embraces cheques: McLean v. Clydesdale Banking Co., 9 App. Cas. 95, 32 W. R. Dig. 35. Cheques are defined by section 73 to be bills of exchange payable on demand. Section 35 shows there may be restrictive indorsements. The effect of Bellamy v. Majoribanks was discussed in Smith v. Union Bank of London, 24 W. R. 194, 1 Q. B. D. 31. [BOWEN, L.J., men-

Sidney Woolf, Q.C., and Houghton, for the plaintiffs, the respondents, were not called on.

LINDLEY, L.J.—The question in this case is, whether the National Bank is entitled to sue the defendant upon a cheque drawn in this particular form. [The Lord Justice stated the facts, and proceeded:—] It has been contended that the bank cannot maintain this action because they have no right to sue upon the cheque at all; that the words "the account of J. M. Moriarty" written across the cheque restricted its negotiability, and that it was not a transferable or negotiable instrument, and consequently that no one can sue upon it but Moriarty himself. It must be remembered that the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, which governs this question, contains special provisions relating to cheques. I am not satisfied that a cheque payable to order or bearer can be made not negotiable in any mode except that which is expressly pointed out in section 81 of the Act, that is, by writing the words "not negotiable" across it; but it is not necessary to decide this point now. But I think that those who intend that a cheque drawn to order or to bearer shall not be negotiable, must say so distinctly and unmistakably, for it is of the utmost importance that cheques shall not be embarrassing documents. I doubt whether section 8 is intended to apply to cheques. But assuming (without deciding the point) that section 73 of the Act of 1882 makes section 8 apply to cheques, and that it is possible to draw a cheque payable to order or bearer and at the same time to add words to it restricting its transferability, or indicating an intention that it shall not be transferable, I am clear that those words must be so plain that they cannot be mistaken. Ambiguous words will not do. A cheque drawn to order or bearer must not be made a puzzle. The words used in the present case, "Account of J. F. Moriarty," certainly do not "prohibit transfer" of the cheque. Do they "indicate an intention that it should not be transferable?" I think not. The utmost they can amount to is a direction to the National Bank to place the amount of the cheque to the credit of Moriarty's account for the purpose of enabling Moriarty to draw on his account for the amount of the cheque; but the words were not put on the cheque for the purpose of preventing the document being transferable. Any other construction would be utterly inconsistent with the nature of a document which was made payable to order or bearer.

The only other question is whether the National Bank are holders of the cheque in due course and for value. The answer is plain. The cheque was not sent to them merely for collection; it was sent to them in order that they should place the amount to the credit of Moriarty, so that he might draw upon it, and he did so. I think the argument that the bank were merely his agents to collect the amount is untenable. The bank are bonâ fide holders of the cheque for value in due course, and this appeal must be dismissed.

BOWEN, L.J.—I am of the same opinion, and will add nothing on the first point. As to the second point, whether or not the National Bank are holders for value in due course, it is plain from the discussion in the House of Lords in the case of McLean v. Clydesdale Banking Co.—and, indeed, it was plain enough to commercial men before—that when a cheque is sent to a bank to be placed to the credit of a particular customer, and that bank places the amount to his credit, and allows him to draw upon it, they are holders of the cheque for value and in due course.

FRY, L.J.—I concur, and I will add only a few words on the first point. I am far from certain that section 8 of the Act was not intended to classify bills of exchange under the following heads—viz., in sub-section 1, bills which were not negotiable; in sub-section 2, bills which were negotiable; these being divided by sub-sections 3 and 4 into bills payable to bearer and bills payable to order. If that be so, then a bill payable to order must always be a negotiable bill, and cannot be made otherwise. But, assuming that a bill payable to order can be made not negotiable, still I am clearly of opinion that the words used here do not render the cheque not negotiable. Much clearer words must be used to countervail the effect of the use of the words "to the order." I think the decision of the learned judge in the court below was correct, and that this appeal must be dismissed, with costs.

SPENCE v. DODSWORTH. (a.)

Practice—Affidavit—Description of deponent—R. S. C., 1883, ord. 38, r. 8.

The word "gentleman" is a sufficient description of a deponent to an affidavit made for the purpose of proving the balance due on a mortgage, or (semble) in all cases where the weight of the affidavit does not depend on the status of the deponent.

Motion.

This was an ex parte motion asking the court to direct the Central Office to file an affidavit. The affidavit was made for the purpose of proving the balance due on a mortgage, and the deponent was simply described as "gentleman."

The Central Office refused to file the affidavit, relyon In re Orde, 31 W. R. 801, 24 Ch. D. 271.

Kenyon Parker applied for a direction that the affidavit be filed.

CHITTY, J.—The affidavit must be filed. In In re Orde the Lords Justices did not lay down a general rule that when the deponent is described merely as a "gentleman" the affidavit cannot be filed, but only in cases of affidavits of fitness of proposed new trustees. In such cases as those in which the court has specially to consider the weight of the deponent's opinion some better description ought to be given.

WITHERBY v. RACKHAM. (a.)

Married woman—Reversionary personal estate—Legal chose in action—Life policy—Assignment—Malins' Act (20 & 21 Vict. c. 57).

Malins' Act applies to a reversionary legal chose in action, such as a policy of life assurance, as well as to reversionary equitable choses in action, of a married woman.

Summons.

This was a summons by a purchaser under a sale in a foreclosure action to be relieved from his contract under the following circumstances:—

In 1863 a lady, then a widow, insured her life for £2,000. She married again in 1873, and some time afterwards she and her husband assigned the policy to one Rackham by deed duly acknowledged under Malins' Act. On a recent sale of the policy by Rackham's executrix, under the direction of the court, the purchaser took the objection that the Act did not apply to legal choses in action such as policies, and applied to be relieved of his contract.

Farwell, Q.C., for the purchaser.—The objection is based on the note to Wolstenholme's Conveyancing Acts, 5th ed., p. 185, where the learned author doubts whether Malins' Act applies to simple choses in action of this nature, though he admits that it applies to equitable choses in action.

He referred to Honner v. Morton, 3 Russ., at p. 86, and Lewin on Trusts, p. 23.

Byrne, Q.C., and Martelli, referred to the common form grants of probate and administration.

CHITTY, J., stated the facts and continued:—The purchaser takes the objection that the Act does not apply to the assignment of a policy, because it is a legal chose in action. It is, of course, a reversionary chose in action, as the married woman could not sue on it during her life, but her executors could sue on it after her death.

Now the Act enables a married woman, with the concurrence of her husband, and by a deed duly acknowledged, to dispose of every future or reversionary interest, whether vested or contingent, belonging to her, or her husband in her right, in any personal estate whatsoever to which she shall be entitled under any instrument made after December 31, 1857 (with certain exceptions), and also to release or extinguish any power.

The general object of the Act was to extend the powers which a married woman already possessed over real estate, to reversionary personal estate, not, indeed, to all personal estate, but only to that acquired by an instrument made after December 31, 1857. It is said that the terms "any personal estate whatsoever" are not sufficiently wide to include a chose in action, but I cannot follow this argument. The term "personal estate" is well known to the law. The older forms of grants of administration spoke of "all and singular the personal estate and effects," and the most recent forms omit the words "and effects," though I do not think that is of any importance. It is quite clear that the words "personal estate" enable the administrator to take possession of chattels, and to bring actions and recover choses in action. Again, in the forms of decrees against executors or administrators, the same term is used, and an account is directed against them of the "personal estate" which has come to their hands. This includes debts and choses in action. It is also used where it is necessary to distinguish between pure and impure personal estate. The well-known treatise of Joshua Williams on the subject is called Principles of the Law of Personal Property, but a large portion of the book is placed under the heading "Of Personal Estate generally." Under this heading the author speaks of choses in action, distinguishing legal from equitable choses in action, and giving examples of each, and, in fact, apart from the doubts expressed by the learned conveyancer, it would be scarcely necessary for me to travel through these instances of the use of the term "personal estate."

During the course of the argument I asked Mr. Farwell whether, in construing the Act, he could make any distinction between legal and equitable choses in action. The Act points to no such distinction, but a great many of the interests dealt with would be equitable choses in action, such as in the case of a fund vested in trustees. The assignment of such a reversionary interest was the very case that wanted improvement, and it was to get rid of the difficulties with which such assignment was beset that the Act was passed. I cannot see the slightest ground for cutting down the fair and proper meaning of the words "any personal estate whatsoever," which seem clearly to include both legal and equitable choses in action. Here the chose in action is legal, and may fairly and technically be described as personal estate. I therefore think the married woman in this case had a reversionary interest in any personal estate whatsoever within the Act, and her conveyance bound it. The purchaser's objection is therefore overruled.

Summons dismissed.

Solicitor—Costs—Charging order—"Property recovered or preserved"—Money paid into court by a defendant—Counter-claim—Set-off—Solicitors Act, 1860 (23 & 24 Vict. c. 127), s. 28—Ord. 22—Ord. 19, r. 3.

The defendants in an action paid a sum of money into court, and put in a defence denying liability and a counter-claim arising out of the same matters as the claim. The plaintiff's solicitor obtained a charging order upon the fund in court. The action proceeded, and, in the result, judgment went for the plaintiff on the claim, and for the defendants on the counter-claim.

Held, that the sum recovered on the counter-claim must be set off against the sum recovered on the claim, and the solicitor's charging order limited to the balance due to the plaintiff, that being the only sum "recovered or preserved" within the 28th section of the Solicitors Act, 1860.

Appeal from chambers.

This was a motion by the defendants to discharge or vary a charging order made ex parte by Huddleston, B., on the 1st of November, 1890, and confirmed by Pollock, B., on the 12th of the same month.

The plaintiff had executed certain repairs to the defendants' ship, and brought his action to recover a sum of money for the work done, and also damages for trespass in respect of an attempt by the defendants wrongfully to take the ship out of the plaintiff's possession.

In compliance with an order of Lawrance, J., the defendants paid £745 into court, and it was in respect of this sum that the charging orders were obtained. At the same time they put in a defence and counter-claim, in which they denied liability and alleged that the plaintiff's charges were excessive, and that there had been delay in the delivery of the ship to them.

The plaintiff did not obtain payment out of the money in court, but proceeded with the action. At the trial Denman, J., referred the matter (except the question of the trespass, as to which the plaintiff obtained a verdict for £15) to the official referee. He found that £465 was due to the plaintiff upon the claim, and £210 to the defendants upon the counter-claim.

Charles, J. (who took the action on further consideration for Denman, J.) at first ordered that £255 should be paid out to the plaintiff, and the balance of the sum in court to the defendants; but on finding that the charging order had been made, he ordered that no payment out should be made until the court had decided to what extent the charging order affected the fund.

This motion asked that the order of Pollock, B., might be discharged or varied by a direction that the charge of the plaintiff's solicitor for his costs should extend only over the amount (if any) which might thereafter be ordered to be paid to the plaintiff out of the money in court.

E. U. Bullen, for the motion.—The only property recovered or preserved by the plaintiff's solicitor is what the plaintiff will actually receive, the balance of the amount successfully claimed by him after the sum due to the defendants on their counter-claim has been deducted—viz., £255. The defendants have a right to set off the amount as to which they have succeeded, and that right is not affected by the solicitor's lien: Pringle v. Gloag, 27 W. R. 574, 10 Ch. D. 676; Lloyd v. Jones, 27 W. R. 655; Rowland v. Williams, W. N., 1885, p. 169.

H. F. Dickens, contrà.—The plaintiff might have taken this money out of court; it is therefore property "recovered or preserved" within the 28th section of the Solicitors Act, 1860: Emden v. Carte, 30 W. R. 17, 19 Ch. D. 311; Moxon v. Sheppard, 38 W. R. 704, 24 Q. B. D. 627. This fund in court would not have existed but for the solicitor's exertions, and his charge is upon the whole fund, whether it all belongs to his client or not. The counter-claim is, in effect, a separate action: Amon v. Bobbett, 37 W. R. 329, 22 Q. B. D. 543, and the defendants have no right of set-off. [WILLS, J.—But qualifications of that view of a claim and a counter-claim are stated in that case. Lord Esher says they are separate actions "for the purposes of taxation," and Bowen, L.J., "for the purposes of justice."]

He also cited Shrapnal v. Laing, 36 W. R. 297, 20 Q. B. D. 334.

Bullen, in reply.—This counter-claim is clearly not a separate action, for it arises out of the contract upon which the plaintiff is suing; it is nothing more than a set-off: Young v. Kitchin, 26 W. R. 403, 3 Ex. D. 127; Government of Newfoundland v. Newfoundland Railway Co., 13 App. Cas. 199, at p. 213, 36 W. R. Dig. 46.

WILLS, J.—I am clearly of opinion that the claim of the plaintiff's solicitor cannot be maintained. The result which Mr. Dickens has contended for would be very unfair. He argued that, this £745 having been paid into court with a denial of liability, the plaintiff was entitled to take it out, and that it was, therefore, "recovered" or at least "preserved." I think that this is a fallacy; but if the argument were correct, the solicitor's lien would only attach in respect of the solicitor's costs up to the date of the payment into court, for the subsequent proceeding did not preserve, but jeopardized the fund. But the fund was not at the disposal of the plaintiff; he could only take it by abandoning the rest of his demand. In the case of Emden v. Carte that difficulty had been cleared out of the way; the plaintiff had abandoned the rest of the claim, and the sum was at his disposal; therefore, the language which was most accurately used in reference to the facts of that case would be quite fallacious if applied to the facts which are now before us. The sum paid into court was not preserved by the solicitor, but was left in jeopardy, and has become in part the property of the defendant. That is an end of that part of the case.

Then it was argued that the claim and the counter-claim are really two independent actions; but in all the cases to which we were referred in support of that view qualifications were introduced which quite take away their applicability to the present case, and we are, therefore, left unfettered by those decisions. This is not a question of taxation of costs, and as for "purposes of justice," I cannot imagine anything more unjust than the result which we are asked to bring about. If we look at the rule upon which counter-claims are founded (ord. 19, r. 3) we find that the court or a judge may, "if in the opinion of the court or judge such set-off or counter-claim cannot be conveniently disposed of in the pending action, or ought not to be allowed, refuse permission to the defendant to avail himself thereof." I should think that in most cases if the counter-claim relates to a matter totally unconnected with the claim that jurisdiction would be exercised. But the cross claim in this action is intimately connected with the claim, and it would be preposterous to deny the defendants' right to set up the counter-claim. The whole dispute is one action, and should have one result. Although, for the purposes alone of giving proper directions to the taxing master, the form of the judgment gives a certain sum to the plaintiff on the claim, and a certain sum to the defendant on the counter-claim, yet the sum recovered is the sum effectively recovered, the result of the whole litigation. I cannot express my opinion in better words than those used by Hall, V.C., in Robarts v. Buck, 26 W. R. 393, 8 Ch. D. 198, at p. 200, where he says: "The principle is that where a solicitor is employed in a suit or action he must be considered as having adopted the proceedings from the beginning to the end, and acted for better or worse. His client may obtain costs in some matters in the suit or action, and not in others, and the solicitor takes his chance, and may ultimately enforce his lien for any balance which may appear to be in favour of his client." It seems to me that on principle this claim fails, and the lien attaches only to the balance for which the plaintiff really gets his judgment, and which is the sum recovered in the action.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J.—I am of the same opinion. The argument of Mr. Dickens upon the first point which he raised, seems to be based upon a passage on page 174 of the Annual Practice, 1890—1. He contended that when the defendants had paid money into court under order 22 then the lien of the plaintiff's solicitor attached, and that the plaintiff's solicitor is entitled to a charging order upon the whole of the fund paid in, no matter what may be the result of the action. An argument which would lead to a result so monstrously unjust only requires to be stated to answer itself.

As to the right of set-off, it was admitted that where judgments can properly be set off one against another, a charging order must be limited to the balance; but it was said that where you have, as here, a claim and a counter-claim flowing out of the same matters, the amount recovered by the defendant on his counter-claim cannot as of right be set off against the amount recovered by the plaintiff on his claim. There may be cases in which the claim and the counter-claim are so foreign to each other that set-off does not arise; but here they arise out of the same contract, and there is an undoubted right of set-off. The case of Mersey Steamship Co. v. Shuttleworth, 32 W. R. 245, 11 Q. B. D. 531, decided that a counter-claim was so much in the nature of a set-off that a plaintiff was not entitled to judgment upon a claim which was admitted until the counter-claim was disposed of. The whole must be treated as one action. It follows that when the claim and the counter-claim arise out of the same matters the charging order must be limited to the balance recovered.

Order varied accordingly.

REG. v. VREONES. (a.)

Criminal law—Attempt to pervert the course of justice—Manufacturing false evidence—No litigation in esse—Legal tribunal—Body of arbitrators for settlement of disputes.

A person may be convicted of a misdemeanour for manufacturing false evidence for the purpose of perverting the course of justice, although the evidence be never used in any legal proceedings, and no litigation be in esse at the date of the offence.

It is sufficient if the prisoner has done what was in his power to place the false evidence before a judicial tribunal. A body of arbitrators, provided for by a contract for the settlement of disputes arising out of it, is a judicial tribunal for this purpose.

Case stated by Denman, J., for the opinion of the court.

The facts were as follows:—

On December 11, 1889, a corn merchant named Stephens, at Bristol, entered into a contract with Sevastopulo & Co. for the purchase of a cargo of wheat to arrive by s.s. Whinfield. The wheat was to be of two different qualities, of which samples called "standard samples" had been given to the purchaser. About half of the cargo was to consist of each quality. The contract contained the following clause:—

"Difference in quality shall not entitle the buyer to reject, except under the award of arbitrators or the committee of appeal as the case may be. All disputes arising out of this contract between the parties hereto shall be referred according to the rule indorsed," and the obtaining an award was to be a condition precedent to the right of either contracting party to sue the other in respect of any claim arising out of the contract.

(a.) Reported by T. R. COLQUHOUN DILL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Rule 10, indorsed on the contract, provided that all disputes should be referred to arbitration, and that in the event of one of the parties neglecting to appoint an arbitrator, upon the application of either of them the question in dispute should stand referred to two arbitrators to be appointed by the executive committee of the London Corn Trade Association.

The award of any two arbitrators was to be subject, in case either party should be dissatisfied therewith, to an appeal to the committee of appeal elected for that purpose, and in accordance with the rules and regulations of the London Corn Trade Association in force at date of contract.

The "standard samples" were in this case, as usual, sealed by the seller's broker in presence of the buyer's broker and kept by him, and the money provided for by the contract was paid. A portion of the wheat from which the sealed standard samples were taken was at the same time taken by the buyer and put in a bag by him to be shown to persons who might be inclined to deal with him. This is called the "bought samples."

The Whinfield arrived on March 15, 1890, when, in accordance with the usual practice, a superintendent (in this case the prisoner Vreones) was appointed by the seller, and Brookman, the buyer's under-foreman, by the buyer, to take samples of the wheat as it came up from the hold. These samples were taken according to custom for the purpose of being used as evidence in case any arbitration should take place as to the quality of the cargo, and are called the "arbitration samples."

In the present case ninety of these samples were taken, forty-five of each kind of wheat, and in the ordinary course sealed by the prisoner for the seller and by Brookman for the buyer.

The fraud alleged in the indictment consisted in the fraudulent tampering with these arbitration samples after they were sealed by both parties. It was proved at the trial that the ninety arbitration samples were taken to the house in which Vreones lodged before being sent to London to be kept by the London Corn Trade Association in order to be used in evidence in any arbitration which might be held under the contract. It was proved that the prisoner tampered with these arbitration samples by pulling down a portion of the tops of the bags through the string on the side opposite to the seal, then cleaning the contents from cockles, rye, and small wheat by sifting, picking, and using flannel, to which the cockles adhered, and replacing the wheat, so cleansed, in the bags without breaking the seals, so as to produce a very much better sample than the standard samples and than any of the other samples taken from the bulk. The motive suggested for this conduct was that, in case of any dispute arising as to the quality of the cargo, the purchaser might be defeated by the production of these samples before any arbitrators who might be appointed.

The evidence showed that there was no substantial difference between the cargo and the standard samples so far as the first quality of wheat was concerned, but as regards the second quality it was proved that there was an inferiority which would amount to £112 in value in that portion of the cargo as compared with the standard samples.

No arbitrators were, in fact, appointed, nor did the purchaser take any steps in that direction, the reason assigned being that the arbitration samples as altered, having been found on comparison superior to the standard sample, and to all the samples fairly taken by either or both parties, it would have been hopeless to proceed to arbitration.

The first count of the indictment charged the prisoner for that he, "contriving and intending to deceive the said arbitrators so to be appointed as aforesaid . . . and by fraudulent and deceitful means to cause and induce such arbitrators to give their award in favour of Sevastopulo & Co., and so to pervert the due course of law and justice," unlawfully altered the character of the samples in the manner above described.

The prisoner was tried at the Bristol Summer Assizes, and convicted. Denman, J., stated this case for the opinion of the court. The question argued was whether the first count of the indictment contained a statement of an indictable misdemeanour.

Charles Mathews, for the prisoner.—The first count of the indictment is bad; there is no averment that this evidence was ever used, nor of the existence of any legal proceedings in which, or tribunal before which, it could have been used. The allegation is merely that the defendant put himself into a position in which he might have committed a misdemeanour in an event which never happened. [Lord COLERIDGE, C.J., referred to Hawkins' P.C., ch. 69, s. 10, Subornation of Perjury: "But it seemeth clear that if the person incited to take such an oath do not actually take it, the person by whom he was so incited is not guilty of subornation of perjury; yet it is certain that he is liable to be punished not only by fine, but also by infamous corporal punishment," and remarked that the prisoner had done all that was in his power to make the offence complete. Poole, Q.C., mentioned Rex v. Crossley, 7 T. R. 315.] The obtaining of the award was a condition precedent to instituting any legal proceedings, and the act of the prisoner was too remote from such proceedings to be an indictable offence: Reg. v. Heath, Russ. & Ry. 184. [Poole, Q.C.—That case is explained by Reg. v. Fuller, at page 308 of the same volume.]

Poole, Q.C., and Bernard Coleridge, for the prosecution, were not called upon to argue.

Lord COLERIDGE, C.J.—This case raises no doubt a very important question, but when the matter is looked carefully into the difficulties which have been raised vanish. It is in substance an indictment for attempting to mislead a judicial tribunal, which might be, but had not yet been, called into existence, by the manufacture of false evidence, and the question is whether that is a misdemeanour.

Now, I cannot doubt that if the act is completed it is a misdemeanour; that to mislead a court by the manufacture of false evidence is a misdemeanour. Then the question arises whether it is an attempt to mislead, although in point of fact the court was not misled, because the piece of evidence manufactured was not used—whether that makes any difference, or whether it does not still remain a misdemeanour. I am of opinion that it is a misdemeanour, and none the less because the evidence in this case was not used in point of fact. All that the prisoner could do in the matter he did.

There was a contract, and it was contemplated that disputes upon the contract might arise, and the mode of settling these disputes, and the tribunal before which they should come, were provided for in the contract, and a particular kind of evidence, which, if not conclusive (as I think by the words of the contract it was to be), would, at all events, be of the greatest possible weight, was also provided for either by the contract or by the course of practice or usage at the port, and was part of the contract. According to that stipulation, samples were to be taken by both buyer and seller, and those samples were to be carefully taken, and were to be put into sealed bags, and the bags were to be sent up to London, to be used by the tribunal to be appointed according to the terms of the contract. It is admitted frankly by Mr. Mathews—indeed, it is found by the learned judge—that all the prisoner could do to tamper with these samples, and, therefore, to corrupt the evidence, and in that respect to mislead the tribunal in London, was done. He, so to say, sifted the samples, and made those samples which were samples of very imperfect wheat, samples of perfect wheat by taking out, by a process which is described, everything which interfered with the perfection of the samples. Having done that, and having done it in a very clever and ingenious manner without breaking the seals of the bags, he transmitted the bags to the court in London. As a matter of fact, they were not used. It is said that because they were not used the offence was the less complete. I am of opinion that it clearly was not the less complete.

It seems to me upon principle that an attempt to pervert the administration of justice, which this clearly, to my mind, was, whether successful or not, is in itself a misdemeanour; it is a thing for which a man may be indicted and punished. But although I should have held that, without any hesitation upon principle and upon what seemed the good sense of the thing, I find there is abundant authority to show that that has been so held in point of law, not in this exact case, because, as I have said (I am afraid only too often) one never finds a case exactly similar in all its circumstances and quite on all fours, but I have found in Hawkins' Pleas of the Crown and in the case of Rex v. Crossley, the principle laid down in the case of subornation of perjury, that the attempt to suborn perjury is complete and punishable, although the perjury is never, in point of fact, committed, because the person who has undertaken to swear falsely was not called, or because, when he was called, he did not swear falsely, but swore the truth. The guilt of the person in making the attempt to pervert the course of justice is just the same whether he succeeds in perverting it or no, and Lord Kenyon and Lawrence, J., in the case of Rex v. Crossley, point out in very forcible language that it would be monstrous to hold otherwise, and make the guilt or innocence of the person who has done and completed the act, to depend upon what the judicial result of his act is, that result being in the power of another person. Lawrence, J., expressly meets the objection, and says that it would have been just the same if the affidavit which was used in that case had not been used at all. I agree that that is not exactly this case, because, upon the swearing of a false affidavit, taking the oath and signing the affidavit, the act of the swearer (the perjurer) is complete and he can do no more. Now, although here the act is not exactly the same, yet in principle it is the same, because the act of the prisoner in this case was completed when he sent the samples in their perverted shape to the tribunal in London which might use them. Therefore, in my opinion, a perfectly good offence is stated in the first count of the indictment, and it is not denied that the evidence abundantly supported the fact of the guilt of the prisoner if he were liable to a criminal indictment. I think he was liable to a criminal indictment, and, therefore, on the first count it appears to me that this indictment should be sustained and the conviction affirmed.

POLLOCK, B.—I have come to the same conclusion. This is an indictment for a fraud or cheat at common law, and if it had been a charge against the prisoner of cheating individuals—or, as it is called, private cheating—I should have felt myself bound to give effect to the forcible argument of Mr. Mathews on two grounds—first, that the act done was in the nature only of an inchoate act; and, secondly, there was no evidence that any person had been actually injured by that cheat. These two propositions appear to me to be clearly necessary conditions precedent in the case of a private fraud. But the truth is, this is not the case of a private fraud, but comes within the rule of law as laid down in East's Pleas of the Crown, at ch. 18, s. 4, that "all frauds affecting the Crown and the public at large are indictable, though arising out of a particular transaction or contract with the party." And one of the instances he gives there is this:—"There is a precedent of an indictment against a married woman for pretending to be a widow, and as such executing a bail-bond to the sheriff for one arrested on a bailable writ." Now I am quite clear in my own mind that what I have spoken of as a condition precedent—namely, the injuring of the individual being necessary to be proved before the prisoner can be convicted—does not arise in this case, and for a very obvious reason. It may be said that it is a mere naked lie if a person is guilty of some cheat unless you prove that the person to whom the lie is told is injured thereby. In the case of legal proceedings it would be impossible to have a worse case than knowingly to put forward such false affidavit or evidence; and yet it could not be proved for certain to be the cause of injury to a plaintiff or a defendant whose rights would have to be determined by the verdict of the jury or the magistrates, or whatever the form of the tribunal was, before which these parties came. Therefore the real vice and the real offence pointed at is the doing of some act which has a tendency to pervert the administration of justice.

Then a further question arises. The samples which the defendant handled, by a previous arrangement were delivered to an association in London to be used at any trial which might take place before arbitrators. Is that tribunal to be considered in the same light as an ordinary public tribunal for the administration of justice? It is not a Crown court, it is not a civil court, it is not merely a method agreed upon by the parties for the determination of a commercial dispute; it is a tribunal to which special sanction is given by the court, and the acts of which are carried out by the court when a provision is made that the submission to arbitration might be made a rule of court. The only remaining question is whether this act was complete on the part of the prisoner, and that has been so fully dealt with by my lord that I do not propose to add anything myself on that point. I think, therefore, that the first count is good, and that the evidence in support of it establishes the offence charged.

STEPHEN, J.—I am of the same opinion as my lord, and for the same reasons.

CHARLES, J.—I am of the same opinion.

LAWRANCE, J.—I entirely agree.

Conviction affirmed.

Prob. Div. & Adm. Div. Admiralty. } Nov. 10; Jan. 27.

"THE CURFEW." (a.)

Shipping—Demurrage—Construction of charter-party—"Vessel to load always afloat"—"Lighterage, if any, to complete loading at" specified dock, "to be at merchant's risk and expense."

Stipulations in a charter-party of a vessel chartered to load in a specified dock, that the vessel should load always afloat, and that lighterage, if any, necessary to enable her to complete her loading at the dock in question was to be at merchant's risk and expense, do not entitle the merchant to recover from the shipowner lighterage paid in respect of cargo which could, in ordinary course, have been loaded from the quay inside the dock whilst the vessel remained afloat, but was in fact loaded outside the dock from lighters merely because the vessel, if fully loaded inside the dock, must have waited a week before she would have had sufficient water to have passed over the dock sill.

This was an appeal from the decision of the judge of the City of London Court in an action for freight and demurrage instituted on behalf of the owners of the steamship Curfew against the Atlantic Patent Fuel Co. (Limited), who in such action claimed a set-off and counter-claim, the particulars of which were as follows:—

1. Balance due for trimming under charter-party of the 14th of March, 1889	26	5	0
2. Cost of taking balance of cargo round from the North Dock (where by the said charter-party she was to load) to the Prince of Wales Dock, where she improperly went . . .	15	1	6
3. Cost of taking thirty more tons of fuel round to the Prince of Wales Dock as aforesaid than she was able to ship	1	6	8
4. Damages for breach of warranty by the plaintiffs that the said ship was expected ready to load about the 10th of April, as provided by the said charter-party, whereas she was not ready to load till the 1st of May, or for not using reasonable despatch in proceeding or getting to the North Dock, so as to be ready to load about the 10th of April, or so that she might be expected ready to load about the 10th of April . . .	171	14	4
	£214	7	6

The charter-party referred to in the above-stated particulars of set-off and counter-claim provided (inter alia) that the steamship Curfew should sail and proceed to the company's loading berth, North Dock, Swansea, and there load, always afloat, a full and complete cargo of about 2,100 tons Atlantic Patent Fuel, with option to charterers of loading part coal at the railway tips, and that lighterage, if any, necessary to enable steamer to complete loading at North Dock, Swansea, to be at merchants' risk and expense.

The judgment of the judge of the court below was as follows:—

Mr. Commissioner KERR.—In the case of The Curfew the plaintiff's claim is for a balance of freight —£42 12s. 9d.—which is admittedly due; and the second item of his claim is for demurrage to the amount of £16 10s., a certain portion of which is due if his contention on the hearing is well founded.

On the hearing three of the hours were abandoned, and I was of opinion that three other hours were improperly wasted, and therefore the claim for demurrage under the second item will be reduced to ten guineas, which the plaintiff is entitled to recover, unless this counter-claim can be sustained.

Now this counter-claim depends upon whether evidence was admissible to explain the terms of the charter-party. The charter-party provided (I recollect two features of it) that the vessel should always be afloat, and that in certain cases lighters should take goods to the vessel, which expenses were to be paid by the merchants, and I was asked to admit evidence to explain these clauses of the charter-party, which, it was contended on behalf of the defendants, I ought not to do. However, upon hearing the parties, I did admit the evidence. If I was wrong in so doing it must be set right in the court of appeal. If I was right in admitting that evidence, then the counter-claim which is set up for the defendants, except for the amount of £1 6s. 8d., cannot be entertained. Even if I was wrong in admitting evidence to explain the charter-party, I think that the fourth item of the counter-claim—namely, £171 14s. 4d.—is in no case maintainable. Whether the £26 5s. and the £15 1s. 6d. were recoverable was the question. I hold that these items are not recoverable, because, upon the evidence received, it was necessary that the steamer should leave the dock. That she was entitled so to do by the arrangement of the parties by that charter-party is explained by the evidence not altering, but explaining these clauses, and therefore the £26 5s., which forms the first item, and the £15 1s. 6d., which forms the second item of the counter-claim, are not recoverable by the defendants. That being so, there will be judgment for the plaintiff for the first item of his claim, £42 12s. 9d., and for ten guineas, making a total of £53 2s. 9d.

There will be judgment on the counter-claim for the defendants as regards the item of £1 6s. 8d., although I quite believe that that item of the counter-claim never would have been started or made against the plaintiff unless an opportunity had been offered of bringing the counter-claim forward, of course, the costs will be given to the plaintiff, who is entitled to recover £53 2s. 9d., less that item of the counter-claim, with costs.

Nov. 10.—The action was now heard before the President and Butt, J., sitting together as a divisional court of the Probate, Divorce, and Admiralty Division.

Sir W. Phillimore and Pyke, for the appellants, the Atlantic Patent Fuel Co., defendants in the court below.—The Curfew could have been loaded "always afloat" in the North Dock, Swansea, and there is therefore nothing in the charter-party or otherwise rendering the defendant liable to bear the lighterage, the expense of which has been incurred in this case merely for the benefit of the shipowners.

They referred to Parker v. Winlow, 7 E. & B. 942, 6 W. R. C. L. Dig. 95; Horsley v. Price, 31 W. R. 786, 11 Q. B. D. 244; and Pringle v. Mollett, 6 M. & W. 80.

Barnes, Q.C., and Laing, for the respondents.—The intention of the parties, as shown by the evidence rightly admitted to construe the charter-party (Lewis v. The Great Western Railway Co., 26 W. R. 255, 3 Q. B. D. 208, per Bramwell, L.J.), was that the expenses of lighterage of such portion of the cargo as would have loaded The Curfew too deep to go over the dock sill of the North Dock at the state of tide existing at the date of her being loaded should be deemed lighterage "necessary to complete her loading at North Dock, Swansea," and be borne by the defendants.

They cited Shield v. Wilkin, 5 Exch. 304; The General Steam Navigation Co. v. Slipper, 10 W. R. 316, 1 Mar. Law Cas. 180; The Alhambra, 29 W. R. 655, 6 P. D. 68; and Allen v. Coltart, 31 W. R. 841, 11 Q. B. D. 782.

Phillimore, in reply.

Cur. adv. vult.

Jan. 27.—BUTT, J., now delivered the following judgment of the COURT:—This is an action for balance of freight for carriage of fuel in the ship Curfew, and for demurrage of that ship.

The defendants claimed a set-off and made a counter-claim for cost of carriage of a portion of the fuel from the North Dock at Swansea, where it is alleged by the defendants The Curfew was to load, to the Prince of Wales Dock, where, as alleged by the defendants, the vessel was improperly taken; and, secondly, for trimming the cargo.

The Curfew was chartered on the 14th of March, 1889, in London, and in the charter-party was described "expected ready to load about the 10th of April," and she was with all convenient speed to sail and proceed to the company's (i.e., the defendants') loading berth, North Dock, Swansea, and there load, always afloat, a full and complete cargo of about 2,100 tons of fuel.

The steamer was to pay "trimming," extra trimming in case of double decks, "and lighterage, if any, necessary to enable steamer to complete loading at North Dock, Swansea, to be at merchants' risk and expense."

The vessel did not, in fact, arrive at Swansea till the 30th day of April. She proceeded to the North Dock, and there loaded a portion of the cargo, but in consequence of the delay in her arrival at the expected time, although she could have taken in the remainder of the cargo remaining always afloat, she could not, by reason of the neap tides then existing, when fully loaded, have passed over the sill of the dock for a week. She therefore left the North Dock incompletely loaded, and went to the Prince's Dock; and the unloaded portion of the cargo had to be sent round to the Prince's Dock.

The first question in the cause is, Who is to bear the expense of sending the fuel round to the Prince's Dock?

The defendants' contention was, that by the terms of the charter-party they were only liable to pay for such lighterage as might be necessary to complete the loading at the North Dock.

The plaintiffs' contention was, that the true meaning of the charter-party is, that if the steamer was unable to complete the loading at the North Dock, then that the defendants were to pay the lighterage necessary to enable the steamer to complete the loading.

The learned judge of the court below considered the language of the charter-party ambiguous, and admitted evidence of the previous correspondence between the parties to show what their intention was in entering into the charter-party, and that evidence being admitted, we agree with the learned judge that it became clear that the plaintiffs' contention was well founded, and that the intention of the parties was, that if the steamer was unable to complete loading at North Dock, the defendants were to bear the expense of completing the loading elsewhere. This appears from the telegram of the defendants' agent to the defendants, in which he says that the terms proposed were "lighterage, if any necessary through inability to take full cargo North Dock, our expense," which was assented to by his principals.

This was the contract that the parties intended to express by the charter-party.

We are of opinion that there is sufficient ambiguity in the language of the charter-party to warrant the admission of evidence to explain the ambiguity: but we are of opinion that the plaintiffs have failed to establish that they were unable to complete the loading of the steamer at the North Dock within the meaning of the charter-party. But for the fact that the vessel did not arrive at Swansea at the time expected—viz., the 10th of April—she would have been able to complete her loading at the North Dock and cross the sill of the dock with her full cargo; but in order to avoid being detained in the dock a week she left the North Dock before completing her loading, though she might have continued to receive cargo at North Dock remaining always afloat.

We are of opinion that the fear of this detention did not justify the removal of the steamer from North Dock; it did not render the steamer unable to complete her loading while afloat in the dock; it only rendered the performance of the contract by the plaintiffs more onerous to them by reason of the loss of the use of their vessel during the neap tides.

We think, therefore, that the decision of the learned judge below was wrong on this point, and that the defendants established their set-off or counter-claim as to £15 1s. 6d. for the cost of taking the cargo round to Prince of Wales Dock.

The second point is as to the trimming. The charter-party provides that the steamer is to "pay trimming, extra trimming in case of double decks," but no amount is fixed.

The defendants have charged the plaintiffs a rate of 1s. The defendants have paid 9d., but dispute their liability to pay the balance, amounting to £26 5s.

The learned judge has held that the defendants are not entitled to recover this balance. He has not given his reasons for his decision, probably thinking that upon such a question as the proper charge for trimming a cargo at Swansea his simple finding was sufficient. There was ample evidence to justify the learned judge's finding.

In a letter from the defendants to their agent, after the charter-party was entered into, they say, "unfortunately, Swansea trimming is only 9d., and Cardiff 1s., we try to get 1s. here in all cases, and if you gave broker to understand it would be 1s., we will charge it as a matter of course. What we are afraid of is, the owner will not pay more than Swansea trimming."

There was conflicting evidence as to whether 1s. was mentioned, and the learned judge has adopted the view that it was not mentioned. The result is, we think, the defendants' set-off of £15 1s. 6d. should be allowed, but as each party has been practically successful in the appeal, we leave each party to pay his own costs of the appeal. The defendants to pay the costs below.

Decision of Bristowe, V.C., reversed.

Appeal from Bristowe, V.C. (Lancaster Palatine Court).

This was an appeal from the judgment of Bristowe, V.C., deciding that certain debentures of a joint-stock company were void as against execution creditors for want of registration under the Bills of Sale Acts, and consequently disallowing the claim of the debenture-holders in the winding up of the company. The company in question, the name of which was the Standard Manufacturing Co., was constituted in 1881, under the Companies Acts, 1862 to 1867, for the purpose of carrying on the business of manufacturing frillings, baby linen, &c. The capital of the company was £12,000, and they had borrowing powers under their articles to the extent of £6,000. Under those powers they borrowed £1,000 in May, 1888, upon the security of twenty debentures of £50 each, ten of which were issued to James Lowe. These debentures were in the ordinary form, the company charging its undertaking and all its property, both present and future, with the payment of the sum secured, and the debentures were expressed to be issued subject to the conditions indorsed thereon. The 3rd clause of such conditions was as follows:—"The charge created by the debentures shall be a floating security, and accordingly the company may in the course of its business, and for the purpose of carrying on the same, deal with the property hereby charged in such manner as the company may think fit, and in particular may sell the same, may pay and receive money, and may declare and pay dividends out of profits." The 4th clause empowered the company at any time to give notice to the debenture-holder that they intended to pay off the debenture, and provided that the principal money secured should become payable at the end of a month after such notice. The 5th clause provided that if the company made default for one month in payment of the interest, the registered holder of the debenture might call in the principal money by notice in writing, and in that case, or in case any of the uncalled capital of the company were called up, or an order made, or special or extraordinary resolution passed, to wind up the company, that the principal money s[illegible] diately become payable. The 6th c[illegible] that the registered holder might at any time call in the principal money upon a month's notice, and that in that case such money should, at the end of the month, become immediately payable, and that in case any debenture-holder should take legal proceedings to enforce his rights against the property of the company, all the principal moneys secured by the debentures of that issue should immediately become payable. The 7th clause provided that the power given to the company by clause 3 was to cease if default was made in payment of any of the principal moneys secured by any of those debentures, or if any such order or resolution as aforesaid was made or passed.

In November of the same year the company borrowed a further £4,000 at 7½ per cent. interest, by the issue of forty debentures of £100 each to the Realization and Debenture Corporation of Scotland. These debentures differed to some extent in form from the previous issue. They charged all the real and personal property, present and future, and the undertaking of the company, with the payment of the sum secured, and declared that the debentures were issued subject to the conditions indorsed thereon.

The 3rd clause of the conditions provided that these debentures should be a floating security, but that no part of the property should, before payment in full of the whole of that issue of debentures, be charged or mortgaged so as to rank pari passu with or in priority to the charge created by these debentures, "nor shall any part of the real or leasehold property of the company be sold, transferred, alienated, or otherwise dealt with in any manner without the consent in writing of the corporation first obtained; nor shall any part of the property of the company, other than the said real or leasehold property, be sold, transferred, alienated, or otherwise dealt with in any manner, except in the ordinary course of the business of the company." The 4th clause provided that the company might at any time after November 1, 1890, pay off the debentures at the end of six months after notice given to the registered holder. The 6th clause provided that the principal moneys should become payable immediately on the happening of certain specified events and on demand of payment by the registered holder, and that all right of the company to deal for any purpose whatever with any of the property should thereupon forthwith cease. Some of the events specified were as follows:—Default in payment of interest. Default in payment of principal. The making of an order, or passing of a resolution to wind up the company. The issuing of execution or other process against the property of the company. The 7th clause provided that at any time after the principal moneys became payable, or a petition for winding up was presented, or a resolution to wind up passed, or a judgment for more than £100 became enforceable against the company, the corporation should have power to appoint a receiver of any part of the property, who should have power to take possession of, and sell or demise, any part of the property charged.

These debentures were further secured by a trust deed, but neither that deed nor the debentures themselves, of either issue, were registered under the Bills of Sale Acts.

In the early part of 1889 several creditors obtained judgments against the company, in respect of which executions were issued. The debenture-holders thereupon demanded payment; and in August, 1889, an order to wind up the company was made in the Palatine Court. The question whether the debentures required registration under the Bills of Sale Acts was then raised, and Bristowe, V.C., upon the authority of Jenkinson v. Brandley Mining Co., 35 W. R. 834, 19 Q. B. D. 568, decided in the affirmative, and that, not having been so registered, they were void against the execution creditors, who were therefore entitled to priority.

From that decision the debenture-holders now appealed.

Rigby, Q.C., and Astbury, for the appellants.—One question is whether these debentures are bills of sale at all. Section 17 of the Bills of Sale Act, 1882, enacts that "nothing in this Act shall apply to any debentures issued by any mortgage, loan, or other incorporated company, and secured upon the capital stock or goods, chattels, and effects of such company." The company issued several series of debentures purporting to create a floating security over the property of the company. The debentures are not "assurances" within the meaning of section 4 of the Act of 1878. In Jenkinson v. Brandley Mining Co. there is a dictum against us by Grove, J., to the effect that the saving clause in section 17 does not except debentures generally from the Act, but only those issued by mortgage, loan, and other incorporated companies, and that the last words must mean incorporated companies ejusdem generis with loan and mortgage companies. That dictum was unnecessary for the decision of the case, and cannot be sustained. The debentures here were "charged on the undertaking," an expression which has been judicially construed as creating a "floating security." These debentures were within the exception in section 17 of the Act of 1882: Edmonds v. Blaina Furnace Co., 35 W. R. 798, 36 Ch. D. 215; Levy v. Abercorris Slate and Slab Co., 36 W. R. 411, 37 Ch. D. 260; both of which cases, like the present one, turn on section 17 of the Act of 1882. The Act of 1878 does not apply to debentures of an incorporated company, but, even if it did, section 17 of the Act of 1882 would make it unnecessary to register them as bills of sale: Read v. Joannon, 38 W. R. 734, 25 Q. B. D. 300.

They also referred to Topham v. Greenside Glazed Firebrick Co., 36 W. R. 464, 37 Ch. D. 281; Ross v. Army and Navy Hotel Co., 35 W. R. 40, 34 Ch. D. 43; and In re Pound, Son, & Hutchins, 38 W. R. 18, 42 Ch. D. 402.

Neville, Q.C., and Ernest Radford, for the respondents, the execution creditors.—If all incorporated companies were intended to come within section 17, why did it expressly refer to loan and mortgage companies at all? It is difficult to suppose that when the Legislature said "loan companies" it meant "borrowing companies." A debenture is an acknowledgment of a debt. All that section 17 says is that companies of a specified kind need not register their debentures—that is, loan and mortgage companies and companies of a similar kind. If the company is within section 17 of the Act of 1882 the effect is to prevent that Act, as far as chattels are concerned, from operating on these debentures at all. The result is to leave them liable to registration under the Act of 1878; because if nothing in this Act applies to such debentures, you cannot read section 15, which repeals section 8 of the Act of 1878, as applying to them. There is no reason why the debentures of a corporation should not be subject to registration under the Act of 1878 as well as under the Companies Acts, because under the latter Acts it is only when a man (not being a shareholder) has become a creditor that he can inspect the register. The debentures clearly come within the definition in section 4 of the Act of 1878. [Lord HALSBURY, L.C.—Perhaps it is fair to ask why debentures were not expressly mentioned in the exhaustive catalogue in that section?

BOWEN, L.J., referred to Holroyd v. Marshall, 11 W. R. 171, 10 H. L. Cas. 191, and Reeves v. Barlow, 32 W. R. 672, 12 Q. B. D. 436.] Unregistered debentures, though not void as against the liquidator, are void as against creditors: In re Marine Mansions Co., L. R. 4 Eq. 601, 16 W. R. Ch. Dig. 68. Bills of sale given by joint-stock companies are within the Bills of Sale Act, 1882: In re Cunningham & Co., Attenborough's case, 33 W. R. 387, 28 Ch. D. 682; Shears v. Jacobs, 14 W. R. 609, L. R. 1 C. P. 513; Deffell v. White, 15 W. R. 68, L. R. 2 C. P. 144. [BOWEN, L.J., referred to Brown v. Bateman, 15 W. R. 350, L. R. 2 C. P. 272.] There their lordships put it on the ground that the title given was an equitable and not a legal one. In Deffell v. White the question was as to the sufficiency of the registration. If debentures are not within the Act of 1878 at all, there was no need for section 17 of the Act of 1882. In Ross v. Army and Navy Hotel Co., 34 Ch. D., at pp. 50-51, Kay, J., said that "a debenture creating an equitable charge would be void against an execution creditor under section 8" of the Bills of Sale Act, 1878, "the exception in section 17 of the later Act of 1882 not applying to the Act of 1878." [BOWEN, L.J., referred to Ex parte Hubbard, 35 W. R. 2, 17 Q. B. D. 690.] There was power to take possession under these debentures; that is a test of their being bills of sale: Ex parte Close, 33 W. R. 228, 14 Q. B. D. 386; Ex parte Parsons, 34 W. R. 329, 16 Q. B. D. 532. In Ex parte Mackay, 21 W. R. 664, L. R. 8 Ch. App. 643, it was decided that an agreement for a bill of sale, if relied on as an equitable assignment, required registration under the Act then in force. In Edwards v. Edwards, 24 W. R. 713, 2 Ch. D. 291, it was held that a covenant by a debtor to charge certain chattels with a debt if it were not paid by a specified day, and to assign such chattels when required to the creditor as security, ought to be registered as a bill of sale. The statutory power of sale was incident to these debentures, which were, therefore, bills of sale within the Act of 1878: Climpson v. Coles, 38 W. R. 110, 23 Q. B. D. 465. Securities of this kind are inoperative on the property of the company until the money has become payable. There is no charge until then upon any specific chattels. The whole object of giving this kind of security is to leave the company unfettered in dealing with their property: Tailby v. Official Receiver, 37 W. R. 513, 13 App. Cas. 523, per Lord Macnaghten, on p. 541, paragraph 4.

They also referred to In re Stockton Iron Furnace Co., 27 W. R. 433, 10 Ch. D. 335; Topham v. Greenside Glazed Firebrick Co., 37 Ch. D., on p. 293; Brocklehurst v. Railway Printing and Publishing Co., 28 SOLICITORS' JOURNAL, 358, W. N., 1884, p. 70; Ex parte Byrne, 36 W. R. 128, 345, 20 Q. B. D. 310; and Swift v. Pannell, 31 W. R. 543, 24 Ch. D. 210.

E. S. Ford, for the liquidator.

Rigby, Q.C., in reply.—The Act of 1878 does not apply, and was not intended to apply, to companies. The preamble to the Act of 1854, and the whole scope and purview of the Acts of 1854 and 1878, show that they were not intended to deal with companies. The words in the definition of "personal chattels" in section 4 of the latter Act, excluding shares or interests in the capital or property of incorporated or joint-stock companies, amount to an express exclusion of companies' debentures from the operation of the Act. The only case in which it has been argued that debentures are within the Bills of Sale Acts is the case of the debenture-holders in John Welsted & Co. v. The Swansea Bank, 5 Times Rep. 332. If it had been intended to deal with corporations the Legislature would have dealt with the cases of winding up, and would have protected the general body of creditors, and not merely the execution creditors. The Marine Mansions case, which was in 1867, shows the scope of the Act of 1854. The Bills of Sale Act, 1878, has nothing to do with the winding up of companies, and debentures do not need registration under it: In re Asphaltic Wood Pavement Co., 32 W. R. 16. There is no case in which the official liquidator has been allowed to challenge a bill of sale. If my contention is not correct it is very strange that no one has ever availed himself of the Act before.

He also referred to Ex parte Pearson, 21 W. R. 688, L. R. 8 Ch. 667, and to Ex parte Hubbard. [Lord HALSBURY, L.C., referred to Edwards v. Edwards, Shears v. Jacobs, and Deffell v. White; observing that the two latter cases seemed to assume that the Bills of Sale Acts were applicable to companies.]

Cur. adv. vult.

Feb. 10.—BOWEN, L.J., delivered the judgment of the COURT (Lord HALSBURY, L.C., and BOWEN and FRY, L.JJ.) as follows:—The question we have to decide is whether both or either of the debentures before us, which are, in fact, debentures of a joint-stock company limited, and which create a charge on the floating, real, and personal property of the company, are void for non-registration under the Bills of Sale Acts, 1878 and 1882, or either of such Acts. So far as the Bills of Sale Act, 1882 is concerned, it seems to us that such debentures are expressly excepted from its operation by section 17. We do not agree with the observations of Grove, J., and Huddleston, B., in Jenkinson v. Brandley Mining Co., that the words, "or other incorporated company" are limited to companies ejusdem generis with mortgage or loan companies, whatever these last mentioned companies may be; but even if it were otherwise, we think that any incorporated company which is authorized to raise money on loan or mortgage would be for the purposes of this section ejusdem generis with a "mortgage or loan company." We see no reason for doubting that the Standard Manufacturing Co. (Limited) is an incorporated company within that section.

The next question to be solved is whether these debentures, or either of them, are bills of sale (section 4), and bills of sale to which the Bills of Sale Act, 1878, s. 3, applies. That these debentures are "agreements by which a right in equity to a charge or security on personal chattels is conferred" appears to be clear. But we are of opinion nevertheless that, on the true construction of the Act of 1878, the mortgages or charges of any incorporated company for the registration of which statutory provision has already been made by the Companies Clauses Act, 1845, or the Companies Act, 1862, are not bills of sale within the scope of the Bills of Sale Act, 1878.

It is impossible to follow chronologically the legislation about bills of sale without observing that until the passing of the Act of 1882, the scope of which embraces larger objects, the express and avowed design of the Legislature had been to strike at the frauds perpetrated upon creditors by secret bills of sale. The title of the Bills of Sale Act, 1854, so states, and the preamble of that Act is as follows:—"Whereas frauds are frequently committed upon creditors by secret bills of sale of personal chattels, whereby persons are enabled to keep up the appearance of being in good circumstances and possessed of property, and the grantees or holders of such bills of sale have the power of taking possession of the property of such persons to the exclusion of the rest of their creditors, for remedy whereof," &c. Such corporate bodies as were at that time in existence were not bodies in the habit of committing frauds of this sort; and since corporations were not subject to the law of bankruptcy, that portion, at all events, of section 1 of the Act of 1854, which was for the protection of assignees in bankruptcy, could not be applicable to corporations. Indeed, the definition of "apparent possession," which is of the essence of the Act of 1854, is so framed as to show that corporations were not actively, at all events, present to the mind of the draftsman who drafted the statute. Prior to the Act of 1854 the Legislature had passed, in 1845, the Companies Clauses Act, 1845, which provided, in the case of mortgages and bonds of companies authorized by their special Act to borrow, for a register to be kept of such mortgages and bonds, and enacted that such register might be perused at all reasonable times by any of the shareholders or any mortgage or bond creditor of the company, or by any person interested in such mortgage or bond, without fee or reward.

Between the Bills of Sale Act of 1854 and the Bills of Sale Act of 1878 the Companies Act of 1862 was passed, which, by section 43, provides for the registration by companies of the mortgages and charges specifically affecting their property. At the date of the Bills of Sale Act, 1878, debentures which charged the property of such companies were well known in the commercial world. Having regard to the provisions already made by statute for their registration, such documents could hardly be described as secret or as belonging to the class of documents by which frauds were perpetrated upon creditors by secret bills of sale. They are not really, therefore, within the mischief of the Act of 1878. We cannot think that the Legislature could have intended in the Bills of Sale Act, 1878, to interfere by merely general words with such well-known commercial instruments, and it seems to us that the canon of construction laid down in Stradling v. Morgan, Plowden, 205a, and cited by the Lord Chancellor in the recent case of Bell-Cox v. Hakes, ante, p. 147, 15 App. Cas. 518, may be invoked with regard to the present controversy—"From which cases it appears that the sages of the law heretofore have construed statutes quite contrary to the letter in some appearance, and those statutes which comprehend all things in the letter they have expounded to extend but to some things, and those which generally prohibit all people from doing such an act they have interpreted to permit some people to do it, and those which include every person in the letter they have adjudged to reach to some persons only, which expositions have always been founded on the intent of the Legislature, which they have collected sometimes by considering the cause and necessity of making the Act, sometimes by comparing one part of the Act with another, and sometimes by foreign circumstances. So that they have ever been guided by the intent of the Legislature, which they have always taken according to the necessity of the matter and according to that which is consonant to reason and good discretion." Neither the cause nor necessity for the Bills of Sale Acts, 1854 and 1878, nor a comparison of the various sections, drive us to the interpretation that such documents are included.

We have said that a comparison of the various sections of the Act of 1878 does not lead to any other conclusion. We may even say that such a comparison fortifies the opinion at which we have arrived. Without going so far as to decide that no corporation can, under any circumstances, be within the Bills of Sale Act, 1878, we may point out that the language of sections 4, 10, and 12 shows that the Bills of Sale Act, 1878, was not dealing specifically with corporations, although it may be that the language of section 3 is wide enough to include the bills of sale of a corporation, a view which has tacitly, as we are aware, been assumed in many decided cases to be correct. The language employed in these other sections is certainly not felicitous language to be applied in the case of corporations, and warrants, we think, the observation that the debentures of companies were not actively present to the mind of the draftsman of the Act. The view that debentures like the present are not within the Bills of Sale Act, 1878, was that adopted by Pollock, B., in the case of John Welsted & Co. (Limited) v. The Swansea Bank, and by the Lord Chief Justice and Wills, J., in the case of Read v. Joannon; see also Edmonds v. Blaina Furnaces Co. and Levy v. Abercorris Slate and Slab Co. We agree with this view, and we think that this appeal should be allowed, with costs both here and below, on the ground that the mortgages or charges of any incorporated company, for the registration of which other provisions have been made by the Companies Clauses Act, 1845, or the Companies Act, 1862, are not within the Bills of Sale Act, 1878.

BRANDON v. MCHENRY. (a.)

Practice—Setting aside execution—Bankruptcy—Debt and judgment—Proof for debt—Rejection by trustee—Annulment of bankruptcy—Execution issued on judgment—Bankruptcy Act, 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 71), s. 81.

The defendant having been adjudicated a bankrupt under the Bankruptcy Act, 1869, the plaintiff sent in a proof for £4,084 in respect of an alleged debt. The trustee in bankruptcy rejected the proof. The plaintiff had, prior to the adjudication in bankruptcy, signed judgment against the defendant by consent for the above sum of £4,084, but the plaintiff did not send in any proof in respect of the judgment. The adjudication in bankruptcy having been subsequently annulled, the plaintiff issued execution upon the judgment.

Held, that, inasmuch as, in bankruptcy, there is power to go behind the judgment and to inquire into the consideration upon which it is founded, the proof upon the simple contract debt must be considered the same as the proof upon the judgment debt; that the rejection of the proof was an "act done by the trustee" within section 81 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1869, and remained valid upon the annulment of the adjudication; and that, therefore, the plaintiff was not entitled to issue execution upon the judgment.

Appeal from the Queen's Bench Division.

In 1879 the defendant filed a liquidation petition under the Bankruptcy Act, 1869. The plaintiff sent in a proof for £4,084 for work done as a solicitor for the defendant in certain litigation in which the defendant had been engaged. In November, 1883, resolutions accepting a composition were passed by the creditors under section 126 of the Act of 1869. On July 15, 1885, the plaintiff, by consent, signed judgment against the defendant for the above sum of £4,084. In March, 1886, the defendant was adjudicated bankrupt under the power conferred on the court by the last clause of section 126, and the proofs in the liquidation proceedings were transferred to the bankruptcy proceedings. The plaintiff did not send in any proof upon the judgment. The trustee in the bankruptcy rejected the proof. In February, 1890, the bankruptcy was annulled, and the plaintiff subsequently issued execution upon the judgment of July 15, 1885. The defendant thereupon applied to set aside the judgment and the execution.

The Divisional Court (Wills and Wright, JJ.) refused to set aside the judgment, but set aside the execution.*

The plaintiff appealed.

By section 81 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1869, "whenever any adjudication in bankruptcy is annulled, all sales and dispositions of property and payments duly made, and all acts theretofore done, by the trustee or any person acting under his authority, or by the court, shall be valid," &c.

[The above provision is re-enacted in section 35, sub-section 2, of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883.]

Murphy, Q.C., and Lumley Smith, Q.C. (H. Reed with them), for the plaintiff.—The trustee rejected the proof, which was upon the file, for the simple contract debt. No proof was sent in for the judgment. When the proof was rejected the plaintiff relied upon his judgment, and he might have sent in a proof at any time in respect of it. The annulment did not affect a debt for which no proof had been sent in. Therefore the plaintiff's claim upon the judgment remained notwithstanding the annulment.

They referred to Smallcombe v. Olivier, 13 M. & W. 77; Bailey v. Johnson, 20 W. R. 1013, L. R. 7 Ex. 263.

Sir Edward Clarke, S.G., and W. B. Allen, for the defendant, were not called upon.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—I intend to rest my decision upon one only of the grounds upon which the Divisional Court acted—namely, upon section 81 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1869. When the defendant was adjudicated a bankrupt the plaintiff might, if he had chosen, have proved upon his judgment for £4,084. But in bankruptcy the court can go behind a judgment and inquire into the consideration upon which it is founded. Therefore a proof upon the judgment would, in reality, have been a proof for a sum of £4,084 alleged to be due under a contract, and which contract had been converted into a judgment. The proof would have been for the sum of £4,084 founded upon a contract and a judgment. The plaintiff, however, did not send in a proof upon the judgment, but claimed upon his proof for the original contract debt alone. The trustee rejected that proof, on the ground that there was no consideration for the alleged debt. If the proof had been upon the judgment exactly the same result would have happened. The trustee would have inquired into the consideration for the judgment, and would have rejected the proof on the ground of want of consideration. Therefore, in reality, that which was claimed was the debt, and whether it was claimed as being a judgment debt, or a simple contract debt, is immaterial. There was no appeal against the rejection of the proof by the trustee, and so his decision was final.

What, then, is the effect of the subsequent annulment of the bankruptcy? By section 81 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1869, "all acts done by the trustee" are to be valid. Here we have a rejection of the claim by the trustee. That is an act done by him. The rejection therefore remained valid. The plaintiff cannot now allege that he can enforce the claim which had been thus rejected. All effective action upon the judgment has been put an end to by the rejection of the claim by the trustee. The execution, therefore, must be set aside. It is unnecessary to decide whether or not the judgment ought to stand.

FRY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. In 1879, when the defendant filed his petition for liquidation, the plaintiff alleged that he was a creditor of the defendant for £4,084, and he proved in the liquidation in respect of this alleged debt. In the bankruptcy of 1886 the proofs on the file in the liquidation proceedings were transferred to the bankruptcy proceedings, and it became the duty of the trustee in the bankruptcy to consider the plaintiff's claim on his proof. The trustee rejected it. If the plaintiff had proved upon the judgment, instead of upon the simple contract debt, the trustee could have gone behind the judgment, and inquired into the consideration upon which it was based, and would have rejected the proof in exactly the same way. Then, by section 81, upon the annulment of the bankruptcy, not merely all sales and dispositions of property and payments duly made by the trustee, but also "all acts theretofore done by the trustee," are to be valid. These latter words must include the rejection of a proof by the trustee. That rejection, therefore, was valid against all parties. The effect of the rejection, therefore, is to disentitle the plaintiff to issue execution upon the judgment. It is not necessary now to consider whether it would entitle the defendant to have the judgment set aside.

Appeal dismissed.

ONSLOW v. COMMISSIONERS OF INLAND REVENUE. (a.)

Inland revenue — Stamp duty — Settlement—"Definite and certain amount of stock"—Contingent reversionary interest settled—Stock vested in trustees with power to vary investments—Stamp Act, 1870 (33 & 34 Vict. c. 97), s. 3, schedule, "Settlement."

By a marriage settlement the settlor's reversionary and contingent interests in divers specified sums of stock vested in trustees, with powers of varying the investments, were settled.

Held, that the settlement was an "instrument . . . whereby . . . a definite and certain amount of stock . . . is settled or agreed to be settled" within the definition of the word "settlement" in the schedule to the Stamp Act, 1870, and that it accordingly required an ad valorem stamp of 5*s. for every* £100, as provided by that schedule.

Appeal from the Queen's Bench Division.

This was an appeal by D. H. Onslow and his wife Marion from the decision of a divisional court (Pollock, B., and Hawkins, J.) upon a case stated by the Commissioners of Inland Revenue under 33 & 34 Vict. c. 97, s. 19, as to the amount of stamp duty payable on a certain indenture of settlement, and the case is reported below (38 W. R. 445, 24 Q. B. D. 584).

(a.) Reported by R. H. DEANE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The said indenture was dated the 21st of April, 1888, and the property settled by it consisted of certain moneys, stocks, funds, and securities respectively specified in three schedules to the indenture, or of the interest of the settlor, Marion Onslow (formerly Marion Oliver) therein.

It appeared that George Pickup, the grandfather of the appellant Mrs. Onslow, had died in 1834 intestate, leaving two daughters, Ann and Georgina, who subsequently (in 1849 and 1856) executed cross-settlements of their property. In 1849 Ann, the elder, settled hers on herself for life without power of anticipation, with remainder to her children as she should by deed or will appoint, with remainder upon similar trusts in favour of her sister Georgina and her children, and ultimate remainder to the next of kin. In 1856 Georgina made a settlement corresponding to that made by her sister, neither of them having then any children. In 1860 Georgina was married to George Oliver, and they had a daughter Marion, the present Mrs. Onslow, the settlor. In 1868 James Pickup, brother of George Pickup, the intestate, died, having made a will whereby he left one moiety of his property to his elder niece, Ann, for life, with remainder to her children as she should by will appoint, with remainder (if Ann had no children) upon the trusts declared as to the other moiety, which he gave to Georgina for life, with corresponding remainder and cross-remainder.

In 1888 Georgina Oliver made three appointments under her various powers, her sister Ann never having been married, and being then sixty years of age, and she herself fifty-four.

The interests to which Marion Onslow were entitled at the date of her settlement were (1) a moiety in remainder, expectant on the death of her mother, of the net proceeds of the sale and conversion of the real and personal estate of the said James Pickup, subject to reduction in the event of her mother having another child; and the other moiety thereof in remainder, expectant on the death of her Aunt Ann and her mother Georgina, the latter moiety being contingent also on her said aunt dying without issue. The above were comprised in the first schedule. The investments, which were standing in the name of George Oliver as the surviving trustee, were subject to variation, with the consent of the tenant for life. Marion was entitled (2) to an interest in remainder (comprised in the second schedule) expectant on the death of her mother, and subject to defeasance in the event of her mother having other children; and (3) to an interest in remainder (comprised in the third schedule) expectant on the deaths of her mother and aunt, contingent on her aunt dying without issue, and subject to revocation in the event of her mother having other issue. All the investments were subject to powers to vary.

The aggregate value of the property comprised in the three schedules at the date of the settlement was £209,370 11s. 5d.

The commissioners held that the indenture was chargeable with ad valorem duty, as a settlement, at the rate of 5s. per cent., which would amount to £523 16s., and also, under section 8 of the Act of 1870, with a deed stamp of 10s., in respect of other matter in the deed.

The Divisional Court affirmed the view of the commissioners.

Marion Onslow, the settlor, and her husband, D. H. Onslow, appealed.

Danckwertz, for the appellants.—The schedule to the Stamp Act, 1870, contains the definition of "Settlement" upon which the question in the present case turns. Settlement is there defined as follows:—"Any instrument, whether voluntary or upon any good or valuable consideration, other than a bonâ fide pecuniary consideration, whereby any definite and certain principal sum of money . . . or any definite and certain amount of stock, or any security, is settled or agreed to be settled in any manner whatsoever." There was here no such settlement of any definite and certain sum of money, or of any definite and certain amount of stock. All the three sets of property are unascertained. In Partington v. Attorney-General, L. R. 4 E. & I. App. 100, at p. 122, 17 W. R. H. L. Dig. 1, Lord Cairns laid down the principles on which the Stamp Act ought to be approached. He said, "if the Crown . . . cannot bring the subject within the letter of the law, the subject is free, however apparently within the spirit of the law the case might otherwise appear to be." The settlement in the present case is not a settlement within the definition given in the schedule to the Stamp Act, 1870. There is no precise sum settled. The sum mentioned is not settled at all. The stock comprised in the schedule to the settlement is not settled. The investments may be changed. What is settled is whatever may be in esse when the time for distribution arrives. The amounts settled must, by the Act, be both definite and certain—a definite amount, and vested certainly. The words are not tautologous. The Revenue has never asked for stamp duty on purely contingent interests. [He referred to Sanville v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue, 2 W. R. 529, 10 Exch. 159; In re Alsager's Settlement, 12 W. R. 477; Hughes v. King, 1 Starkie, 119]. As to a portion of the funds, no interest is given to Georgina except in the event of Ann dying without issue; and another portion is vested in her subject to being divested if her mother has another child. [FRY, L.J.—I think it is vested subject to being divested on a most improbable contingency. BOWEN, L.J.—The words of the Act are "definite and certain sum of money, or definite and certain amount of stock," not a definite and certain interest in a sum or amount.] What one must look to is the subject-matter of the settlement. If that is uncertain, there is nothing certain or definite about it. The first scheduled property is not settled at all. It is said to be settled as a convenient way of describing what may ultimately be settled. What is settled is whatever may represent the part of the estate which may fall to Mrs. Onslow's share on the death of her mother. The expenses of realizing the property may come out of the personalty or realty as the trustees choose. [Sir E. Clarke, S.G., referred to In re Jackson, Jackson's Will, 28 W. R. 209, 13 Ch. D. 189.]

Sir E. Clarke, S.G., and G. B. Rosher, for the respondents, were not called on.

LINDLEY, L.J.—This case raises a question of the construction of that part of the Stamp Act, 1870, which relates to settlements. The instrument on which this question arises is the marriage settlement made between Mr. Onslow and the young lady he was then about to marry; and it contains recitals from which it appears that the lady was entitled to considerable property, some vested, some contingent, and some vested subject to being divested. The property is specified in three schedules, and with respect to the first schedule I think this recital is important: "Whereas the personal property now subject to the trusts of the said will is specified in the first schedule hereto, and stands in the name of George Oliver, the surviving trustee." When we come to deal with that, we find that what the settlement does with it is this. It says, "in pursuance of the agreement," and so on, the lady assigns to the trustees

"all that the entirety of the net proceeds of the sale, calling in, and conversion of the real estate and personal estate devised and bequeathed" by the will already mentioned. That is the first part. Then she goes on in the same way to assign to the trustees the proceeds of all the property specified in the second schedule, and, finally, that in the third schedule.

Now, when we come to look at these schedules, we find there is very considerable property specified in them, the value of the whole at the date of the settlement, ascertained in accordance with section 12 of the Act, being over £200,000. It is said that the commissioners, who have assessed the stamp upon this settlement at 5s. per cent. upon the amount I have mentioned, have gone upon the wrong principle. It is said that there is no settlement, and it is said that there is no settlement of a "definite and certain amount," within the meaning of the Stamp Act. In order to deal with that, I will read what the Stamp Act says—it is in the schedule, under the head "Settlement":—"Any instrument, whether voluntary or upon any good or valuable consideration, other than a bonâ fide pecuniary consideration, whereby any definite and certain principal sum of money (whether charged or chargeable on lands or other hereditaments, or heritable subjects or not, or to be laid out in the purchase of lands or other hereditaments, or heritable subjects or not) or any definite and certain amount of stock, or any security, is settled, or agreed to be settled, in any manner whatsoever. For every £100, and also for any fractional part of £100, of the amount or value of the property settled or agreed to be settled, 5s." We are asked to say that there is not any settlement, and that there is not "any definite and certain" sum within the meaning of that provision. But the ingenious attempt of Mr. Danckwertz to establish that proposition seems to me to have failed. I cannot read the instrument without coming to the conclusion that it is a settlement in the ordinary acceptation of that term—just the same as any other marriage settlement is a settlement.

If Mr. Danckwertz' argument were pressed to its full extent it would come to this: that no settlement of any property could be stamped with an ad valorem stamp unless the interest of the settlor were a vested interest, not subject to be divested at all. Such a construction is, I think, quite impossible, and inconsistent with the terms of the Act itself. He then contended that there might be a difference between a vested interest subject to be divested and a contingent interest; but I can find nothing in the Act to warrant anything of the sort.

Just let us see how these things are done, and what the Act intended should be done. The Commissioners of Inland Revenue look at the document to see what it is that is settled, and they ascertain the value of the amount, if it is stock, in accordance with section 12; they look to see whether the sum which is settled is a certain and definite sum so ascertained. If it is, then 5s. per cent. is calculated upon it. I put to Mr. Danckwertz the case—a simple case enough—of the settlement, say, of one-fifth of £100,000. What would be the stamp duty for that? Obviously not 5s. per cent. on the whole £100,000. That would be absurd. The duty would be 5s. per cent. on the one-fifth. When we go further and see whether the 5s. per cent. is to fluctuate according to whether the interest is contingent, or subject to be divested, or vested, we find that the language of the Act warrants nothing of the kind. The amount settled, and not the nature of the settlor's interest in it, is what the statute deals with. I think the commissioners were right, and that the appeal ought to be dismissed.

BOWEN, L.J.—I am of the same opinion, and will only add that with regard to the larger portion of Mr. Dankwertz' argument, it seems to me that he omits to remember that "definite and certain" in the clause which we are considering are terms applied, not to the interest or the nature of the interest, but to the amount of the stock, and that the amount of the stock does not become uncertain because the chance of getting it may be uncertain.

FRY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The clause in the schedule of the Stamp Act, 1870, which we have to construe attaches itself to any instrument whereby "any definite and certain amount of stock is settled." Now it is obvious at once that the words I have read contain no definition or reference to the interest of the settlor in that "definite and certain amount." They simply refer to the stock. Two possible readings of those words seem to me to occur to the mind. One would be to say there was no settlement of that sum unless the settlor had an absolute and indefeasible interest; the other is to say that it applies to every case in which the settlor had any interest in that sum, whether that interest be vested or liable to be divested, or contingent, provided it is an interest. In my opinion the clause clearly relates to the second class of interest. It says nothing about the definiteness, the vesting, or the contingency of the interest, and it applies to every interest, whether vested, whether liable to be divested, whether contingent or not, in any sum, of which it may be said it is a definite and certain sum of stock. That is my view of the meaning of the clause. I think, therefore, the appeal fails.

Appeal dismissed.

Company — Alteration of memorandum — Business — Objects — Main purpose — Extending range of investments — Companies (Memorandum of Association) Act, 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 62), s. 1 (2), (4), (5) (a) (b).

A company formed for the purpose of investing in Government stock or other securities guaranteed by Government cannot alter its memorandum of association under the Companies (Memorandum of Association) Act, 1890, so as to extend its power of investment to non-Government securities, such alteration neither "enabling it to carry on its business more economically or more efficiently," nor "to attain its main purpose by new or improved means" within the meaning of the Act.

Observations on the duty of the court in exercising its discretion under the Act.

Petition.

This was a petition under the Companies (Memorandum of Association) Act, 1890, asking the court to confirm a special resolution passed to alter the memorandum of the above company by enlarging the area of investments. The alteration was opposed by some of the debenture stock holders. The purpose for which the company was established was the receipt of money on deposit and its investment on certain specified securities.

The original range of investments was as follows, the proposed alteration being inserted in italics:—

"The stocks or obligations of British, foreign, or colonial governments, states, provinces, or municipalities, or of railways or other public undertakings guaranteed by any British, foreign, or colonial government, state, province, or municipality, or in or upon mortgages, mortgage debentures, debentures, bonds, debenture stocks, and other obligations, and preference stocks and preference shares of any corporation, company, or undertaking at home or abroad, and in or upon stocks of any trust or investment company or corporation, provided that not more than one-tenth part of all the money invested shall be invested in the stocks of any government, state, province, municipality, railway, or undertaking."

Notice to debenture stock holders and creditors had been given under section 1 (2) in pursuance of an order in chambers.

Farwell, Q.C., and A. D. Maclaren, for the company.—The proposed alteration is within section 1 (5) (a) and (b), the main purpose of our company being the investment of money. The debenture stock holders are not creditors entitled to payment, and cannot object. At all events, they must show that their security is imperilled.

R. B. Yardley, for the opposing debenture stock holders.—The debenture stock holders have an absolute right to be secured under section 1 (2) (b), just as in cases of reduction of capital: see the Companies Act, 1867, s. 11; In re Patent Ventilating Granary Co., 27 W. R. 836, 12 Ch. D. 254. Their security is imperilled, and they are entitled to object. The alteration is not within section 1 (5), and in any case the court should not exercise its discretion under section 1 (4) against the debenture stock holders.

Farwell, Q.C., replied.

CHITTY, J.—This is the first case which has arisen under this Act of Parliament, and I have, therefore, desired to have it fully argued. The Act is not a general Act enabling companies to alter their memorandums, or conferring such a power on the court, but it is confined to alterations carefully specified in section 1 (5). This does not wind up with any general clause, but is confined to the definite matters therein mentioned. Now the name of this company is the Government Stock Investment Co. (Limited), a name which by itself imports that the company's investments are to be made in Government stock. I turn to the memorandum of association, and find in the third paragraph that the objects, stating them shortly, are to receive money and invest it in the stocks or obligations of British, foreign, or colonial governments, states, provinces, or municipalities, or of railways or undertakings guaranteed by them. That clause shows that the term government in the corporate name is used in a wide sense, and is not confined to governments which are popularly described as British or foreign governments, but includes states, provinces, and municipalities. These, however, are not unfairly termed governments, because both provinces and municipalities have local government. Investment, then, is to be made in the stock of governments in this wide sense, and also in public undertakings guaranteed by governments in this wide sense. Then there is a proviso to prevent the company from investing more than one-tenth of its money in any one government.

Now, what the company desires to do is to alter the memorandum so as to extend it far beyond the Government investments authorized by the memorandum as it stands. It is proposed to add the words in italics to the list of investments, leaving the proviso to run on as before. It is plain, however, that if the court assents to this alteration it will authorize this company to invest in securities of limited liability companies, in preference stocks of such companies, or even in the stock of trust companies like itself. That is a singular departure from the objects specified in the memorandum as it stands. It is plain that this company will be authorized to invest the whole of its capital or deposits in ten limited liability companies or in ten trust companies if it so think fit, and many of these companies hold foreign stocks to a large amount. So that although this company can only invest one-tenth of its capital or deposits in Argentines, it might invest one-tenth directly in Argentines and nine-tenths in other companies holding Argentines.

Mr. Farwell says the directors are sensible men, and would not do this, but that is not the question before me. I have also to consider the future directors, and in competition with other companies they might act in this way.

Under notices and advertisements given or published according to the direction of the judge in chambers, under section 1 (2), a certain number of assents have been given to the proposed alteration, and no outside creditors object. The share capital is £750,000. The resolution for altering the memorandum was carried unanimously, but in the absence of information as to the attendance at the meeting, I cannot assume that more than half the shareholders were represented.

Now I turn to the debenture stock holders. The debenture stock issued was £438,000. The company had power to issue debentures, but in point of form no power to issue debenture stock. I say, however, nothing about the validity of the issue. The prospectus of the issue states that it is amply secured by a capital of £750,000 invested in Government or guaranteed stocks.

Therefore, those who were invited to subscribe, and did so, were told their security would be Government stocks, or the stocks of public undertakings guaranteed by Government, using government in the same wide sense as before.

Now, of the holders of debenture stock, the holders of £150,000 assented, the holders of £22,600 dissented, those of £51,000 stand neutral, and as to the balance of £210,000 no replies were received. There is one more fact to be mentioned. The directors, under the sanguine anticipation that the court would accede to the application, have invested £53,000 in investments unauthorized by the old memorandum, but allowed by the new. I use this as an illustration of what the directors would do if I sanctioned this alteration. They have invested in Army and Navy Trust Stock, Omnium Stock, and many others of a like nature, even though deferred stock, and it is plain from this that they will, if allowed, invest a considerable amount in companies of a similar character to this company.

This company seems already to have some connection with the Omnium Investment Co. There would be an interlacement of the two companies. Now in the exercise of my discretion I must have regard to the interests of the members of the company as well as to those of the creditors, and in addition to this I have to be satisfied that the alteration falls within the section 1 (5).

Under the terms of this sub-section I may confirm the alteration if it is required to enable the company—

(a) "To carry on its business more economically or more efficiently."

Does extending the range of the power of investment in the manner described fall within the sub-section? It is clearly not more economical. Is it more efficient? It will enable the directors to speculate more freely, but I cannot see that that is one of the objects of the sub-section, which is evidently prepared with great care, and I do not think I ought to attribute a loose meaning to the language of the Legislature as here used. Consequently I hold it is not within clause (a).

(b) "To attain its main purpose by new or improved means."

The word "purpose" is used here designedly as opposed to the word "objects" used in (c). The Legislature was aware that, according to the way in which the Limited Liability Acts are worked, the framers of memorandums of association insert under letters which exhaust the alphabet what they are pleased to call the objects of the company, and I think the Legislature designedly avoided the use of the word "object."

Now, what is the main purpose of this company? Mr. Farwell says "investment." He might as well say, "the acquisition of gain," using the words of the Act of 1862. In my judgment the main purpose is the investment in Government stock in the manner already described, and consequently the proposed purpose is not within (b).

It is not, of course, within (c) (d) or (e), and hence it is not within the Act at all.

Even if the alteration were within the Act, I should refuse to confirm it, because the debenture stock holders took their stock on the faith of the investments being Government stock investments, and I think they are entitled to say they will not have the company turned into an Omnium Co. In spite of the wishes of the majority, it would be my duty to refuse to confirm the alteration, not only in the interests of opposing debenture stock holders, but also in favour of those who are neutral or of those other shareholders who have possibly left this case to the care of the court, trusting that it would look after their interests.

I therefore refuse the confirmation asked for, and dismiss the petition with costs.

Petition dismissed.

Vendor and purchaser—Voluntary settlement—Possible claim by trustee in bankruptcy of settlor—Onus of proof—"Parties claiming under the settlement"—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), s. 47.

A purchaser under a trust for sale in a voluntary settlement is included in the term "parties claiming under the settlement" in section 47 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, and, consequently, has cast upon him the burden, if the settlement should be impeached by the trustee in bankruptcy of the settlor, of proving that the settlor was, at the time of making the settlement, able to pay all his debts without the aid of the property comprised in the settlement.

Vendor and purchaser summons.

This case raised the question whether the trustees of a voluntary settlement could sell land comprised in the settlement under a trust for sale, and convey the land without casting upon the purchaser the burden of proving, if attacked by the settlor's trustee in bankruptcy at any time within ten years from the date of the settlement, that the settlor was at the time he executed the settlement "able to pay all his debts without the aid of the property comprised in the settlement."

J. J. B. Blackburn executed a voluntary settlement on the 22nd of December, 1888, by which he conveyed the land in question to the vendors as trustees upon trust for sale, and to pay the income arising from the proceeds of such sale to him for life, and after his death upon certain trusts therein declared for the benefit of his issue.

On the 21st of December, 1889, the trustees entered into a contract to sell the land to trustees for the London County Council, as part of a proposed public park at Brixton: to this contract the trustees for sale were parties of the first part, Blackburn of the second part, and the purchasers of the third part. The purchasers raised objections to the title of the vendors to the following effect: that the settlement of December, 1888, being a voluntary settlement would be void as against the trustee in bankruptcy if at any time on or before the 22nd of December, 1890, Blackburn should become bankrupt, and might further become void if he should become bankrupt on or before the 22nd of December, 1898. They further objected that the purchase could not be completed at all until after the 22nd of December, 1890, and whether it could be safely completed after the date last mentioned would depend on the evidence which could be furnished by the vendors to show that Blackburn was on the 22nd of December, 1888, able to pay all his debts without the aid of the property comprised in the settlement. These objections were answered by a contention that section 47 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, did not affect a purchaser from the trustees of the settlement, and, further, that Blackburn's concurrence in the conveyance would place the purchasers in the same position as if they were taking a conveyance direct from him. No difficulty existed at the present time in proving the solvency of Blackburn's position at the date of the execution of the settlement.

Section 47 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, is: "Any settlement of property not being a settlement made before and in consideration of marriage, or made in favour of a purchaser or incumbrancer in good faith and for valuable consideration, or a settlement made on or for the wife or children of the settlor of property which has accrued to the settlor after marriage in right of his wife, shall, if the settlor becomes bankrupt within two years after the date of the settlement, be void against the trustee in bankruptcy, and shall, if the settlor becomes bankrupt at any subsequent time within ten years after the date of the settlement, be void against the trustee in bankruptcy, unless the parties claiming under the settlement can prove that the settlor was, at the time of making the settlement, able to pay all his debts without the aid of the property comprised in the settlement, and that the interest of the settlor in such property had passed to the trustees of such settlement on the execution thereof."

Graham Hastings, Q.C., and Gaselee, for the vendors.—The question is, whether the present evidence, that Blackburn at the time he executed the settlement was worth over £30,000, and that, at the outside, his debts were £1,000, is enough to make the purchasers secure. Besides, section 47 only applies to a case of the insolvency of the estate in the settlor's lifetime. The parties "claiming under the settlement" are the trustees only.

Phipson Beale, Q.C., and John L. Casson, for the purchasers.—The onus of the proof is upon those claiming under the settlement, in every respect, including purchasers from the trustees. The present evidence does not assist the purchasers to prove what may be necessary as against the trustee in bankruptcy: see the judgment of the Master of the Rolls in Ex parte Russell. The whole title under the contract is too doubtful to be forced upon the purchasers.

They also referred to Halifax Joint-Stock Banking Co. v. Gledhill, ante, p. 104, [1891] 1 Ch. 31.

Graham Hastings, Q.C., replied.

STIRLING, J. (after stating the facts).—It is admitted by the vendors that the settlement of December, 1888, falls within the class of settlements which under this section are liable to be avoided by a trustee in bankruptcy. Two years have elapsed since the date of the settlement; but it will, "if the settlor becomes bankrupt at any subsequent time within ten years after the date of the settlement, be void against the trustee in bankruptcy, unless the parties claiming under the settlement can prove that the settlor was, at the time of making the settlement, able to pay all his debts without the aid of the property comprised in the settlement." The section appears to throw on "the parties claiming under the settlement" the burden of proving, as against the trustee in the bankruptcy of the settlor, that the settlor was at the time of making the settlement able to pay his debts without the aid of the property comprised in the settlement: Ex parte Russell. Who, then, are included in the terms "parties claiming under the settlement?" Plainly the beneficiaries and also the trustees of the settlement.

It is suggested, however, that purchasers and lessees who deal in good faith with the trustees are not so included. If the subject were under consideration by the Legislature, much, possibly, might be said in favour of exempting such purchasers and lessees from the heavy burden imposed by section 47, and leaving the trustee in bankruptcy his remedy only against the property for the time being, subject to the trusts of the settlement. I have, however, simply to construe the section as it stands. The words are wide and unrestricted, "parties claiming under the settlement." The proceeds of sale may be lost, or circumstances may occur to induce the trustee in bankruptcy to have recourse to the property originally in the settlement rather than to any substituted for it. A purchaser derives, and consequently claims, title under the settlement; he has notice, from the circumstances of the case, of the liability of the settlement to avoidance; and upon the fullest consideration which I have been able to give I have been unable to see good ground for holding such a purchase not to fall within the language of the Act. This being the state of the title, is it one which a purchaser can be compelled to accept? He has cast upon him the burden when attacked by the trustee in bankruptcy of the settlor of proving that the settlor was at the time of making the settlement able to pay his debts without the aid of the property comprised in the settlement. If that issue could be decided now, and upon the materials before me, I should probably hold that the vendors had made out their case, but that appears to me to be beside the point. The party from whom the attack is to be feared is not now in existence; and he cannot be bound by any proceedings at the present time. The fact on which the title depends cannot be proved merely by documentary evidence. When the attack comes the purchaser must produce witnesses, who will establish, primâ facie at all events, the ability of the settlor at the time of making the settlement to pay his debts. Those witnesses, however, are not under the purchaser's control; when they are wanted they may not be to be found, or they might be out of the jurisdiction, or possibly dead. Even if the purchaser should succeed in producing them, it is impossible to anticipate by what rebutting evidence the testimony may be met or what may be the effect of cross-examination; and the result may be that, even when a primâ facie case is made out in the first instance, the balance of evidence on the whole may be so even, that the purchaser may be held to have failed to discharge the onus of proof which lies on him.

The rule was thus stated by Vice-Chancellor Leach, in Emery v. Grocock, 6 Madd. 54:—"If the case be such that, sitting before a jury, it would be the duty of a judge to give a clear direction in favour of the fact; then it is to be considered as without reasonable doubt; but if it would be the duty of a judge to leave it to the jury to pronounce upon the effect of the evidence, then it is to be considered as too doubtful to conclude a purchaser." In my opinion the purchaser cannot be compelled to accept such a title. It is said next that a title can be made through the concurrence of Mr. Blackburn by his selling and conveying to the purchasers, and their paying the purchase-money by his direction to the trustees of the settlement. This would amount to an avoidance of the settlement by Mr. Blackburn, under the provisions of 27 Eliz. c. 4, and a resettlement by him of the proceeds of sale. If the purchaser consented to accept a title so made, it seems to me it would be good. It has, however, been long settled that the court will not force such a title on an unwilling purchaser: Smith v. Garland, 2 Mer. 123; Johnson v. Legard, Tur. & Russ. 281; Clarke v. Willott, 21 W. R. 73, L. R. 7 Ex. 313. The reasons given are two—first, that the court will not assist the settlor to get rid of the settlement which he has himself created; and, secondly, that there is no means of ascertaining conclusively that a settlement apparently voluntary was not in reality, in the first instance, or has not subsequently become, a settlement for value. The difficulty of ascertaining whether the settlement is to be treated as with or without consideration is none the less that, according to Price v. Jenkins, 5 Ch. D. 619, 25 W. R. Dig. 253, the consideration may be sufficient to prevent the settlor from availing himself of the provisions of 27 Eliz. c. 4, while it is insufficient to prevent the application of section 47 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883: Ex parte Hillman, 27 W. R. 567, 10 Ch. D. 622. In my judgment, therefore, the title cannot be forced on an unwilling purchaser.

Company—Winding up—Contributory—Balance order—Action to enforce—Action for debt in respect of calls—Merger of debt in order—Companies Act, 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 89), ss. 101, 102, 120.

By a balance order made in the winding up of a company, a contributory was ordered to pay to the liquidator the amount of calls made previous to the winding up. The liquidator was unable to serve the balance order upon the contributory, who was out of the jurisdiction, and brought an action in the name of the company for the amount of the calls.

Held, that the original obligation of the contributory to pay the calls was not merged in the balance order, and that the action was maintainable.

Chalk, Webb, & Co. v. Tennent, 36 W. R. 263, discussed.

Trial of action.

The plaintiff company was incorporated on April 19, 1886.

On April 28 Colonel Feilden applied for 200 shares, which were allotted to him.

On July 14, 1888, an order was made to wind up the company, and an official liquidator was appointed.

On March 15, 1889, the chief clerk made his certificate, settling Colonel Feilden on the list of contributories in respect of 200 shares.

On May 7, 1889, the chief clerk, upon the application of the official liquidator, made a balance order against Colonel Feilden for payment of £884 8s. 1d., being the amount due on allotment of his 200 shares, and for three calls made by the directors of the company before the date of the winding up order.

At that time Colonel Feilden was residing in Guernsey, and the balance order was served upon him there; but that service was set aside as being made out of the jurisdiction.

On September 20, 1889, the company issued the writ in this action, with a specially-indorsed claim for the same sum as that stated in the balance order, and further interest upon part of that sum. The defence, amongst other grounds of defence, alleged that the action was, in fact, to enforce the balance order of May 7, 1889, and that the plaintiff company was not entitled to maintain such an action.

Renshaw, Q.C., and Bramwell Davis, for the plaintiff company.—The plaintiffs are suing on the original debt, and not on the balance order. The balance order is not a judgment, and there is no merger of the original debt: Ex parte Grimwade, 17 Q. B. D. 357, 34 W. R. Dig. 14. Moreover, in the present case the calls were made before the winding up, and Chalk, Webb, & Co. v. Tennent, 36 W. R. 263, is distinguishable.

Warmington, Q.C., and Butcher, for the defendant.—This is an action to enforce a balance order, and the case is covered by Chalk, Webb, & Co. v. Tennent. The plaintiffs cannot sue on the previous obligation to pay these calls, since that obligation is merged in the balance order: Cambefort v. Chapman, 35 W. R. 838, 19 Q. B. D. 229; Kendall v. Hamilton, 28 W. R. 97, 4 App. Cas. 504; King v. Hoare, 13 M. & W. 504; 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, s. 18; R. S. C., ord. 42, r. 24.

Renshaw, Q.C., in reply, referred to Ex parte Whinney, In re Sanders, 13 Q. B. D. 476, 32 W. R. Dig. 11; Companies Act, 1862, s. 120. [KEKEWICH, J., referred to In re Connell, 4 W. R. 496.]

March 11.—KEKEWICH, J.—It is objected by the defendant that this is, in fact, an action to enforce the balance order of May 7, 1889, and that the plaintiff company is not entitled to maintain such an action.

In Chalk, Webb, & Co. v. Tennent North, J., held that such an action was not maintainable. The authorities there referred to show the grounds of his decision. One of those authorities is Bailey v. Bailey, 32 W. R. 856, 13 Q. B. D. 855. It was there held that an order to sign final judgment under order 14 will not be made where the action is for alimony pendente lite payable under an order of the Probate and Divorce Division. In giving judgment the Master of the Rolls said: "It is an old and well-known rule of construing statutes that when a special remedy is given for the failure to comply with the directions of a statute, that remedy must be followed, and no other can be supposed to exist," and he quotes the section of the statute giving the Divorce Court power to enforce its orders. That section is, in substance, the same as section 120 of the Companies Act, 1862, and, by parity of reasoning, an order made by the authority of the latter statute and enforceable thereunder is not a ground of action.

It is urged that in this case the calls were made by the company before the winding up, and that the balance order depends on section 101, and not on section 102, of the Companies Act, as in Chalk, Webb, & Co. v. Tennent; but section 120 applies to both, and so, therefore, does that decision.

The other authority referred to is Carpenter v. Thornton, 3 B. & Ald. 52. That case was before the court in the case of Bailey v. Bailey, and Fry, L.J., sums up the point thus:—"An action at law would lie only upon a legal claim, and an order for the payment of alimony is, pursuant to statute, enforceable only as an equitable, and not as a legal, debt." That ground also, having regard to section 120 of the Act, holds good here.

The plaintiff company then fall back on the original debt of the defendant in respect of calls. But the defendant seeks to apply the principle expounded by Parke, B., in King v. Hoare; he says:—"The cause of action is changed into matter of record, which is of a higher nature, and the inferior remedy is merged in the higher." In my opinion that rule has no application to a balance order, which is matter of record indeed, but does not fulfil the conditions of a judgment.

In Ex parte Grimwade a balance order was held not to be a final judgment within the meaning of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, s. 4 (1), g. It does not prevent an executor from retaining his own debt out of his testator's assets, and it cannot be sued upon. It may be used for the purpose of obtaining a writ ne exeat regno, but that is because such a writ was a remedy of the Court of Chancery, and is therefore directly within the language of section 120 of the Companies Act, 1862. I do not think that Chalk, Webb, & Co. v. Tennent is an authority on this point. I think that there must have been something in the case, not disclosed by the report, upon which North, J., refused to give to the plaintiffs leave to amend so as to claim judgment for the debt.

I therefore hold that the plaintiff company is entitled to maintain this action as an action of debt.

Practice—Company—Voluntary winding up—Petition for supervision order—Amendment of petition by adding prayer for compulsory order—Advertisement—Companies Act, 1862, General Order, November, 1862, r. 2, Schedule 3, Form 1—Companies (Winding-up) Act, 1890, General Rules 33, 34.

Resolutions were passed to wind up the company voluntarily, appointing a liquidator, and to apply to the court for a supervision order. A petition was presented by a shareholder and the liquidator asking for an order continuing the voluntary winding up subject to the supervision of the court. The petition was subsequently amended by adding a statement that difficulties had arisen, and a prayer, in the alternative, for a compulsory winding-up order.

Held, that the petition must be readvertised.

Petition.

The question in this case was whether a winding-up petition which had been amended ought to be re-advertised.

Resolutions were passed on the 19th of January, 1891, and confirmed on the 18th of February, by which it was agreed to wind up the company voluntarily, and a liquidator was appointed, and, secondly, that an application should be made to the court to continue the voluntary winding up under supervision.

On the 19th of February a petition was presented by a shareholder and the liquidator, asking for a continuance of the voluntary winding up, subject to the supervision of the court. This petition was duly advertized. The directors of the company alleged that the resolutions had not been regularly passed. They therefore refused to allow the voluntary liquidator to take possession of the books, office, or accounts of the company.

The petition was, therefore, amended on the 3rd of March by stating these difficulties, and asking by an alternative prayer that in the event of the court being of opinion that any objection existed to a supervision order, that the company might be wound up compulsorily under the Companies Acts, 1862 to 1890, and that the voluntary liquidator might be appointed provisional liquidator without prejudice to his title of liquidator under the special resolutions, or, in the alternative, that the official receiver might be appointed provisional liquidator.

When the petition came on for hearing an objection was taken that in consequence of the amendments it ought to have been readvertised.

Warmington, Q.C., and J. E. H. Benn, for the petitioners.—The petition, as amended, need not be readvertised: General Order, November, 1862, r. 2, Schedule 3, Form 1; In re Electric and Magnetic Co., 29 W. R. 714; In re The United Bacon Curing Co., W. N., 1890, p. 74; Buckley on Companies, 6th ed., pp. 673, 674, 702.

Renshaw, Q.C., and Macnaghten, for the company.—The rule now in force as to advertisements is rule 34 of the rules of 1890: Buckley, p. 742, 764. Where the advertisements of a winding-up petition had been headed in the matter of "the Companies Act, 1862," only, Jessel, M.R., refused, although the company consented, to make a supervision order, and directed the petition to stand over with liberty to issue fresh advertisements: Marezzo Marble Co., 22 W. R. 248; Buckley, pp. 672, 673, 675. The amendment is one of substance; many people might be content with a supervision order, who would object to a compulsory order. The special resolutions themselves provided for an application to the court for a supervision order.

Warmington, Q.C., in reply.—It is doubtful whether the new rules—33 and 34—are within the powers of making rules given by the Act of 1890, s. 26, as winding up in that Act means compulsory winding up only.

KEKEWICH, J.—I take it that the intention of the rules for advertising winding-up petitions is, that the petition to be heard is to be advertised—that is to say, that what is advertised and what is heard should be substantially the same petition. There may be slips which require to be corrected, and amendments may be introduced, but if anything affects the substance of the petition it has always been the practice of the court to insist on fresh advertisements. In the case of Marezzo Marble Co., the late Master of the Rolls, who was as well acquainted with the practice as any judge who ever sat on the bench, held that where a petition asking for a compulsory order was intituled merely in the Companies Acts he ought not to make a supervision order, and he directed that the petition should stand over, with liberty to issue fresh advertisements. There he thought something required that it should be made known to the public that he had not got before him the petition which had been advertised. It is the common practice where there is a voluntary winding up to make a supervision order, notwithstanding that the petition only asks for a compulsory order. North, J., seems to have thought in United Bacon Curing Co. that it was better to amend the petition; and there is great convenience in making the petition agree with the order, taking care that the petition is in such a form that the order may be drawn in accordance with it, and he thought that no fresh advertisement was necessary. The custom, however, has been not to insist upon amendment, notwithstanding the convenience of it. The reason of the practice is obvious. On a winding-up petition, whether presented by the company, or by contributories, or by creditors, the creditors and contributories may appear and support or oppose the petition. If the petition is for a compulsory order, and then it is asked that a supervision order should be made, the creditors are in no way injured, for they can only insist on a compulsory order if a supervision order would be an interference with their rights, and the contributories would be bound by the special resolutions which authorized the voluntary winding up. In the converse case I do not think the same remark applies. When a petition is presented for a supervision order, the contributories who have assented to that are bound by their assent, and they may oppose a compulsory order as against their interest. They may say that they have a voice in the matter, and that they will not allow it. The creditors, of course, may support a compulsory order although they are not prepared to object to a supervision order. They must have an opportunity of coming in, and I think that the object of the rule would not be attained if I allowed this petition to proceed without fresh advertisements.

The petition must stand over for a fortnight, and be readvertised in the meantime.

Extradition—Foreign and English warrants—Description of offence—Embezzlement—Fraud by a bailee or agent—Money intrusted for safe custody—Extradition Act, 1870 (33 & 34 Vict. c. 52), Schedule—Larceny Act, 1861 (24 & 25 Vict. c. 96), ss. 75, 76.

In proceedings under the Extradition Acts it is not necessary that the description of the offence in the English warrant should correspond in terms with the description in the foreign warrant. It is sufficient for the purposes of extradition if evidence has been brought against the prisoner in the foreign country establishing a crime by the law of that country, and the same facts establish a crime by English law.

An attorney or agent who has received money from a client on the understanding that he is to invest it when a suitable investment has been found, both attorney and client in the meantime seeking for such investment, has received the money "for safe custody," and, if he misappropriates it, is guilty of an offence under section 76 of the Larceny Act, 1861.

Remarks on the English and French criminal law.

This was the argument of a rule nisi for a writ of habeas corpus directed to the keeper of the Holloway Prison to bring up the body of David Henri Bellencontre, with a view to his discharge from custody.

The prisoner was detained in pursuance of a warrant issued by Sir John Bridge, the chief metropolitan police magistrate, in order that he might be handed over to the French authorities to take his trial for crimes alleged to have been committed by him in France.

The grounds upon which the rule was granted were as follows:—

(1) That the French warrant is the warrant which must be regarded as the one containing the crime for which the surrender is asked. The crime of embezzlement therein is not embezzlement according to English law. The crime of misappropriating money as therein charged is not known to the English law; this warrant is void for uncertainty.

(2) The English warrants of arrest and committal are bad for differing from the French warrant, as also the requisition of the Secretary of State, and the said warrants are bad as differing one from the other.

(3) The warrant of arrest is bad for uncertainty.

(4) The warrant of committal is bad. (a) The prisoner has not committed crimes as a bailee or an agent within the meaning of the schedules to the Extradition Acts as construed by the English law. (b) The prisoner will be tried in France for embezzlement; he is not committed therefor. (c) If part is bad the whole is bad.

The warrant issued by the juge d'instruction of the Civil Tribunal of Bayeux ordered the apprehension of the prisoner "accused of having embezzled (detourné) or misappropriated (dissipé)" various sums of money "which had been delivered to him in his capacity of notary—crimes provided for and punished by article 408 of the Penal Code."

Requisition was then made by the diplomatic representative of the French Republic to one of her Majesty's principal Secretaries of State for the surrender of the prisoner "accused of the commission of the crime of fraud by a bailee within the jurisdiction of the French Republic." An order was thereupon made by the Secretary of State, directed to the chief magistrate of the metropolitan police courts, signifying that such requisition had been made, and requiring him to proceed in conformity with the provisions of the Extradition Acts.

The prisoner was accordingly arrested and brought before the chief magistrate, who heard the evidence, and committed the prisoner to Holloway Prison in order that he might be extradited; the crime stated in the warrant being "fraud by a bailee and frauds as an agent."

The evidence laid before the chief magistrate consisted of depositions taken in the French court relating to nineteen charges.

Charge 3 stated that on October 7, 1889, one Malassis left with the prisoner in deposit a sum of 6,000 fr., that afterwards the prisoner informed Malassis that he had an investment for 15,000 fr., whereupon Malassis at different times handed to the prisoner various sums of money amounting in the whole to that sum, the prisoner giving him receipts and promising to invest for him the whole 15,000 fr.

Charge 4, stated that the prisoner informed one Lefortier that he had an investment for 500 fr., whereupon Lefortier, on September 2, 1890, gave him that sum and he took a receipt from him.

Charges 17 and 18 stated that a sum of 10,700 fr., belonging to the sisters Guilbert as successors to their late mother, and being the proceeds of sale of her land, which had been sold for the purpose of division, was left with the prisoner to be kept by him until an investment should be found. The two ladies eventually found an investment, and thereupon wrote to ask the prisoner to invest the money, but he had absconded.

The prisoner, it was alleged in these several charges, did not in any of these cases invest the sums of money which had been intrusted to him, nor did he ever repay them to the persons from whom he had received them.

Article III. of the English treaty with France of August 14, 1876, includes amongst the crimes for which extradition is to be granted:—"18. Fraud by a bailee, banker, agent, factor, trustee, or director, or member, or public officer of any company made criminal by any Act for the time being in force."

Feb. 23, 24.—Sir Edward Clarke, S.G., and Henry Sutton (Sir R. E. Webster, A.G., with them), showed cause.—The words in which the prisoner's offence is described in the French warrant are no doubt vague, but if an offence is disclosed that is sufficient: R. v. Jacobi, 46 L. T. N. S. 595n; Ex parte Piot, 48 L. T. N. S. 120, 31 W. R. Dig. 78; Ex parte Terraz, 27 W. R. 170, 4 Ex. D. 63. If the English warrant differs from the French warrant that is inmaterial. The terms in which an offence is described in one language do not generally admit of precise translation into another. The evidence before the magistrate was sufficient to justify the committal of the prisoner for the crimes specified in sections 75 and 76 of the Larceny Act, 1861. It showed that he had misappropriated money which was in his hands on deposit. That was so in charges 3, 17, and 18, for the prisoner had no authority to reinvest the money without further instructions. This distinguishes the case from R. v. Cooper, 22 W. R. 555, 2 C. C. R. 123; R. v. Tatlock, 2 Q. B. D. 157, 25 W. R. Dig. 91; R. v. Newman, 30 W. R. 550, 8 Q. B. D. 706, and brings it precisely within R. v. Fullagar, 41 L. T. N. S. 448. The prisoner can be tried in France only for the crime proved by the facts on which the surrender is grounded: Extradition Act, 1870, s. 3 (2). He will not be prejudiced by the particular name which the French law gives that crime. The only question is, was the dence before the magistrate of the commission of an extradition crime? If so, he was justified in committing, and this court will not interfere. The fact that some of the charges do not contain evidence of a crime is immaterial: R. v. Maurer, 31 W. R. 609, 10 Q. B. D. 513.

J. P. Grain and Eldridge, in support of the rule.—The order of the Secretary of State and the warrant of the magistrate are grounded upon the information supplied by the authorities of the applying country, and ought to be confined to the offence alleged by that country. The charge laid against the prisoner in France is embezzlement, and it is with that crime that he should have been charged here. If extradited he will be tried in France for embezzlement under article 408 of the Code, and he cannot be committed here for any other offence. He is committed for fraud by a bailee, and there is no evidence that he was a bailee of anything; there was nothing which he had to return in specie: Stephen, Dig. Crim. Law, art. 285. He was given these sums of money with a view to his investing them. For the same reason he did not misappropriate money intrusted to him for safe custody. R. v. Cooper and R. v. Newman are directly in point.

They also referred to the judgment of Drummond, J., in the Lamirande Extradition case (Canada), Clarke upon Extradition, 3rd ed., pp. 113, cclii.

Cur. adv. vult.

CAVE, J.—In this case cause was shown against a rule which had been obtained for a writ of habeas corpus to discharge the prisoner Bellencontre, on the ground, mainly, that it did not appear that he had committed any crime for which he could be delivered over to the authorities for trial in France. Two points were made on his behalf—one of them technical, the other substantial. The first, or technical point, had reference to the forms of the warrants—the French warrant, and the order of the Secretary of State, and the warrant granted by Sir John Bridge; and it was contended that one or all of them were not in the proper form. I am of opinion that there is nothing in that ground of objection. When we come to look at the French warrant we find that it states, in effect, that the prisoner was in nineteen cases guilty of what the French law terms abus de confiance, or fraudulent misappropriation of money which had been deposited with him in his character of notary. That seems to me to state a perfectly good offence under article III. No. 18 of the Extradition Treaty with France. The warrant of the Secretary of State naturally translates the term into the corresponding terms in our law, and describes the charge as one of fraud by an agent or bailee. That, no doubt, is somewhat wider than the terms of the French warrant, which specifies fraudulent misappropriation by a notary. But I see no objection to it on the ground of its being wider than the French warrant. All that is necessary is to call the attention of the magistrate to what he is required to do in the case. And it is enough that the warrant of the Secretary of State draws his attention to a particular crime under the Act—that is, fraud by a bailee, which expresses in a general form what is put more specifically in the French warrant. The warrant which Sir John Bridge granted also seems to me perfectly good. "Fraud by a bailee" is the phrase used in No. 18, and it is for the magistrate to inquire whether the evidence shows such a fraud by a bailee as would be cognizable in an English court of justice. Now, in order to do that, he is to consider the law with respect to frauds by bailees and the evidence produced before him. In this case he has done so, and has arrived at the conclusion that there was evidence of fraud by a bailee who was acting as an agent. It appears to me that this is the proper mode of expressing the result of the inquiry, and that there is no ground for saying that there is any defect or informality in the warrants which would justify us in discharging the prisoner.

Then comes the substantial point in the case, which is that the evidence laid before Sir J. Bridge ought not to have satisfied him that a crime punishable by English law had been committed by the prisoner. Now when we come to deal with that point we are at once struck by the superiority of the French criminal law over our own. We have in the French Code an article which gives a clear and comprehensive description of the offence which is made punishable. It is abus de confiance, or fraudulent misappropriation by any person who has been intrusted with property or money—a wide and general definition which embraces many cases which are not within our criminal law on the same subject. Our law, unfortunately, instead of being in the form of a code, or even of a well-drawn consolidation Act, is a thing of shreds and patches, and we have to look to different portions of the law in order to see to what extent a person intrusted with money or property is made criminally responsible for a fraudulent misappropriation of it. In the case of a bailee he is made responsible where the article intrusted to him is one which he has to return or redeliver to someone in specie, but he is not made so responsible when he is at liberty, or is bound, to convert it into something else before the return or redelivery is to be made. That being so, the charges against the prisoner do not show an offence of that nature, and therefore that particular provision of our law is out of the question. Then there are two sections (sections 75 and 76) in our Law of Larceny Consolidation Act (24 & 25 Vict. c. 96) which make provision for the punishment of fraudulent bailees of a particular class. Where a man is a bailee of a particular class, a banker, merchant, broker, attorney, or other agent, and receives property with a direction in writing how to dispose of it, and misappropriates it, then, under section 75, he is punishable. But then the law requires that which the French law does not require—a direction in writing, and there being no such direction in writing in any of these cases, the first part of that section is not applicable; and, moreover, the second part is not applicable because it does not include money, which was the subject of the offences charged against the prisoner. Then section 76, which is the only other enactment which has any application to the case, provides that any banker, merchant, broker, attorney, or agent who shall be intrusted with any property (interpreted in section 1 of the Act to include money) for safe custody, and who shall fraudulently appropriate it to his own use, shall be guilty of an offence. This, again, is obviously very much narrower than the provision in the French Code, because it does not apply to all bailees, but only to bailees of the kind there specified. There is another important difference between this enactment and the French law—that the money must have been intrusted to the bailee "for safe custody" and if intrusted to him for any other other purpose it would not be within the enactment. Our criminal law, therefore, is much narrower on these points and far less clear than the law of France is. We have, however, to consider whether the facts given in evidence before the magistrate justified him in coming to the conclusion that there was a primâ facie case against the prisoner of an offence against the English law. Now, on that matter I have gone carefully through the nineteen charges which have been brought before us as made against the prisoner, and

I find that as regards the third, the fourth, the seventeenth, and the eighteenth charges there is a primâ facie case of the commission by the prisoner of what would be a crime according to section 76. It by no means follows that the prisoner must necessarily be convicted. All that is necessary is that there should be evidence to justify his committal in an English court of justice. That being so here, it follows that he may rightly be surrendered to be tried on these charges in France, that the warrant for his committal for surrender is good, and that the writ of habeas corpus ought not to go.

It is objected that the term used in the French warrant is "embezzlement," and that it cannot be embezzlement by English law, as the prisoner was not a clerk or servant. That, however, is not the term used in the French warrant; that is the term made use of to translate it, it might with equal propriety have been translated "fraudulent misappropriation," and then the objection would not arise. Our law gives the name "embezzlement" to fraudulent misappropriation by a clerk or servant, and so the term came to be limited in its signification in that sense; but that is not really the only meaning of the word; the thing exists in other cases than those of clerks and servants, and it is punishable in certain cases under sections 75 and 76, to which I have referred.

Another point which was taken was that, inasmuch as Sir John Bridge has committed the prisoner upon all these charges, the warrant, not being good as to all of them, is bad as to all; that is a point which I am unable to understand. There is the committal of the prisoner upon a warrant which describes him as having been guilty of "fraud by a bailee and frauds as an agent." It does not specify in which of the nineteen cases the evidence had satisfied Sir John Bridge; it seems to me that there was not evidence that should have satisfied him except in the four cases I have named. But the only object of specifying those cases as against the others is in order to give the prisoner the right, if he wishes to make use of it, to object to being tried in France for the other fifteen offences, on the ground that those are not in themselves crimes for which he could have been extradited. That objection he will have the opportunity of taking; but I do not see that there is any reason why the warrant, which is in perfectly general terms, is not to be held by us to be good in respect to those cases as to which there is sufficient primâ facie evidence to go upon. For that reason it seems to me that that technical objection, like the other, fails, and that consequently the rule ought to be discharged.

WILLS, J.—I am of the same opinion. As to the technical objections which have been referred to, there seems to be really nothing in them, and I do not think they are worth serious discussion. The substance of the Extradition Act, 1870, seems to me to require that the person whose extradition is sought should have been accused in a foreign country of something which is a crime by English law. If those two conditions are satisfied, that is, if facts have been brought against him in a foreign country establishing a crime by their law, and if those facts at the same time establish a crime by our law, those, as it seems to me, are circumstances under which the extradition ought to be granted. We cannot expect that the definition or description of the crime when translated into the technical language of the two countries respectively should exactly correspond. It cannot be so, because the definitions have grown up under perfectly different circumstances, and if you were to require an exact correspondence in a mere matter of definition there would be great difficulty in laying down what crimes could be made the subject of extradition. Now this has been, as it seems to me, amply provided for by the schedule to the Act of 1870 and by article III. of the treaty, which describe what are the various extradition crimes. In this case the prisoner has been accused of a number of acts which clearly fall within article 408 of the French Code, and, therefore, would be a crime in France, and which clearly fall under No. 18 in article III. of the Treaty of Extradition. It is either fraud by a bailee, or fraud by an agent (I do not care which term you use), made criminal by an Act in force in England. Now I cannot help saying that I share the feeling of humiliation which my learned brother has expressed at being obliged to confess to a neighbouring country that a great part of the atrocious things which have been done by this man, if the evidence is to be relied upon, are not punishable at all by English law. It does seem an extraordinary thing that a man, being intrusted with money by other people for investment, should be able to put it into his own pocket fraudulently and dishonestly and yet commit no crime punishable by English law. But then, fortunately, we have section 76 of the Act 24 & 25 Vict. c. 96, which says that whosoever being, amongst other things, an attorney or agent, and intrusted with the property of any other person for safe custody, commits frauds in respect of it shall be punishable. There is no doubt at all that Bellencontre answered this description of an attorney or agent as nearly as any person could do. There is no doubt also that he was intrusted with property within the meaning of that section, because he was intrusted with money, and the definition clause makes money one of the articles which are comprehended under property.

Then one question remains—Was he intrusted with the money "for safe custody"? Now I cannot doubt that this section, which deals with property of every description, including money—and money is probably the most common subject of frauds of this kind—was intended to have a real and substantial operation with regard to money that was intrusted to, amongst other people, merchants, brokers, attorneys, or agents.

Now to hold, as has been suggested, that that section applies only to money which is put in a bag and given to a man to keep in a drawer, would be to my mind simply a reductio ad absurdum, simply because, in the business of this and every other civilized country, no such process as that ever takes place; and the probability is that the man who did carry out the duty of keeping money intrusted to him for safe custody in that way would be said, if it were lost, not to have taken reasonable means to secure its custody. I cannot doubt that the case is fully within the meaning of that section if the money is intrusted to a man under circumstances which would make it his duty to pay it to a special account at a bank, or to keep it in any other reasonable way in which men of business ordinarily do keep their money, so as not to have those specific coins, but to have the equivalent at call when demanded. It seems to me that Reg. v. Fullagar is on all fours with some portion of the present case in that respect, because there the money which was held to be the subject of safe custody in the hands of the solicitor who received it was paid over to him on behalf of a client, to whom he wrote announcing that he had it, and asking instructions for investment. In the present instance, in Nos. 3 and 4, which my learned brother has dealt with, my opinion, and, I believe, his is, that, with regard to the sum of 6,000 fr. mentioned in the evidence, there is evidence (I do not say conclusive evidence) that that sum was originally intrusted, not for investment, but for safe custody, and that there had been, with respect to that portion of the 15,000 fr., no change of the conditions under which it was held. Therefore, that seems me to fall within the principle of R. v. Fu

With regard to the other case, that of the Guilberts, there is evidence that he held the money for investment in this qualified sense only, that he, like themselves, was to look out for an investment and communicate with them, and ascertain if it was satisfactory. The fact that one sister found an investment, and the other had been looking out for one, seems to me to be evidence that there was no definite trust to the agent to invest without further consultation with them, and that, therefore, until any further direction should be given, it was held for safe custody and for nothing else.

With regard to those offences, it seems to me that there was distinct evidence to go to the jury, and therefore evidence enough to justify the committal by the magistrate for extradition. I think also that the objection that because some of the charges are not within the extradition treaty, therefore the warrant is bad, cannot be at all maintained.

It seems to me the warrant is general, it is a committal for the crimes described generally in No. 18, and it is sufficient if there are facts which tend to establish that these crimes have been committed. The warrant is statutory in its form, and is not at all to be construed as a common law document in this country, and it is not necessary in my judgment that there should be anything like the same particularity that there would be in respect of the warrants of committal to the gaols of this country under ordinary circumstances.

I am of opinion, therefore, that the writ ought not to issue.

Rule discharged.

IN BANKRUPTCY.

Q. B. Div. (Cave and Vaughan Williams, JJ.) } Jan. 21.

Ex parte POPPLETON (No. 2).
In re LOCK (No. 2). (a.)

Bankruptcy—Reputed ownership—Iron safes—Custom of trade—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), s. 44.

A custom exists amongst the manufacturers of iron safes to send safes to retail ironmongers upon sale or return or to sell as agents, so as to exclude the doctrine of reputed ownership.

Appeal against an order of his Honour Judge Owen in the county court at Cardiff giving effect to the findings of a jury upon an issue directed to be tried by them.

The bankrupt was a retail ironmonger at Cardiff, and amongst other articles he dealt in iron safes.

On the 15th of July, 1889, Messrs. Perry & Co., safe manufacturers, sent to the bankrupt six safes on sale or return, which remained in the possession of the bankrupt until his adjudication on the 25th of February, 1890.

A motion was subsequently made in the county court by Messrs. Perry & Co. for the delivery up of these safes, which was resisted by the trustee in the bankruptcy on the ground that the goods were in the reputed ownership of the bankrupt within the meaning of section 44 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883.

(a.) Reported by C. F. MORRELL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The county court judge directed an issue to be tried before a jury in the following form: (1) Whether there was at the time when the safes in question came into the possession of the bankrupt a custom amongst the manufacturers of, and wholesale dealers in, iron safes to send safes to retail dealers upon sale or return; (2) Whether that custom was so well established that it was known, or ought to have been known, to persons giving credit to the bankrupt in the way of his trade.

The jury answered both the above questions in the affirmative, and from the order of the county court judge giving effect to those findings the trustee now appealed.

Sydney Woolf, Q.C., and Kisch, for the trustee.—The two questions properly raised the issue which had to be tried, but there was no evidence of a custom so well established that it was known, or ought to have been known, by persons giving credit to the bankrupt. The principle governing cases of this kind was laid down in In re Horn, Ex parte Nassan (3 Morrell's Bankruptcy Cases, 51). Was the custom so notorious that anyone making inquiry of persons cognizant with the trade might ascertain it to be the custom?

They also referred to Ex parte Powell, In re Matthews, 24 W. R. 378, 1 Ch. D. 501; Ex parte Wingfield, In re Florence, 27 W. R. 346, 10 Ch. D. 591; Ex parte Watkins, In re Couston, 21 W. R. 530, L. R. 8 Ch. App. 420.

Jelf, Q.C., and Plumptre, for Messrs. Perry & Co., were not called upon.

CAVE, J.—This appeal must be dismissed. The foundation of the order and disposition clause in bankruptcy is that where a man is in possession of goods which apparently are his own, and which a person having an elementary knowledge of the trade which he was carrying on, would have a right to suppose were his own, and may be taken to have given a man credit upon that supposition, it is only right that if the true owner allows a man to have possession of his goods under circumstances which induce others to trust him, that he should be estopped from coming forward and insisting that the goods were his, and taking from the creditors a part of that which they looked to as being the fund out of which their debts were to be paid. This is open to the qualification, however, that it is not enough for a man to say that he was not aware of the custom in the particular trade, but in order to get out of a custom in the trade it must be shown that it had not acquired such an amount of vogue as to be generally known by persons conversant with the particular trade which the debtor was carrying on. In this case the debtor was carrying on a trade of retail ironmonger, and amongst other things which he had in his possession as part of his stock-in-trade were these six safes, which did not belong to him, but belonged to the present respondents. The question was whether there was any mode of dealing carried on by retail ironmongers with respect to safes, which was so generally known in the business of an ironmonger that the persons who dealt with him would not be justified in coming to the conclusion that those safes were his. The present respondents said there is a custom of allowing retail ironmongers to have safes upon sale or return, and they produced a number of witnesses who gave evidence to that effect, and they made out an extremely strong case.

Then came a number of witnesses who were called for the trustee, but the case which they made out really was the case of the respondents, because what they said was that they did not know anything about sale or return, but they knew that it is the custom of several manufacturers to send safes to retail ironmongers to be sold for them, and the retail ironmonger who receives such safes is an agent for sale. The distinction may be no more than a mere verbal distinction, and it is not very important to ascertain which is the more correct way of stating the proposition. I am not at all sure that the trustee's witnesses are not more correct in saying that it is a species of agency, not a species of sale or return, but, however that may be, what is clear is that, according to the evidence of the trustee's witnesses, manufacturers are in the habit of sending their safes out to retail ironmongers to be sold for them, and that they themselves, at all events, are so conversant with that practice that the mere sight of a safe in a retailer's shop would not lead them to conclude that the safe belonged to him.

Now it is not necessary to prove a custom in the sense of proving that retail dealers never have safes on any other terms than these. It is quite sufficient if it is so usual as to be generally known, because if it is known that the safes may belong to somebody else, then whether they do or do not is immaterial. The person who sees them has no right to conclude from the appearance of them in the shop that they necessarily belong to the retailer, when it is quite as likely, or, at all events, not unlikely, that they belong to the manufacturer. As long as there is a practice of a sufficiently general nature, well known to persons conversant with that trade, then those persons would not, as prudent persons, come to the conclusion that the safes belonged to the retailer when they knew perfectly well they might belong to somebody else. The evidence here, both on the one side and the other, pointed to the same result, and the jury came absolutely to the conclusion which everything in the case warranted, that it was the practice that safes were sent out to retail dealers which did not belong to those retail dealers, and that, consequently, a person who knew of that practice would never for a moment come to the conclusion, because he saw a safe in a retailer's shop, that therefore that safe belonged to him.

There is a second point which also was left to the jury, and that was whether, assuming that there was such a practice, it was known to the persons who were ordinarily conversant with the business of a retail ironmonger. With regard to that, the evidence again was all one way. There was the evidence of one or two—one I think would be quite enough—but there was the evidence of one or two wholesale ironmongers, who were persons of the class who, of course, would be acquainted with the ordinary business of a retail dealer, because they deal with them, and they say, "We know of this mode of dealing; we ourselves are not manufacturers of safes, but still we do know something of the practice of retailers, and we do know that the manufacturers are accustomed to let retail dealers have safes which do not belong to them. We do not ourselves pursue that custom because we are not manufacturers of safes, and do not retail them for cash; but we know of the existence of this." This is all the stronger, because if they are not manufacturers themselves, then the fact that they are aware what dealers do, shows that the knowledge of this practice is not confined to retail ironmongers and manufacturers of safes, but is generally known to those persons who are generally conversant with the business of retail ironmongers. That being primâ facie evidence to show that the practice was known to those who are conversant with the business, not one tittle of evidence was called on the other side to show that it was unknown. The jury were plainly bound as reasonable men to draw the inference that the practice was generally known, and that a person conversant with the trade of a retail ironmonger would not come to the conclusion, because he saw a safe in a retail ironmonger's shop, that it belonged to the man who was carrying on the business. The case was tried in Cardiff, a place with a very large number of establishments, and if this were not generally known to persons conversant with the business of retail ironmongers there was any number of them in the place ready to be called, but not one single person was put into the box for the purpose of contradicting it, and the inference I should draw from the way in which the questions were put to the witnesses who were called for the defence would be that all of them were thoroughly well aware that there was a practice on the part of manufacturers of safes to let retail ironmongers have safes which were not theirs, but which they had only got for the purpose of selling. I therefore come to the conclusion that the jury were abundantly justified in the conclusion they came to, and that any other conclusion would have been quite wrong, and that there was no ground at all for this appeal.

VICKERS, SON, & CO. v. SIDDELL. (a.)

Patent—Specification — Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 57), s. 5, sub-sections 3, 5; s. 9, sub-section 1; s. 26, sub-section 3.

Where the complete specification required by the Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1883, does not conclude with a distinct statement of the invention claimed, as directed by section 5, sub-section 5, of the Act, it is not fatal to the validity of the patent.

Decision of the Court of Appeal affirmed.

This was an appeal from an order of the Court of Appeal (Cotton, Fry, and Lopes, L.JJ.), reported 39 Ch. D. 92, 37 W. R. Dig. 133, restraining the appellants from using the respondent's invention.

The facts and arguments sufficiently appear in the judgment of Lord Herschell.

Section 5, sub-section 3, of the Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1883, is as follows:—"A provisional specification must describe the nature of the invention, and be accompanied by drawings if required." Sub-section 5.—"A specification, whether provisional or complete, must commence with the title, and in case of a complete specification must end with a distinct statement of the invention claimed."

Section 26, sub-section 3.—"Every ground on which a patent might at the commencement of this Act be repealed by scire facias, shall be available by way of defence to an action of infringement and shall also be a ground of revocation."

The House took time for consideration.

August 7th, 1890.—Lord HALSBURY, L.C.—The questions of law as distinguished from those of fact which have been suggested in the argument of this case have an importance beyond the decision on the rights of the parties to this litigation, and the first is the question of the remedy if the provisional specification does not describe the same invention as the complete specification.

It is suggested that the new machinery of the comptroller and the examiner has superseded the power of raising any objection to the conformity of the provisional and the complete specification. I am unable myself to take that view. I think it is an essential condition of a good patent that the invention described in the provisional should be the same as that in the complete specification, and I think the 3rd sub-section of section 26 preserves this as a ground upon which an action for the infringement of a patent right might be defended and a ground upon which a patent might be revoked. But upon the comparison of the two in this case I am satisfied that what the patentee meant in one he meant in the other. To my mind it is impossible to doubt that the real invention contemplated by both was the same thing, and obscurely as they are both worded I think the objection fails.

The objection that no distinct claim is made is one of form only, and I think the Legislature did not intend to make the direction, which undoubtedly the Act contains, a condition upon the non-compliance with which the patent should be void. There is no trace of any such intention in the statute, and there does not seem any good reason why it should be inferred from the general policy of the statute. On the contrary, the questions of mere form, I think, were intended to be dealt with under the new machinery provided.

Upon the facts of the case, I confess I have been unable to entertain any doubt. The problem to be solved by the inventor, which it appears to me the inventor in this case has successfully solved, was how to turn large forgings. He has invented a simple, useful, and easily manageable apparatus for accomplishing this object. It may be quite true that everyone knew the use of an endless chain and of a ratchet before, but it is clear to my mind that, in the first instance, everybody acquainted with the subject thought that the patentee's was a new invention, and however old the elements of the apparatus, the combination was new. One cannot but see that the first objection raised by his former employers, though abandoned at your lordships' bar, namely, the contention that they had themselves invented it, is the strongest possible proof of what they thought about it, and they certainly were persons likely to know and appreciate whether the apparatus was new. Later on they agreed to assist the patentee in getting his patent if he would consent to their using it without paying him for the use of it. And, looking at the practical knowledge possessed by these gentlemen, I regard their conduct in this matter as being quite as important to the case of the patentee as the evidence of Dr. Hopkinson himself.

Neither the Creuzot nor the Abouchoff arrangement seems to me to touch the real point in this case, and though the obscurity which I have referred to before in the language of the specification brings it dangerously near Whitworth's patent of 1875, on the whole I am satisfied that no real anticipation of the patent has been proved, and I therefore move your lordships that this appeal be dismissed.

Lord HERSCHELL.—This is an action brought by the respondent against the appellants in respect of the infringement of a patent, dated the 20th of May, 1885, for an alleged invention of "an improved mechanical appliance for working or operating on large forgings in iron and steel." The defendants did not deny that they had infringed the patent, but impeached its validity on the usual grounds—viz., that the alleged invention was not new, and that it was not a fit subject-matter for a patent. They further alleged that it had been improperly obtained from them by the plaintiff, who was in their employ, and that he was not in truth the inventor. This latter point, although strenuously insisted upon at the trial, was abandoned on the appeal to your lordships' house, the appellants submitting to that extent to the judgment against them.

The objections of want of novelty and subject-matter cover to some extent the same ground, but it will be expedient to deal with them as far as possible separately. The invention, so far as we are concerned with it in this part of the case, consists of an apparatus for turning heavy forgings, composed of a wheel and endless chain, the wheel being internally toothed, and having a ratchet working in it, by means of which the wheel is caused to rotate, and the forging, which rests in the endless chain, is thus turned from time to time to the extent desired. It is admitted by the respondent that the elements which form this combination are all old. On the other hand, the appellants admit that the combination was never in use prior to the date of the patent. But they allege that to combine these well-known elements into the apparatus claimed needed no invention, and that it is, therefore, not proper subject-matter for a patent. Forgings, they say, had long rested in an endless chain; the idea of turning such forgings by turning the wheel over which the chain passed was not a new one, and a ratchet working in teeth was a well-known device for causing a wheel to rotate to the desired extent. All this, I think, cannot be denied. But the result is an apparatus of an extremely simple character, which possesses the advantage of being easily moved from place to place, and applied wherever wanted. And the question remains, whether this mode of dealing with forgings which require to be gradually turned was so obvious that it would at once occur to anyone acquainted with the subject, and desirous of accomplishing the end, or whether it required some invention to devise it. There is no doubt about the law applicable to such a question, though it is often difficult to apply it to the circumstances of a particular case, and its application is, perhaps, most difficult when the alleged invention consists of a new apparatus combining known elements. If the apparatus be valuable by reason of its simplicity, there is a danger of being misled by that very simplicity into the belief that no invention was needed to produce it. But experience has shown that not a few inventions, some of which have revolutionized the industries of this country, have been of so simple a character that when once they were made known it was difficult to understand how the idea had been so long in presenting itself, or not to believe that they must have been obvious to everyone.

In considering how the question your lordships have to answer ought to be determined, I think it is important to see what steps had previously been taken to accomplish the same result as is attained by the alleged invention. Down to a comparatively recent period it had been the practice to turn the forgings by handspikes, a process which not only involved much manual labour, but was a source of some danger to those employed. To get rid of these evils two devices had been adopted, which are called in the argument the Abouchoff and the Creuzot. In the former of these the forging was turned by a hook, suspended by a bar and chain, being fixed in one of the links of the endless chain in which the forging rested, so that, the link being held fast, the forging as it descended was rolled round. The objections to this device are pointed out in the evidence of Dr. Hopkinson, and, I think, are substantial. Mr. Anderson, who made the crane for the Abouchoff works, and was experienced in such matters, was called as a witness for the defendants. It appeared on his cross-examination that he had written to the plaintiff's solicitors in these terms:—"Mr. Siddell's arrangement seems different in every way, except that the lowering of the forging supplies the power necessary to rotate it. I will give evidence if needed, though I would rather not." The opinion thus expressed, and the fact that the plaintiff's apparatus, which I am satisfied is more advantageous than that employed at the Abouchoff Works, was not adopted there, appear to me to afford some evidence that it was not so obvious as is suggested by the appellants. The Creuzot apparatus, which was free, no doubt, from the objections urged against the Abouchoff, was of a more elaborate character than the plaintiff's, and could not be so readily moved and applied at the different parts of the works. Beyond these two no other plan appears to have been successfully adopted, and it strikes me as very important that the defendants, who were erecting new machinery, and, of course, knew that some means must be applied for turning the forgings, used for a time, in spite of its disadvantages, the old method of handspikes, and were not at once prepared with any mechanical device to substitute for it, and ultimately, but not until after the plaintiff's invention, made use of the apparatus now in question. I will not dwell upon the various experiments made by the defendants before they took this course. It is suggested that these had their origin in the peculiar position of the defendants' works at the time, though the explanation does not appear to me to be altogether sufficient. It is material, however, to note the manner in which the defendants, who, it must be remembered, were thoroughly conversant with the subject, dealt with the plaintiff's patent in the first instance. They offered to take a licence for a nominal consideration, and to help him to enforce his patent right as between himself and the general public, provided it was done without prejudice to their interests; and they alleged that the apparatus designed by the plaintiff had been improperly obtained from their drawings; but they did not suggest at the outset that it was no invention at all, as the idea was one which would occur at once to any mechanic whose attention was directed to the subject.

After a careful consideration of all the arguments presented by the learned counsel for the appellants, I find myself unable to differ from the conclusion arrived at by the courts below, that the apparatus of the plaintiff was a new invention and a fit subject-matter for a patent, though I admit that the case is near the border line, and that no great exercise of the inventive faculty was required for its production.

I need not elaborate my reasons for thinking that the invention was a new one; they will be obvious from what I have already said in relation to the objection dealt with. It does not appear to me to have been anticipated either by the Abouchoff or Creuzot apparatus. But the patent is said to be open to the charge of want of novelty on another ground. One modification of the plaintiff's invention, though not that infringed by the defendants, with which alone we have hitherto dealt, is said to have been anticipated by Whitworth's patent of 1875. In order to establish this the appellants maintained that the arrangement of the adjustable clip or ratchet is claimed by itself, and not as part of the combination described in the letterpress in connection with it. They rely, in order to make good this contention, on the statement in the specification, that "the appliance as shown in figures 1 and 2 on sheet 1 can also be used in combination; in fact, each arrangement of appliance can be used, either separately or combined, for the purpose of lifting, slinging, or turning over the ingot or forging when in the furnace, under the press or hammer, or when being otherwise operated on." The specification is certainly not a model of clearness or precision. But I do not think the language has the effect contended for. And I have come to the conclusion that the patent is not bad by reason of any of the modifications of the invention claimed by it having been anticipated by Whitworth's patent.

Two points made on behalf of the appellants remain to be considered. It is said that the complete specification goes beyond the provisional in the invention which it discloses, and that the invention described in the complete is not substantially the same as that which is described in the provisional specification. It is to be observed that under section 9 (1) of the Act of 1883 the comptroller is bound to refer both specifications to an examiner, for the purpose of ascertaining whether this is the case, and, if the examiner reports that it is not, the comptroller may refuse to accept the complete specification until it has been amended to his satisfaction. The comptroller must, therefore, have been satisfied in the present case that the two specifications did substantially describe the same invention. But I will assume (and I am not to be understood as at all indicating a contrary view) that, notwithstanding this, the old objection of want of conformity between the provisional and the complete specification is still open. The provisional specification "must describe the nature of the invention," the complete "must particularly describe and ascertain the nature of the invention, and in what manner it is to be performed." It is obvious, therefore, that the former may be much more general and less detailed in its terms than the latter. It is enough if the nature of the invention is conveyed by it to the reader. It is alleged by the appellants that the particular apparatus which is in controversy in this action is to be found described in the complete specification only, and that there is no reference to it in the provisional. This latter is most clumsily framed, but I think the scheme of turning the crane wheel, over which the endless chain passes by means of a ratchet, and so causing the forging to rotate, does sufficiently appear upon the face of it.

The last objection taken to the patent is that the complete specification does not "end with a distinct statement of the invention claimed," as required by section 5, sub-section (5), of the Act. The Act does not provide that if this requirement is not complied with the patent shall be void, and I think it impossible to imply any such condition. There is no more warrant for doing so in this case than in the case of non-compliance with any other of the provisions of the section. The provision which immediately precedes that in question requires that a specification should "commence with the title." It could hardly be gravely contended that if the comptroller accepted a specification where the title did not occupy the first place the patent granted ought on that account to be held void. I need not detain your lordships further upon this point, as it was fully dealt with, and, to my mind, satisfactorily dis[illegible] of, by the learned judges in the Court of App[illegible], as I do, with their view of the law, [illegible]ry to express any opinion whether the specification did end with a distinct statement of the invention claimed, within the meaning of the statute. I should certainly not recommend it as an example to be followed.

Libel—Misdirection—Privilege—Onus probandi.

Wherever a communication is privileged, it is not necessary for the defendant in an action for libel to prove bona fides: the onus is on the other side to show malice.

There is no distinction in this respect between different classes of privileged communications.

Where a jury was told that the existence of privilege depended on their finding that the defendant honestly believed his statement to be true,

Held, a misdirection.

This was an appeal by special leave from an order (July 26, 1888) of the Supreme Court of Jamaica, by which an order nisi for a new trial was refused, except upon one of the grounds of the application; and also from an order (September 5, 1888) discharging the order nisi.

The action was brought by the respondent to recover £500 damages for a libel contained in a letter by the appellant reflecting on the conduct of the respondent, a medical man.

The appellant pleaded that he was a justice of the peace for the parish of Portland, denied the publication of the libel, and pleaded, in the alternative, that the occasion was privileged, that the letter was written bonâ fide and without malice and in his capacity of a justice of the peace, and he also pleaded justification.

Verdict for the respondent for £50. Judgment entered for that amount and costs.

The order nisi for a new trial was granted on the ground of misdirection, the learned judge having left the question of privilege to the jury.

Henn Collins, Q.C., and Montague Lush, for the appellant, argued that a new trial should have been granted.—The judge should have directed the jury that the occasion was privileged, either because the inspector of constabulary was the person to whom the appellant ought to have published the letter written in his capacity of justice of the peace, or because he honestly believed he was the proper person. The judge ought to have decided the point of privilege for himself, and not left it to the jury, with the preliminary question whether the appellant honestly believed that the statements in his letter were true. The jury should have been directed that in order to succeed the respondent must have proved malice. There was no evidence on that point.

Jelf, Q.C., and F. Salford (Meryon White with them), for the respondent, argued that there was evidence to go to the jury, and there was no misdirection.—The first six cases referred to by the appellant were in the respondent's favour.

The judgment of their lordships (Lord MACNAGHTEN, Sir BARNES PEACOCK, Sir RICHARD COUCH, and Mr. SHAND (Lord SHAND)) was delivered by Lord MACNAGHTEN.—This was an action of libel brought by the respondent, Louis Edward Delmege, against the appellant, Frederick Alfred Jenoure.

The respondent is a Government medical officer in the parish of Portland. The appellant is a pen-keeper residing in the same parish, and a justice of the peace.

The libel complained of was contained in the following letter addressed by the appellant to the inspector of constabulary for the district:—

"Boston, Priestman River,
"14th January, 1888.

"Sir,—I have been informed on good authority that Dr. Delmege, of Manchioneal, was called by one Lindsay (who, I believe, is his servant) to attend a woman in labour named Zipporah Henry, of Manchioneal, on Sunday, 8th January; that, though implored by Lindsay to attend the woman, the doctor refused to do so without the fee, and that consequently the woman died on Monday morning from want of medical attendance. I shall be obliged, in the interest of humanity, especially as I am informed it is by no means an uncommon occurrence for Dr. Delmege to refuse to attend such cases, if you will inquire into this matter, and, if the facts prove to be as stated, that you will report the case to the proper authority, as such wilful neglect cannot be allowed.

"I am, Sir,
"Your obedient servant,
"F. A. JENOURE, J.P.

"R. L. Rivett, Esq.,
"Inspector of Constabulary,
"Port Antonio."

The appellant pleaded that the statements contained in the letter were true in substance and in fact, and that the occasion of the publication was privileged.

The action was tried before Sir Adam Gib Ellis, C.J., and a special jury. A great number of witnesses were examined on both sides. Evidence was adduced by the respondent raising the question of express malice. In the result the jury returned a general verdict for the respondent, with £50 damages, and judgment was entered accordingly.

The appellant moved for a new trial. The motion was made on several grounds. But on the 26th of July, 1888, a rule was granted, only on the ground of misdirection with regard to the question of privilege.

The rule came on for argument before Ellis, C.J., and Curran and Northcote, JJ. On the 5th of September, 1888, the court unanimously discharged the rule, and confirmed the judgment.

The appellant subsequently applied for, and obtained special leave from, her Majesty in Council to prefer an appeal. And he has appealed, not only from the order of the 5th of September, 1888, but also from that of the 26th of July, 1888, as well as from the verdict and the judgment entered thereon.

The case was very fully and ably argued. The arguments were not limited to the question of misdirection. The learned counsel for the appellant contended that the verdict was against evidence, and ought to be set aside on that ground. The learned counsel for the respondent laboured to prove that the misdirection (if misdirection there was) might be regarded as immaterial, and that on the facts, which were all before the jury, no other verdict could properly have been returned. Their lordships intimated in the course of the argument that they could not accede to either view. If actual malice had been found it would have been difficult to have contended that there was no evidence before the jury to support the finding. At the same time, taking all the circumstances into consideration, and bearing in mind that the language of a privileged communication is not to be scrutinized too strictly (as was observed in Laughton v. The Bishop of Sodor and Man, 21 W. R. 204, L. R. 4 P. C. 495, 508), their lordships think that the jury might properly have held that the evidence was consistent with the non-existence of malice. The question was pre-eminently one for a jury to determine under proper direction.

Their lordships have not had the advantage of seeing a note of the summing up. But the substance of it, so far as material on the question of misdirection, is stated very clearly in the judgment of the Chief Justice upon the application to make the rule absolute.

The Chief Justice told the jury that it was the duty of the appellant, as a justice of the peace, to bring circumstances such as those mentioned in his letter to the notice of the proper authorities. Their lordships may observe in passing that, in their opinion, nothing turns on the position of the appellant as justice of the peace. To protect those who are not able to protect themselves is a duty which everyone owes to society. The Chief Justice went on to tell the jury that the proper authority to whom such a complaint should have been submitted was the superintending medical officer; but he also told them that, if they thought that the appellant had addressed the letter to the inspector of constabulary by an honest unintentional mistake as to the proper authority to deal with the complaint, then the communication would not be deprived of any privilege to which it would have been entitled had it been addressed to the superintending medical officer. So far the summing up seems to be open to no objection. The Chief Justice then proceeded to explain to the jury that the existence of privilege was contingent on whether, in their opinion, the appellant honestly believed the statements contained in the letter to be true. The meaning of the Chief Justice is made perfectly clear by what follows. After referring to cases where the alleged defamatory matter was spoken or written by masters with reference to the characters of servants, he points out that, in such cases, "no question as to the bona fides of the defendant arises as preliminary to the existence of privilege." Where, however, "it is alleged that the defamatory communication was made in discharge of a duty," his view was that the defendant must "satisfy the jury that he made the communication with a belief in its truth." "No doubt," he adds, "the dicta of some of the judges in the masters and servants cases cited, seem to extend to all classes of privileged communications; but no case was cited, and I have been able to find none, where, when privilege was claimed on the ground that the communication was made in the discharge of a duty, it has been held that the plaintiff, to support his action, must prove express malice. . . . In the one case, there can be no room for doubt that, if the defendant establish the relation which existed between him and the plaintiff, a privilege arises which can only be overcome by proof of express malice. In the other, the authorities already cited show that, where a defendant claims privilege in respect of a charge of misconduct volunteered by him, he must satisfy the jury that he acted bonâ fide before the question of privilege arises for the determination of the judge."

There can be no doubt, therefore, that the learned Chief Justice gave the jury to understand that it lay upon the appellant to prove affirmatively that he honestly believed the statements contained in the alleged libel to be true, and that, unless and until that was made out by him to their satisfaction, it was not incumbent on the respondent to prove express malice.

Curran, J., took the same view of the authorities, and Northcote, J., concurred.

Notwithstanding some dicta which, taken by themselves and apart from the special circumstances of the cases in which they are to be found, may seem to support the view of the Chief Justice, their lordships are of opinion that no distinction can be drawn between one class of privileged communications and another, and that precisely the same considerations apply to all cases of qualified privilege. "The proper meaning of a privileged communication," as Parke, B., observes (Wright v. Woodgate, 2 C. M. & R. 577) "is only this: that the occasion on which the communication was made rebuts the inference primâ facie arising from a statement prejudicial to the character of the plaintiff, and puts it upon him to prove that there was malice in fact—that the defendant was actuated by motives of personal spite or ill will, independent of the occasion on which the communication was made." There is no reason why any greater protection should be given to a communication made in answer to an inquiry with reference to a servant's character than to any other communication made from a sense of duty, legal, moral, or social. The privilege would be worth very little if a person making a communication on a privileged occasion were to be required, in the first place, and as a condition of immunity, to prove affirmatively that he honestly believed the statement to be true. In such a case bona fides is always to be presumed.

Their lordships consider the law so well settled that it is not, in their opinion, necessary to review the authorities cited by the Chief Justice. The last case on the subject is Clarke v. Molyneux, to which, unfortunately, the attention of the Supreme Court was not called. That was a case, not of master and servant, but of a communication volunteered from a sense of duty. A verdict was found for the plaintiff. But it was set aside by the Court of Appeal on the ground of misdirection. In giving his judgment, Cotton, L.J., used the following language, every word of which is applicable to the present case.

"The burden of proof," he said, "lay upon the plaintiff to show that the defendant was actuated by malice; but the learned judge told the jury that the defendant might defend himself by the fact that these communications were privileged, but that the defendant must satisfy the jury that what he did he did bonâ fide, and in the honest belief that he was making statements which were true. It is clear that it was not for the defendant to prove that he was acting from a sense of duty, but for the plaintiff to satisfy the jury that the defendant was acting from some other motive than a sense of duty."

Their lordships are therefore of opinion that there was a misdirection on a material point, which may have led to a miscarriage. Indeed it is difficult to see how the jury could have done anything but find for the plaintiff, having regard to the way in which the question was presented to them. The jury were told that it was for the defendant to prove that he honestly believed the statements in his letter to be true, whereas the letter itself put those statements forward, not as matters of the truth of which the writer had satisfied himself, but as matters calling for inquiry and consideration by the proper authorities.

Their lordships think that the verdict cannot stand, that the judgment entered thereon and the orders of the 26th of July, 1888, and the 5th of September, 1888, ought to be discharged, and that there ought to be a new trial, but only on the terms that the plea of justification is not to be raised again. It seems to their lordships that that issue has been finally disposed of.

As regards the costs in the court below, their lordships think that the respondent is entitled to the costs of the issue as to justification, and that the other costs of the trial and the costs of the motion for a new trial, and the argument upon the rule before the Supreme Court ought to abide the result of the new trial. Their lordships will humbly advise her Majesty accordingly. The appellant must have the costs of this appeal.

(On appeal from the Supreme Court of New South Wales.)

Stoppage in transitu—Duration of right of unpaid vendor.

Where goods are delivered to a carrier to be carried to a destination indicated at the time of sale, it is immaterial whether the carrier is or is not thereby constituted an agent of the purchaser for the purpose of passing the property to him.

The transitus lasts until the destination is reached.

This was an appeal from an order of the Supreme Court of New South Wales, dated the 14th of September, 1888, setting aside a verdict in favour of the appellant and granting a new trial. The case is reported in 9 L. R. N. S. W. 313.

The majority of the judges of the court below held that the verdict was against evidence, and that there had been a misdirection by the Chief Justice.

The appellant, who brought the action, was the assignee in bankruptcy of one William Clare, the respondent, who, as well as the bankrupt, carried on business in Sydney, with the defendants.

The action was brought against them for the conversion of goods which they had sold to Clare upon credit. Upon hearing of Clare's insolvency they obtained the goods, then on board the s.s. Gambier, and destined for Kimberley, upon giving an indemnity to the owners or charterers of the ship, Messrs. Wm. Howard Smith & Sons (Limited).

The defendants contended that this was a stoppage in transitu, legitimately effected by them as unpaid vendors.

The learned Chief Justice directed the jury at the trial that the exchange of bills of lading between Clare and Howard Smith & Co. and the payment of freight constituted a fresh contract between Clare and the charterers as his agents, and was equivalent to a delivery to Clare.

The facts are reported in their lordships' judgment.

Barnes, Q.C., and Howard Smith, for the appellant, supported the verdict.—The contract between Clare and the respondents was that they should deliver the goods to Clare at Howard Smith & Co.'s wharf. The delivery having been made, the transitus was ended.

They referred to Dixon v. Baldwen, 5 East, 175; Kendall v. Marshall, Stevens, & Co., 31 W. R. 597, 11 Q. B. D. 356; Bethell v. Clark, 36 W. R. 185, 611, 19 Q. B. D. 553, 20 Q. B. D. 615; Valpy v. Gibson, 4 C. B. 837; Ex parte Watson, 25 W. R. 489, 5 Ch. D. 35; Whitehead v. Anderson, 9 M. & W. 518.

Finlay, Q.C., and Pollard, were not called upon.

The judgment of their lordships (Lord WATSON, Lord HERSCHELL, Sir BARNES PEACOCK, and Sir RICHARD COUCH) was delivered by Lord HERSCHELL.—The question raised in this action is whether the respondents, who are merchants carrying on business in Sydney, were entitled to stop in transitu certain goods which were purchased of them by William Clare, the trustee under whose insolvency is the appellant on the present appeal, and was the plaintiff in the action below.

At the trial evidence was given by William Clare that when he purchased the goods he gave instructions to Davis, who was acting on behalf of the vendors, to mark the packages $\frac{WC}{K}$, that is: William Clare, Kimberley, and that he told him to send the goods, when packed and marked, down to Howard Smith & Co.'s wharf in Sydney. He stated that he gave no other instructions, but on cross-examination he admitted that he had told Marks that the goods were going to Kimberley; that he was going to take the goods there; that they were going with him. The evidence given by Marks was, that a day or two before the purchase he saw Clare, who told him that he was going to Kimberley; that he wanted the goods he was purchasing to be shipped by the first boat, which was The Gambier; and evidence was also given by Davis that at the date of the purchase Clare had stated that he was undecided whether the goods were to go by The Gambier or some other vessel, but that he would let them know; and that he came two days later and told them the goods were to be shipped by The Gambier to Kimberley.

Messrs. Howard Smith & Co., to whose wharf the goods were to be sent, are shipowners, and were known to both parties to be then loading vessels for the port of Kimberley, the earliest of their vessels to sail being The Gambier. The goods were sent by the respondents to Howard Smith & Co.'s wharf, and a document was sent with them which was initialed on behalf of Howard Smith & Co. by one of their employés, which was in these terms:—"Wm. Howard Smith & Sons (Limited), Sydney, 20/5/86. Steamer Gambier. For King's Sound. Shipper, S. Hoffnung & Co. Consignee, W. Clare. Goods, Kimberley." It appears that in respect of some of the goods, those apparently that were in bond, a more elaborate form of receipt was given by the shipowners, but in those receipts also Hoffnung & Co. were described as the shippers of the goods, Clare as the consignee, and the place of destination as Kimberley.

At the trial before the Chief Justice several questions were put to the jury. The first three were in these terms:—(1) "Did Clare instruct the defendants to deliver the goods to Clare at Howard Smith & Co.'s wharf, and did the defendants accept such instructions?—Yes. (2) If so, did the defendants in fact deliver the goods at Howard Smith & Co.'s wharf in accordance with such instructions?—Yes. (3) Did Clare instruct the defendants to ship the goods by the s.s. Gambier, and consign them to him at Kimberley?—No." The fourth is immaterial, and it was not answered by the jury. The fifth was in these terms:—"After the goods were in fact delivered at Howard Smith & Co.'s wharf, was any contract entered into between Clare and Howard Smith & Co. to ship the goods to Kimberley on his account?—Yes."

Upon those findings the Chief Justice entered the verdict for the plaintiff. A rule was afterwards obtained to set aside that verdict and for a new trial, on the ground that the findings of the jury were against the weight of evidence, and also on the ground that the learned Chief Justice had misdirected the jury on a point to which their lordships will call attention hereafter. That rule came on for argument before three learned judges in the Supreme Court, and was made absolute for a new trial by a majority of those judges.

The first question their lordships have to consider is whether the verdict can, as the appellant alleges, be supported as being right upon a true view of the facts proved at the trial, or at least as being one which might reasonably be found by the jury. The first two questions put to the jury appear to their lordships to be possibly open to the charge of ambiguity. If the meaning of the language used: "Did Clare instruct the defendants to deliver the goods to Clare at Howard Smith & Co.'s wharf?" and "Did the defendants in fact deliver the goods at Howard Smith & Co.'s wharf in accordance with such instructions?" be:—were the instructions to deliver them to Clare personally at Howard Smith & Co.'s wharf, and were those instructions obeyed?—it is obviously impossible to support the finding. But even if the meaning be:—were the defendants to deliver the goods to Clare at Howard Smith & Co.'s wharf in this sense, that they were to be held by Howard Smith & Co. for Clare, not as carriers, but as his agent in some other capacity?—the verdict appears to their lordships to be entirely against the weight of evidence, or indeed to have no evidence at all to support it. If all that was meant be:—were the goods to be delivered to Clare at Howard Smith & Co.'s wharf in this sense, that the transaction of sale and delivery was to be then completed, so that the property should pass to Clare and he should become the owner of the goods?—the finding would be perfectly correct, but wholly immaterial upon the question whether the respondents had a right to stop the goods in transitu.

Reliance was placed by the appellant on the fact that the receipts which have been mentioned were handed over by the respondents to Clare, and that, being in possession of these receipts, he obtained from Howard Smith & Co. a bill of lading. He stated that in that bill of lading he was named as consignee, but that the name of Hoffnung & Co. did not appear as shippers. Their lordships think that some doubt may well be entertained whether he is accurate in that statement, having regard to the evidence as to the course of business, and indeed applying common knowledge as to the course which such a transaction would ordinarily take. But, however that may be, and assuming it to be the fact that he did obtain such a bill a lading, in their lordships' opinion the circumstance is wholly immaterial. The goods were undoubtedly carried by the vessel Gambier on a voyage to Kimberley, and were in transit upon that voyage at the time when, owing to the insolvency of Clare, the respondents stopped them. The arrangement for the freight at which the goods were carried appears to have been made in contemplation of this and other purchases by Clare before the date when those purchases were effected. The shipowners undertook, in consideration of the fact that he was about to have a considerable quantity of goods shipped, to carry them somewhat below the ordinary freight. As far as the evidence goes no transaction with regard to the carriage of these goods took place between Clare and the shipowners after the date of the purchase, except the exchange of the receipts which have been mentioned for the bill of lading. Even assuming that the jury were entitled to disregard all the oral evidence in the case except that given by Clare, and to act upon that evidence alone, in the opinion of their lordships the decision ought to have been in favour of the defendants in the action.

It appears to their lordships that, upon the undisputed facts of the case, the right to stop in transitu under the circumstances proved at the trial was clear. The goods at the time of the purchase were undoubtedly intended by the purchaser to pass direct from the possession of the vendors into the possession of a carrier to be carried to a destination intimated by the purchaser to the vendors at the time of the sale; because, although the language used by Clare, according to his evidence, was that he was going to Kimberley, and going to take these goods with him, that language must be interpreted according to the ordinary course of business as it would be understood by business men; and it is obvious that Clare was not going to take these goods with him in any other sense than that he intended himself to be a passenger by the vessel on which they were to be shipped, and by which they were to be carried, his intention being that the goods should be shipped on board that vessel as cargo in the ordinary way, carried by carriers to their destination, and there delivered to him.

These circumstances appear to their lordships sufficient to indicate that the right to stop in transitu existed. The test laid down by Lord Ellenborough in the case of Dixon and Others v. Baldwen and Another, 5 East, p. 175, appears clearly to cover such a case as this. Alluding to the case of Hunter v. Beale (cited in Ellis v. Hunt, 3 T. R. 467), in which it was said that "the goods must come to the corporeal touch of the vendees, in order to oust the right of stopping in transitu," Lord Ellenborough says that this was "a figurative expression, rarely, if ever, strictly true. If it be predicated of the vendee's own actual touch, or of the touch of any other person, it comes in each instance to a question whether the party to whose touch it actually comes be an agent so far representing the principal as to make a delivery to him a full, effectual, and final delivery to the principal, as contradistinguished from a delivery to a person virtually acting as a carrier or mean of conveyance to or on the account of the principal in a mere course of transit towards him." Their lordships think it cannot be doubted that in the present case, putting the case most favourably for the appellant, the goods came into the hands of Howard Smith & Co. as carriers on Clare's account.

The law appears to their lordships to be very clearly and accurately laid down by the Master of the Rolls in the case of Bethell v. Clarke, 20 Q. B. D., p. 617. He says: "When the goods have not been delivered to the purchaser, or to any agent of his to hold for him otherwise than as a carrier, but are still in the hands of the carrier as such and for the purposes of the transit, then, although such carrier was the purchaser's agent to accept delivery so as to pass the property, nevertheless, the goods are in transitu and may be stopped." The present case appears to fall distinctly within the terms there employed. The goods had not been delivered either to Clare or to any agent of his to hold for him otherwise than as a carrier, but were still in the hands of the carrier as such and for the purposes of the transit. There does not seem to be any pretence for the allegation that Howard Smith & Co. were ever intended to receive or hold, or ever did receive or hold, these goods except as carriers, to convey them to their destination, Kimberley. No arrangement other than an arrangement with reference to the terms of freight had been made by Clare before the goods were put into the possession of Howard Smith & Co. They were received by Howard Smith & Co. upon the terms—for they signed receipt notes to that effect—that they should be carried by them to Kimberley, by means of a particular vessel. Those receipts, showing the terms upon which the goods had been received, passed into the hands of Clare, and were acted upon by him without the slightest objection to their form. After he had obtained possession of the receipt notes all that he did was to exchange them for a bill of lading, in order that they might, under that bill of lading, be carried to Kimberley, their destination. There does not, therefore, seem to be throughout the whole transaction the slightest evidence that Howard Smith & Co. ever held or were intended to hold these goods otherwise than as carriers to be taken by them to their destination.

Under these circumstances it seems difficult to understand the contention that the right of stoppage in transitu did not exist. The learned Chief Justice, in summing up to the jury, appears to have told them that if Clare made a new contract with Howard Smith & Co. in respect of the carriage of these goods after they came into their possession, that would be sufficient to constitute a delivery to Clare, which would put an end to any right to stop in transitu. Their lordships gather this from the particular direction complained of, and which formed one of the grounds on which the rule was granted. The ground was:—"That his Honour, it is submitted, erroneously told the jury that if Clare handed up to Howard Smith & Sons (Limited) the bills of lading, or shipping receipts, received by him from the defendants, and received from Howard Smith & Sons (Limited) another bill of lading, it was of no moment whether the latter bill of lading contained the names of the defendants as shippers, because if at that time they entered into a contract with Clare to carry these goods, and were paid freight, then there would be a fresh contract with Clare, under which Howard Smith & Sons (Limited) became Clare's agents and it would be equivalent to a delivery to Clare." No doubt it might be equivalent to a delivery to Clare for the purpose of passing the property to Clare, but if his Honour intended to instruct the jury that such a contract entered into between Clare and the shipowners would be equivalent to the shipowners holding the goods for Clare otherwise than as carriers, and becoming his agents so as to create a new transaction, having its initiation only at that time, their lordships are unable to agree with the law which appears to have been laid down. If the goods were received by Howard Smith & Co. to be carried to Kimberley, and this was indicated as the destination of the goods at the time when the vendors were instructed to deliver the goods to the carriers, then, in the view which their lordships take, it is immaterial whether a fresh bill of lading was obtained by Clare or whether that bill of lading contained the name of Clare or of the defendants as shippers.

The appellant relied upon several cases which were pressed by the learned counsel on their lordships, in which it had been held that although the vendor knew that some foreign destination was intended for the goods, yet if he delivered them to a shipping agent to be by him sent abroad, the transit, so far as the vendor was concerned, then came to an end, and that there was no right in the vendor to stop on the subsequent voyage. Their lordships do not think that those cases are in any way applicable to the circumstances existing here. There the delivery was not a delivery by the vendor to the carrier to be carried to a destination indicated at the time of sale. A new transit commenced which had its origin in the action of the shipping or forwarding agent, as the case might be, which appears to be an altogether different case from that with which their lordships have to deal, where the goods passed direct from the hands of the vendors into the hands of the carriers to be carried to the destination then contemplated by both parties.

Their lordships will, therefore, humbly advise her Majesty that the judgment appealed from be affirmed. The appellant must pay the costs of the appeal.

STEINMAN & CO. v. ANGIER LINE (LIMITED). (a.)

Ship—Bill of lading—Exceptions—"Thieves of whatever kind, whether on board or not, or by land or sea"—Thefts by stevedores employed by shipowner.

Goods were shipped under a bill of lading which provided that the shipowner should not be liable for any loss or damage caused by (inter alia) "thieves of whatever kind, whether on board or not, or by land or sea." The goods were stolen during the stowage by some of the stevedore's men, who were paid by and in the service of the shipowner.

Held, that the words "thieves of whatever kind" did not relieve the shipowner from liability for thefts committed by persons in his service.

Appeal from the judgment of A. L. Smith, J., at the trial of the action without a jury.

The plaintiffs shipped certain goods on board the defendants' steamship for carriage from Liverpool to Buenos Ayres under a bill of lading which provided in the exception clause that the defendants were not to be liable for any loss or damage caused by "the act of God, the Queen's enemies, pirates, robbers, or thieves of whatever kind, whether on board or not, or by land or sea, barratry of the master or mariners," and at the foot was the following clause:—"It is expressly agreed that and declared that the shipowner shall not be liable for or in respect of any neglect or error in judgment on the part of the master, pilot, crew, or other persons whomsoever in his service or employment."

Upon the ship's arrival at Buenos Ayres some of the goods were found to be missing, and the plaintiffs brought an action to recover damages for their non-delivery. The learned judge found as a fact that the goods had been stolen during the stowage by some of the stevedore's men, who, it was admitted, were paid by and in the service of the shipowners; and held that the exception of "thieves of whatever kind, whether on board or not, or by land or sea" did not relieve the shipowners from liability. He accordingly gave judgment for the plaintiffs.

The defendants appealed.

The arguments and the authorities are fully referred to in the judgment.

Cur. adv. vult.

March 21.—BOWEN, L.J., read the following judgment:—This is an action brought by the owner of goods against the shipowner in respect of the loss of cargo, found by A. L. Smith, J., to have been stolen by the stevedore's men during stowage. The bill of lading includes among the exceptions "thieves of whatever kind, whether on board or not, or by land or sea." The stevedore under the charter-party was appointed by the charterer, but paid by the ship and in the service of the ship. Is the shipowner liable to make good the loss? This depends upon the true construction of the exception and its effect on the primâ facie liability of the shipowner, from which the exceptions are intended within defined limits to release him. The history of the introduction into English policies and English bills of lading of special provisions as to "thieves" requires to be borne in mind. The broad principle of commercial law always was, and is, that the ship, in the absence of express provision to the contrary, was liable to the cargo-owner for losses occasioned by theft committed on board. This idea was of cardinal moment both in the law of insurance and in the law of carriers. In the earliest forms of insurance, before the middle of the 17th century, there were no express words which covered losses by theft, and theft on board a vessel, since it presumably proceeded from negligent custody and not from accident, was not a peril of the sea. Furtum non est casus fortuitus. "Insurers," says Emerigon (cap. 12, sec. 29), "are not liable for simple theft committed on board the vessel, because it is presumed, with reason, that the accident has happened through some default of the captain or crew." About the middle of the century in question the word "thieves" found its way into the list of the marine casualties against which insurances were effected, and from this time forth there has been a recurring discussion both in England and America as to the extent to which in policies of insurance effect ought to be given to this special stipulation. Robbery imports violence, but "theft," which, properly speaking, does not, may be of several kinds. There may be the assailing thief from outside, the thief who "breaks through and steals"; there may be a thief on board among those who are lawfully on board; there may, lastly, be a thief among the crew. The controversy has principally turned upon the question whether the term "thieves" ought not to be confined to the first of these categories—viz., the depredators outside the ship. That the expression was wide enough to cover, not merely thefts on board by passengers, but also thieves among the crew or servants of the shipowner, has scarcely been suggested, except in an American authority which will hereafter be mentioned.

At the first it appears to have been uncertain to what extent the introduction into English policies of the word "thieves" really affected the insurer. In Malyne's Lex Mercatoria, c. 25, the term is interpreted to mean "assailing thieves," "for otherwise," says Malyne, "if there be thieves on shipboard . . . the master of the ship is to answer for that and make it good, so that the assurers are not to be charged with any such loss," which, Malyne adds, "sometimes is not observed": see also Roccus de Navibus, caps. 42 and 43: Beawes, 6th ed., 196; Weskett on Insurance, ed. of 1781; 1 Marshall (Insurance) 187. The language of Malyne has not been, however, universally accepted as applicable to those policies where express mention is made of thieves: see Park (Insurance), ed. of 1809, p. 30. And in the case of the Atlantic Insurance Co. v. Storrow, 5 Paige, Chancery New York, 293 (A.D. 1835), Walworth (Chancellor) distinguishes the expression used in Malyne, Weskett, Roccus, and Emerigon, on the ground that they are speaking only of the general contract against loss by sea risks and without reference to the express clause in modern policies against loss by thieves. The Chancellor accordingly held the insurer liable for a loss occasioned by the act of thieves who had no connection with the ship, although the master and ship might also be liable as carriers on their bills of lading. In the American Insurance Co. of New York v. Bryan, 1 Hill, N. Y. 25 (A.D. 1841), a similar question arose before the Supreme Court of New York in an action upon a policy which contained the word "thieves." The Chief Justice at the trial had directed the jury that a loss by theft, whether by assailing thieves or by embezzlement of the crew, or by whatever person, was within the policy, and this direction was upheld by the court.

No English case, however, has gone to this extent. And the law so laid down has been doubted by writers of authority (see 3 Kent's Com., 12th ed., 303; 1 Phillips on Insurance, 2nd ed., 149.) The introduction of the term "thieves" into the exceptions in English bills of lading is of a later date, in older bills of lading dangers of the sea being the only accidents excepted: Beawes, p. 196; Abbott, 5th ed., p. 214. For goods stolen or embezzled the master was liable, unless there was vis major: 1 Molloy, 329. By degrees the list of exceptions was expanded, and the word "thieves" in a bill of lading has received a judicial interpretation in the case of Taylor v. Liverpool and Great Western Steamship Co., 22 W. R. 752, L. R. 9 Q. B. 547. It was there held in effect that the term was only intended to deal with thefts by persons "not belonging" to the ship, an expression which, however, is ambiguous, but which in Taylor's case seems to be used as equivalent to persons outside the ship. The present form of bill of lading is subsequent in date to the decision in Taylor's case, and is designed apparently to widen still further the meaning there attributed to the word "thieves." But thieves may "belong" to a ship in two ways. They may be persons who, though they are lawfully on board, have nothing to do with the service of the ship; or they may be the master and crew or persons in the service of the ship. Is the language "thieves of whatever kind, whether on board or not, or by land or sea," intended in this bill of lading to add both of these classes of depredators or only the former class to the "outside thieves" who were previously covered [illegible] the word in ordinary bills of lading? This q[illegible] [illegible]nstruction must b[illegible] decided on the broad principle which has been so long and so constantly invoked in the interpretation of contracts with carriers by sea as well as land—viz., that words of general exemption from liability are only intended (unless the words are clear) to relieve the carrier from liability where there has been no misconduct or default on his part or that of his servants. The exceptions in a bill of lading are not intended to excuse the carrier from the obligation of bringing due skill and care on the part of himself and his servants to bear both upon the stowing and upon the carrying of the cargo. Even in cases within the exceptions the shipowner is not protected if default or negligence on his part or that of his servants has contributed to the loss. Accordingly, in Grill v. General Iron Screw Colliery Co., 14 W. R. 893, L. R. 1 C. P. 600, on appeal, 16 W. R. 796, L. R. 3 C. P. 476, an exception in a bill of lading of "accidents of whatever nature or kind soever" was held not to cover a collision caused by the negligence of master and crew. (See also Phillips v. Clark, 5 W. R. 582, 2 C. B. N. S. 156, and Czech v. General Steam Navigation Co., 16 W. R. 130, L. R. 3 C. P. 14.) It is the duty of the shipowner by himself and his servants to do all he can to avoid the excepted perils—the exception, in other words, limits the liability, not the duty. Upon this ground, I am of opinion on this bill of lading that the mere introduction into the list of exceptions of the words "thieves of whatever kind," &c., does not relieve the shipowner from liability for the thefts committed by those in the service of the ship. A subsequent clause in the bill of lading exempts the shipowner from liability for neglect or error in judgment, but leaves wilful misconduct of those in the ship's service still untouched. If it was intended to relieve the shipowner from liability for thefts committed by persons in the ship's service, clear and explicit language to that effect should have been used. I agree accordingly with A. L. Smith, J., and think that this appeal must be dismissed, with costs.

CORPORATION OF WOLVERHAMPTON v. BILSTON COMMISSIONERS. (a.)

Water company—Water supply—Profits from supplying water—Public Health Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55), ss. 4, 51, 52.

The commissioners of a township entered into an agreement with a water company to take the water supply for the township from the company. The undertaking of the company was afterwards transferred to the corporation of a borough by a private Act of Parliament, which confirmed and made perpetual the agreement respecting the water supply of the township; and, by subsequent private Acts of Parliament, provision was made for the application of the profits or revenue obtained by the corporation from supplying the water for the benefit of the borough and of the water consumers therein.

Held, that the agreement continued to bind the commissioners to take the water supply for the township from the corporation, and that the commissioners might be restrained by injunction from obtaining the supply elsewhere, and also that the corporation supplied water for their own profit, and were a "water company" within section 52 of the Public Health Act, 1875.

Action.

This was an action by the Corporation of Wolverhampton, to whom the undertaking of the Wolverhampton New Waterworks Co. had been transferred by the Wolverhampton Waterworks Transfer Act, 1867 (30 & 31 Vict. c. cxxxiii.), to restrain the defendant commissioners, who were the local board of health for the township of Bilston, in Wolverhampton, from supplying, or taking steps to supply, the township of Bilston within the limits of the water supply of the plaintiffs with water other than that supplied by the plaintiffs.

By an agreement dated the 16th of May, 1866, and made between the Wolverhampton New Waterworks Co. and the defendant commissioners, it was mutually agreed between the parties thereto that the Waterworks Co. should supply the township of Bilston with water, and that the commissioners should purchase such supply for the term of fourteen years, the amount of water to be supplied to the township daily to be 220,000 gallons at the least, and such further or greater quantity as the commissioners might require, and the water to be of the usual good quality and fit for all ordinary domestic purposes, and that the commissioners were to pay for the daily supply of 220,000 gallons at the rate of one-fifth of a penny per gallon, whether they consumed that quantity or not, and the company were to supply at the same price any quantity which the commissioners might require beyond that amount.

The Wolverhampton Waterworks Transfer Act, 1867, transferred to the plaintiff corporation the undertaking of the Waterworks Co., confirmed the agreement of the 16th of May, 1866, and made it perpetual, subject to a right for either the plaintiff corporation or the defendant commissioners to have the price to be paid for the water readjusted at the expiration of successive periods of twenty-one years, but made no express provision with respect to the application of any profits which might be gained by the plaintiff corporation from the business of the Waterworks Co. which was transferred to them.

The Wolverhampton Improvement Act, 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. cxxxi.), s. 187 (which is cited in the judgment), provided that the plaintiff corporation should apply a portion of the profits derived from the waterworks undertaking towards a reserve fund.

A provisional order of the Local Government Board, which was confirmed by the Local Government Board's Provisional Order Confirmation Act, 1888, and which, so far as is material to the present case, is cited in the judgment, repealed section 187 of the Wolverhampton Improvement Act, 1869, and provided that the plaintiff corporation should keep the accounts relating to the waterworks undertaking separate from their other accounts, distinguishing capital from income, and should apply the revenue to certain purposes therein mentioned.

The plaintiff corporation claimed an injunction to restrain the defendant commissioners from supplying, or taking steps to supply, the township of Bilston with water other than water supplied by the plaintiff corporation under the agreement of the 16th of May, 1866, as confirmed by the Wolverhampton Waterworks Transfer Act, 1867, or, in the alternative, a declaration that the plaintiff corporation were a "water company" within the meaning of the Public Health Act, 1875, and that the defendant commissioners might be restrained from commencing to construct waterworks within the limits of the supply of the plaintiff corporation so long as they were willing to supply water proper and sufficient for all reasonable purposes for which it was required by the defendant commissioners in accordance with the provisions of section 52 of the Public Health Act, 1875. Questions of law and of fact were raised by the parties, the defendant commissioners alleging that the water supplied by the plaintiff corporation was deficient in quantity and quality. But it was agreed that the following questions of law should first be heard and determined—viz., whether upon the construction of the agreement of the 16th of May, 1866, the defendant commissioners were bound to take their water from the plaintiff corporation as successors to the Waterworks Co., and whether, if the defendant commissioners were so bound, they were nevertheless empowered by section 51 of the Public Health Act, 1875, to obtain an independent supply of water, or were prevented from so obtaining such independent supply by section 52 of that Act, on the ground that the plaintiff corporation were a "water company" supplying water of sufficient quantity and quality, the defendant commissioners contending that the plaintiff corporation were not a "water company" within section 52 of that Act.

The Public Health Act, 1875, enacts by section 4 that "water company" means "any person or body of persons corporate or unincorporate supplying, or who may hereafter supply, water for his or their own profit"; and by section 51 that "any urban authority may provide their district or any part thereof, and any rural authority may provide their district or any contributory place therein, or any part of any such contributory place, with a supply of water proper and sufficient for public and private purposes, and for those purposes, or any of them, may: (1) construct and maintain waterworks, dig wells, and do any other necessary acts; and (2) take on lease or hire any waterworks and (with the sanction of the Local Government Board) purchase any waterworks, or any water, or right to take or convey water, either within or without their district, and any rights, powers, and privileges of any water company; and (3) contract with any person for a supply of water"; and by section 52 "Before commencing to construct waterworks within the limits of supply of any water company empowered by Act of Parliament or any order confirmed by Parliament to supply water, the local authority shall give written notice to every water company within whose limits of supply the local authority are desirous of supplying water stating the purposes for which, and (as far as may be practicable) the extent to which, water is required by the local authority. It shall not be lawful for the local authority to construct any waterworks within such limits if and so long as any such company are able and willing to supply water proper and sufficient for all reasonable purposes for which it is required by the local authority; and any difference as to whether the water which any such company are able and willing to lay on is proper and sufficient for the purposes for which it is required, or whether the purposes for which it is required are reasonable, or (if and so far as the charges of the company are not regulated by Parliament) as to the terms of supply, shall be settled by arbitration in manner provided by this Act."

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., Underhill, and Ernest Moore, for the plaintiff corporation.—Under the agreement of the 16th of May, 1866, as confirmed by the Wolverhampton Waterworks Transfer Act, 1867, the defendant commissioners are bound to take their supply of water from the plaintiff corporation, and the latter are entitled to an injunction to restrain the defendant commissioners from breaking that agreement by getting their supply of water elsewhere: Luker v. Dennis, 26 W. R. 167, 7 Ch. D. 227. The defendant commissioners also are prevented by section 52 of the Public Health Act, 1875, from obtaining an independent supply of water under section 51 of that Act, because the plaintiff corporation are a "water company" within that Act.

Moulton, Q.C., and Upjohn, for the defendant commissioners.—The defendant commissioners are not bound, under their agreement of the 16th of May, 1866, with the Waterworks Co., to take their supply from the plaintiff corporation. If the defendant commissioners were so bound they would nevertheless be entitled to obtain an independent supply under section 51 of the Public Health Act, 1875, and section 52 does not prevent them from so doing, because the plaintiff corporation are not a "water company" as defined by section 4 of that Act, because they do not supply water for their own profit.

NORTH, J., after deciding that the defendant commissioners were bound by virtue of the agreement of the 16th of May, 1866, as confirmed by the Wolverhampton Waterworks Transfer Act, 1867, to take their water supply from the plaintiff corporation so long as they supplied sufficient water of good quality and fit for all ordinary puposes, and that an injunction would lie to restrain the defendant commissioners from breaking the agreement by taking their supply elsewhere, according to Luker v. Dennis, proceeded:—Then it was said that if the defendants were wrong on that point, as I hold they are, and that they are bound by the agreement to take their full supply from the plaintiffs, they have a right to take advantage of the provisions of the 51st section of the Public Health Act, 1875, and that the 52nd section does not stand in their way. Now the 51st section enacts: [His lordship read section 51 of the Public Health Act, 1875, and after stating that the word "person" therein would include a corporation, continued:—] It is said that under that section the defendants are authorized to construct and maintain waterworks and dig wells and so on.

I do not think it necessary to consider that further, because, taking it to be so, there is a limitation contained in the 52nd section which enacts: [His lordship then read section 52 of the Public Health Act, 1875, and continued:—] It is said that that section does not apply, because the plaintiffs are not a water company to whom the defendants are bound to give notice under the 52nd section.

Their argument rests on this. The term water company is defined by section 4 of the Act as "any person or body of persons corporate or unincorporate supplying, or who may hereafter supply, water for his or their own profit." The company supplying the water originally was the Wolverhampton Waterworks Co., and there is no question but that they were a corporate body of persons supplying water for their own profit. Afterwards their undertaking was transferred to the Wolverhampton Corporation, and under the Act of 1869, s. 187, "The corporation shall from time to time set apart out of the profits of their waterworks undertaking, but not out of any other receipts, such sum as they think proper to form a reserve fund to meet contingencies, or for repairing or improving from time to time works connected with that undertaking, and may invest and accumulate the sum so set apart, in the way of compound interest or otherwise, until the reserve fund amounts to a sum of £5,000, and from time to time, if and as occasion requires, shall apply the reserve fund to the purposes for which it is created, and shall so proceed from time to time, if and as the amount thereof is reduced by such applications; and as long as the reserve fund unapplied amounts to £5,000 they shall carry the interest, dividends, or annual income thereof to the improvement fund under this Act, and the same shall form part of that fund."

The result is that the receipt of profits by the plaintiffs is recognized by the Legislature. The profits were given them by the Transfer Act of 1867, and the Improvement Act of 1869 compels them to apply a portion of the profits towards the reserve fund without making any provision for the rest of the profits. Then the Act of 1888, which confirms the provisional order, makes some alteration in that. The provisional order, by article 13, repeals section 187 of the Act of 1869, and in lieu thereof the following provisions are to take effect, namely:—"The corporation shall keep accounts in respect of their water undertaking separate from all their other accounts, distinguishing therein capital from income, and shall apply all money from time to time received by them on account of revenue in the manner and in the order following." Then various things are laid down as expenses to be incurred from that source, and by the 8th sub-clause of article 13 they are to apply such yearly sum as they think proper to form a reserve fund, and there are considerable details given as to the reserve fund, and it is provided: "That the corporation shall carry any balance of such revenue remaining in any year, and exceeding the sum of £500, to the improvement fund, or (if so determined by resolution of the corporation) shall apply such balance, or any part thereof, in reducing the price of water to consumers, as and for so long as the corporation may by resolution determine."

Now that differs from the 187th section in two points only. The word "profits" is not used, nor the words "surplus of profits," but it provides that this surplus or balance, give it whatever name you please, which would remain from the profits of the undertaking (meaning the excess of the receipts over disbursements) is to be carried, first of all, to a reserve fund, to a limited amount, and then the balance is to be applied either by carrying it to the improvement fund, or they may, if they please, apply the balance, instead of keeping it, for reducing the water rates. But, in my opinion, that is not a substantial alteration of the application of this surplus fund. If that was profits down to this time, the fact that the word "profits" is not used with respect to it in this provisional order does not make any difference. Then we come to the interpretation clause. Is this a water company? The corporation is a body of persons incorporated who supply water. Is it for their own profit? In my opinion it is for their own profit, because they make a profit out of it, which profit is to be applied in the way indicated. I do not think it turns on the question whether the year happens to be a profitable year or not; but it is a case in which the rates are so regulated that there is a surplus left of profits over expenditure. In my opinion the corporation is a water company entitled to receive notice under the 52nd section of the Act.

His lordship then made a declaration in favour of the plaintiff corporation on the questions which had been raised before him, and ordered the remainder of the issues to stand over until the next sittings.

March 13.—The Bilston Commissioners having appealed from this judgment, the Court of Appeal (LINDLEY, BOWEN, and KAY, L.JJ.) held (Kay, L.J., dissenting) that, on the true construction of the agreement of the 16th of May, 1866, made perpetual by the Wolverhampton Waterworks Transfer Act, the appellants were bound to take from the plaintiffs all the water required for their district. The question as to the Public Health Act, 1875, was not argued, and the declaration relating to it was, by arrangement, struck out of the decree, without prejudice to the appellants raising it again.

JAMES v. SMITH. (a.)

Principal and agent—Purchase—Conveyance—Declaration of trust—Statute of Frauds (29 Car. 2, c. 3), ss. 4, 7—Practice—Pleadings—Amendment—Ord. 19, r. 15.

The plaintiff, being desirous of purchasing a house, asked the defendant to attend the sale and "be his friend." The defendant attended the sale, bid for the house, which was knocked down to him, paid for it out of his own money, and took a conveyance in his own name. The plaintiff brought this action for a declaration that the defendant was his agent and a trustee of the house for him. The defendant, by his statement of defence, denied the agency, and pleaded section 4 of the Statute of Frauds; but, at the trial, the defendant's counsel, in argument, relied on section 7, and, after the plaintiff's counsel had replied, the defendant's counsel applied for leave to amend the statement of defence by pleading section 7.

Held, that the amendment could not be allowed at so late a stage of the action, and, therefore, that it was not open to the defendant to rely on section 7; but

Held, on the evidence, that the plaintiff had failed to establish that the defendant had been constituted his agent, and, therefore, that the action should be dismissed.

Trial of action.

This was an action brought by Alfred James against Thomas Lawdon Smith, claiming a declaration that the latter had acted as the plaintiff's agent in the purchase of a house called "Galway House," in South Acton, and that the defendant was a trustee of the house for the plaintiff, and claiming that the defendant might be ordered to convey the house to the plaintiff.

The facts, shortly, were as follows:—The mortgagees of the house in question had advertised it for sale, and the plaintiff, being the tenant of it, and desirous of purchasing it, asked the defendant to attend the sale and to "be his friend." On July 30, 1888, the defendant went to the sale and bid £230 for the house, which was knocked down to him. He paid the deposit, signed the contract, and subsequently took a conveyance of it to himself. He refused to convey to the plaintiff, and denied that he had acted as his agent, and alleged that he had purchased the house on his own behalf and for his own benefit. He pleaded also the 4th section of the Statute of Frauds, which enacts that "no action shall be brought upon any agreement made upon . . . any contract or sale of lands, tenements, or hereditaments, or any interest in or concerning them, unless the agreement upon which such action shall be brought, or some memorandum or note thereof, shall be in writing and signed by the party to be charged therewith, or some other person thereunto by him lawfully authorized."

O. L. Clare, for the plaintiff.—Under the 4th section of the Statute of Frauds an agent can be appointed by parol. It is true that under the 1st and 3rd sections the appointment must be in writing, but the language of section 4 is different, the words being "some other person thereunto by him lawfully authorized." Heard v. Pilley, 17 W. R. 750, L. R. 4 Ch. App. 548, is in my favour, and Bartlett v. Pickersgill, 1 Cox, 15, is disapproved. If the fact that the agent has got a conveyance is to make a difference it will be allowing a fraudulent agent to better his position by increasing his fraud. A case can be established against an agent by parol evidence.

Warmington, Q.C., and Upjohn, for the defendant.—If an agent has a conveyance and takes the legal estate, a declaration of trust must be proved. Under section 7 of the Statute of Frauds such a declaration must be in writing. Here there is nothing of the sort. Bartlett v. Pickersgill has never been overruled, and Lord St. Leonards treats it as good law: Sug. V. & P., 14th ed., p. 703: that case is on all fours with the present one.

Clare, in reply, referred to Rastell v. Hutchinson, 1 Dick. 44; King v. Boston, 4 East, 572; and Fell v. Chamberlain, 2 Dick. 484.

Upjohn, being called on as to pleading the statute, argued that it was sufficient to plead the statute generally, but, if not, asked leave to amend by also pleading section 7.

KEKEWICH, J.—It is not part of my duty to say whether, on the whole, the Statute of Frauds has been a beneficial or a mischievous statute. As to that there have been many opinions. It is quite easy for advocates on one side or the other to assume that this case is an illustration and a strong support of the view which they hold. Certainly, in this case, if the plea of the Statute of Frauds succeeds, you have an instance of the evasion by the defendant of the arrangement into which I have no doubt, upon the evidence, he entered. I put aside for a moment one point, to which I attach considerable importance—namely, the terms upon which Mr. Smith agreed to bid for this property. Taking him simply as an agent for the plaintiff, he would evade his liability by pleading the statute, if that plea is successful. Now a very interesting and difficult question has been raised before me, whether that plea ought to succeed in a case of this kind, and the argument has gone entirely upon the distinction between the 4th section and the 7th section of the statute, a distinction which, of course, is well known to all lawyers, and which is pointed out in more than one of the cases cited.

The plaintiff relies upon Heard v. Pilley as overruling Bartlett v. Pickersgill, 4 East, 577, note (b), 1 Cox, 15. And certainly there are strong expressions falling from both of the Lords Justices before whom that case came, adverse to the decision in Bartlett v. Pickersgill. One can quite understand any counsel or editor going so far as to say that Bartlett v. Pickersgill is overruled; but I think that the distinction pointed out by Mr. Warmington is worth attention. There is no doubt that Bartlett v. Pickersgill was a case of a different character to Heard v. Pilley. It is distinctly stated in the last-mentioned case in the argument on behalf of the plaintiff that it was distinguishable because it was not a suit for specific performance of an unexecuted contract, but to oblige the agent, who had obtained a conveyance of the estate, to convey it to the plaintiff. And, notwithstanding the extremely plain expressions of the Lords Justices, including the remarks of Giffard, L.J., at the conclusion of his judgment, I think I must read them with reference to the case then before the court, and not consider them as overruling Bartlett v. Pickersgill. I do not think, therefore, that I can take Heard v. Pilley as overruling Bartlett v. Pickersgill for all purposes. On the other hand, I have a valuable judgment of the late Master of the Rolls in Cave v. Mackenzie, 46 L. J. Ch. 564, where he pointed out the distinction relied upon on argument in Heard v. Pilley, and he refers to the different language of the two different sections of the Statute of Frauds, and the result of it. It is true, certainly, that the difference is highly technical, but then the court is dealing with a thoroughly technical matter, and one must expect to find technical differences. I think that there is much force in Mr. Clare's argument that a man, against whom a contract can be enforced as agent, ought not to escape liability by taking a conveyance, and doing that which, as Mr. Clare says, is exaggerating his fraud, and thus put himself in possession of the legal estate, so that he is no longer agent but trustee. There is considerable force in that, and I can well understand, in that view, the statement at the conclusion of the judgment in Heard v. Pilley to the effect that the court "will not allow the Statute of Frauds to be made an instrument of fraud." That was also much insisted upon in the case of Lincoln v. Wright, 7 W. R. 350, 4 De G. & J. 16. But if the Statute of Frauds has said plainly that you cannot enforce a trust or confidence unless it is expressed in writing, and the particular trust or confidence which the plaintiff seeks to enforce is not expressed in writing, and the Statute of Frauds has further distinguished between agency and trust or confidence, and the way in which agency, and trust or confidence are respectively to be proved, then it seems to me that all remarks of that kind fall to the ground. My opinion of the cases is that Bartlett v. Pickersgill is still sound law, and that the language which Lord St. Leonards uses in his book on Vendors and Purchasers, 14th ed., p. 703, is also sound—viz., "Where a man merely employs another person by parol as an agent to buy an estate, who buys it for himself and denies the trust, and no part of the purchase-money is paid by the principal, and there is no written agreement, he cannot compel the agent to convey the estate to him, as that would be directly in the teeth of the Statute of Frauds." He is referring there, I have no doubt, to section 7 of the statute.

Then I have a point of pleading to which my attention was only called at the very last stage, and so late, to my mind, as to make very considerable difficulty in allowing any amendment to be made. By ord. 19, r. 15, the defendant is bound to plead the Statute of Frauds. The rule does not say that he is bound to plead a particular section. Here, however, the defendant has pleaded the 4th section, and it is admitted that on the 4th section he fails, and that he must rely upon the 7th section; and then I am asked, at the last moment, to allow that amendment to be made. I have said over and over again that there is no judge upon the bench more willing to allow amendments, even at the last moment, than I, provided that there is no surprise to the other side. But I think that I should be going too far to allow an amendment of this kind, and introducing laxity into the practice. A party relies upon one particular section, and when he finds that the authorities are against him, he says, I wish to rely upon something else. I think I ought not to allow that amendment. Therefore, although I hold the 7th section of the Statute of Frauds to be applicable, I think that it has not been properly pleade[illegible]d is not, therefore, available to the defendant.

That being so, I have heard all the evidence, and have to consider the facts. [His lordship then stated his conclusion upon the facts to be that, although there was some arrangement between the plaintiff and the defendant that the defendant should purchase the property in order that the plaintiff might ultimately become the purchaser, yet that there was insufficient evidence to determine what the terms of the arrangement between the parties were, and that no agency was proved so as to be capable of being enforced as against the defendant, and, accordingly, that the plaintiff's case must be held to have failed.]

Company—Winding up—Execution—Mistake of law—Assets increased by mistake of sheriff—Right to recover from officer of the court.

If the assets in the hands of an officer of the court on behalf of creditors or others have been increased by a transaction occasioned by an honest mistake of law, the court will not allow its officer to take advantage of the mistake, but will order him to make repayment out of assets.

No difference between the different classes of secured and unsecured creditors represented by the officer of the court will be considered.

Adjourned summons.

On the 16th of January, 1890, the sheriff of the county of London, under a writ of fi. fa. issued by a judgment creditor, seized goods of the Opera Co. at the theatre carried on by them.

On the 17th and 18th of January two more writs were lodged with the sheriff.

On the 18th of January a creditors' petition for the compulsory winding up of the company was presented.

From the 18th to the 27th of January the sheriff received the moneys paid by the public for entrance to the theatre, amounting to £1,495.

On the 24th of January a provisional official liquidator was appointed by the court, and on the same day the sheriff, out of the takings of the theatre then received by him, paid to the first two execution creditors £631 and £45, the amounts due to them respectively, and to the third execution creditor £150 on account. He also paid £20 to the liquidator, and retained his costs.

On the 1st of February an order was made to wind up the company.

On the 8th of February an order was made by the court that the sheriff should withdraw from possession, which he did accordingly.

On the 13th of May an order was made by the court that the sheriff should pay to the official liquidator all the moneys which he had received, except the £20 already paid, without prejudice to any rights which the sheriff might have against the goods siezed by him before the presentation of the petition.

This was a summons on behalf of the sheriff that the official liquidator might be ordered to pay to him, out of the moneys received upon the sale of the goods seized by the sheriff under the writs of the 16th and 17th of January, the sums of £681 and £49, being the two sums paid to the first two execution creditors, together with the sheriff's amount of the charges on the writs.

The company had issued debentures, constituting a charge upon its undertaking and all its property present and future, which were declared to be a floating security.

Warmington, Q.C., and Vernon Smith, for the sheriff.—The liquidator is an officer of the court, and must act equitably: Ex parte James, In re Condon, 22 W. R. 937, L. R. 9 Ch. 609; Ex parte Simmonds, In re Carnac, 34 W. R. 421, 16 Q. B. D. 308; In re Brown, Dixon v. Brown, 32 Ch. D. 597, 34 W. R. Dig. 18. The rule that money paid under a mistake of law cannot be recovered will not be acted upon by the court itself or its officers. The sheriff mistook his proper remedy: In re Withernsea Brickworks, 29 W. R. 178, 16 Ch. D. 337.

Marten, Q.C., and Manby, for the company.—The sheriff gave up possession of the goods, intending to insist on his right to the takings of the theatre; his right was a legal right to the goods, and he gave that up; he had no equity. In the cases cited there was a distinct equity in favour of the person seeking to recover: In re Evans, Evans v. Evans, 35 W. R. 586, 34 Ch. D. 597; Rogers v. Ingham, 25 W. R. 338, 3 Ch. D. 351; and Union Bank of London v. Lenanton, 26 W. R. Dig. 34.

E. Beaumont, for debenture-holders.—The execution by the sheriff is not an act done by directors in the ordinary course of business, and cannot postpone the debenture-holders. In re Florence Land and Public Works Co., 27 W. R. 236, 10 Ch. D. 530; Hubbuck v. Helms, 35 W. R. 574; Taylor v. M'Keand, 28 W. R. 628, 5 C. P. D. 358; Panama, New Zealand, and Australian Royal Mail Co., L. R. 5 Ch. App. 318, 18 W. R. Ch. Dig. 53; In re Colonial Trusts Corporation, 15 Ch. D. 465, 29 W. R. Dig. 40; Wheatley, Silkstone, and Haigh Moor Coal Co., 33 W. R. 797, 29 Ch. D. 715. Secondly, the debenture-holders are in no way responsible for the acts of the sheriff, he has no equity as against them.

KEKEWICH, J.—For the purpose of determining the principle upon which this case must be decided, I need only refer to two cases—Ex parte James and Ex parte Simmonds. In the former case a trustee in bankruptcy was ordered to repay to an execution creditor money which, under a mistake of law, the former had insisted upon being paid to him, and the latter had paid accordingly. In his judgment James, L.J., says:—"I am of opinion that a trustee in bankruptcy is an officer of the court. . . . The court, then, finding that he has in his hands money which in equity belongs to someone else, ought to set an example to the world by paying it to the person really entitled to it."

I think that James, L.J., is there speaking of a broader equity than the technical equity; because he goes on to say:—"In my opinion the Court of Bankruptcy ought to be as honest as other people." In Ex parte Simmonds, Esher, M.R., adopts the judgment of James, L.J., and says:—"A trustee in bankruptcy has always been treated as an officer of the Court of Bankruptcy, and the court will order him to act in an honourable and high-minded way." I think that the principle to be deduced from these cases s, that if the assets in the hands of an officer of the court, on behalf of creditors or others, have been increased by a transaction occasioned by an honest mistake of law, then, notwithstanding that such mistake is not capable of rectification as between ordinary adverse litigants, the court will compel its officer to recognize the rules of honesty as between man and man, and to act accordingly.

In this case, the sheriff, on taking possession, had the right of seizing the goods of the company; but instead of insisting upon that right he seized the money in the tills, which was not liable to seizure because of the presentation of the petition for winding up. By this act the sheriff gave up possession of the goods.

The mistake, therefore, consisted in the receipt by the sheriff of these moneys and payment of the execution creditors thereout. The result of the mistake has been that the creditors, represented by the official liquidator, have obtained the money in the tills and the goods also; and the liquidator, on behalf of the creditors, now claims to have the benefit of that mistake, by which the assets in his hands have been so increased. That is exactly the question of honesty which is dealt with in the authorities to which I have referred.

I think that the debenture-holders, notwithstanding their floating security, are in no better position than the ordinary creditors; the official liquidator really represents both classes of creditors.

I am of opinion, therefore, that no difference between the different classes of creditors comes into question, and that because the official liquidator is an officer of the court and represents both classes of creditors I have power to make the order asked.

Bankruptcy—Discharge—Absolute refusal—Second application for discharge—Right of bankrupt to apply de novo*—Practice—Bankruptcy Act,* 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), ss. 28, 104.

Where the discharge of a bankrupt has been refused absolutely, the bankrupt is not entitled to apply to the court de novo for an order of discharge. But the court has power, under section 104 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, to entertain an application by the bankrupt for a review, and may thereupon rescind or vary its former order if it thinks fit.

Appeal against an order of his Honour Judge Shand in the county court at Liverpool absolutely refusing the bankrupt's discharge.

The bankrupt and his brother traded as chemical brokers at Liverpool down to the year 1884, when they were adjudicated bankrupt.

In October, 1884, the present appellant applied for his discharge, which was refused on the 31st of October, 1884.

On the 17th of October, 1890, the appellant applied de novo to the court at Liverpool for an order of discharge, or in the alternative for an order reviewing the order of the 31st of October, 1884.

In the course of the hearing the bankrupt's counsel abandoned the application for a review, and the application de novo for a discharge was refused.

The bankrupt now appealed from that refusal.

W. F. Taylor, for the bankrupt.—The discharge was refused on the 31st of October, 1884, on the ground that the bankrupt had been guilty of rash and hazardous speculations, and had continued to trade after knowledge of insolvency. The application on the 17th of October, 1890, was made on fresh evidence as to the conduct of the bankrupt from 1884 to 1890. He had been in responsible situations and had worked hard and contracted no debts. He had also given every assistance to the official receiver in getting for the creditors a sum of £2,680 which came to him under his mother's marriage settlement. The county court judge was of opinion that the bankrupt had no right to make the application, and he said that in any event the case did not come within the words of the judgment in In re Lloyd, Ex parte Lloyd, 6 Morrell's Bankruptcy Cases, 297, 38 W. R. Dig. 16. The application for a review of the first order was abandoned, because it was thought that it could not be supported.

Muir Mackenzie, for the official receiver.—I do not propose to argue the question whether there is power to a bankrupt to apply de novo in the way this bankrupt has applied. The only other question is whether the facts brought forward will justify the court in interfering with the order of the county court judge. The discharge was refused for trading with knowledge of insolvency and for rash and hazardous speculations. The subsequent good conduct of the bankrupt cannot alter that.

Cur. adv. vult.

Feb. 16.—CAVE, J., read the written judgment of the COURT, which, after dealing with the facts, proceeded:—This case raises for our determination the questions which were discussed, but upon which no decision was given, in the case of In re Lloyd, Ex parte Lloyd, and I may say at once that I think the learned judge was right in regarding that case as no authority upon the point which alone came before him. Where upon the hearing of the application of the bankrupt the judge is of opinion that the applicant is not entitled to an absolute discharge, and also feels himself unable to fix a period of suspension, he may, in refusing to grant a discharge, reserve liberty to the bankrupt to apply again, and if he does so the bankrupt may apply again in pursuance of the leave reserved as a matter of right; but, having regard to the power of rehearing hereinafter referred to, I think it would be more convenient that in such a case the judge should refuse the discharge absolutely. Where the discharge is absolutely refused the bankrupt cannot apply de novo as a matter of right, as was sought to be done here, and in my opinion the learned judge was justified, after the abandonment of the application for a review, in making the order which he did make; and, indeed, I agree with him that he had no power to entertain the application, the refusal of the 31st of October, 1884, having been, as he says, an absolute refusal.

Is, then, the position of a bankrupt whose order of discharge has been refused, and rightly refused, on his first application, an utterly hopeless one, and must he, no matter how exemplary his subsequent behaviour, be compelled to go through the remainder of his life as an undischarged bankrupt? I should be very sorry to think that this was so, and agree with the learned judge of the county court that the refusal of a discharge is the very order above all others which may with advantage be considered after the lapse of time. It appears to me that the power of reconsidering an absolute refusal is conferred on the court by section 104 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, which provides that every court having jurisdiction in bankruptcy under the Act may review, rescind, or vary any order made by it under its bankruptcy jurisdiction. This section gives the court a discretion of the widest and most far-reaching character, and when properly exercised it is so beneficial in its operation, and so calculated to advance the ends of justice, that I think it ought not to be restrained by construing it in any niggardly spirit.

One general, although not invariable, rule has been laid down for guiding the court in the exercise of its discretion under this section—viz., that the court should not grant a rehearing where the only object of the applicant is to obtain another opportunity for appealing from the decision of the judge when he has let the time for appealing from the original decision go by. The universal practice of fixing a limit of time on the powers to appeal is derived from the general maxim, Interest reipublicæ ut sit finis litium, and the maxim should not be extended beyond the limit of its utility. Where litigants have gone to trial and the court has decided between them, it is inexpedient that the defeated party should be allowed to reopen the litigation at any distance of time when the position of the parties may have been materially affected by the lapse of time or the loss of material evidence. In such a case as this, however, where the refusal of the discharge operates as a punishment on the bankrupt, there can be no reason why the punishment should not be remitted at any distance of time if it can be shown that the object of the punishment has been effected. No one is affected by the modification or rescission of such an order except the bankrupt himself and, to some extent, society at large, which is benefited by the infliction of a punishment just in proportion to its justice and necessity, and is therefore injured, and not benefited, by the continuance of a punishment after the necessity for it has ceased.

I entertain no doubt that the judge was at liberty to hear an application to review the order of October 31, 1884, if he thought a primâ facie case was made out for such an indulgence. We are told that in this case the application for a review was abandoned because it was supposed—as it seems to me wrongly—that an application for review could only be founded on evidence which might have been before the court on the original application. I see nothing at all in the section to warrant this limitation. The learned judge seems to have discussed the merits of the case in order that we might consider it upon the merits if we were of opinion that he had power to hear the application; and as I think he had the power to rehear his former decision of October 31, 1884, I do not see why we should not proceed to deal with the case at once instead of sending the bankrupt to renew his application for a rehearing, which would occasion considerable expense to all parties without any corresponding advantage. The learned judge says he should have refused the application, even if he had thought he had the power to rehear it, on the ground that the new facts did not bring the case, to use the judge's words, within the conditions sketched by me in the case of In re Lloyd, Ex parte Lloyd. If the judge will look at that case again I think he will see that I sketched no conditions whatever, but was simply giving an instance by way of illustration, and I should be very sorry to lay down beforehand any conditions for limiting the judge's discretion as to the circumstances which might seem to him sufficient to induce him to vary his refusal of the discharge.

The conduct of this bankrupt since the bankruptcy appears to have been creditable. He has worked hard, held some responsible positions, lived on a narrow income, and has not incurred any debts. He has also rendered to the official receiver every assistance in getting for the creditors a sum of £2,680 which came to him under his mother's marriage settlement. Upon the whole of the facts, and having regard to the scale of punishment which has been adopted under the Act of 1883, I am of opinion that a suspension of the applicant's discharge for nearly seven years is a sufficient punishment, and that he should now have his discharge. As, however, the appellant has adopted the wrong mode of procedure, and only succeeded in getting his discharge by our indulgence, he must pay his own costs, and the official receiver will take his costs out of the deposit.

Appeal allowed.

Bankruptcy—Proof—Surety for bankrupt—Proof for purpose of voting at first meeting—Proof before payment of debt—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), schedule 1, r. 9.

A surety for a bankrupt is not entitled to prove for the purpose of voting at the first meeting of creditors unless he has paid the debt for which he is surety.

Appeal against an order of his Honour Judge Hughes in the county court at Macclesfield, by which he affirmed a decision of the official receiver admitting, for the purpose of voting at the first meeting of creditors, a proof of debt for £500.

The first meeting of creditors of the debtor was held on November 14, 1890, at which a proof was tendered for the purpose of voting by one John May for £500 as guarantor of the debtor to a bank.

At this time Mr. May had not paid any part of the debt, and an objection to the proof was taken under rule 9 of the First Schedule to the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, which provides that "a creditor shall not vote at any such meeting in respect of any unliquidated or contingent debt, or any debt the value of which is not ascertained."

The objection was overruled by the official receiver as chairman of the meeting, and this decision was subsequently affirmed by the county court judge.

Herbert Reed, for the appellant.—The ground of the objection is, that the proof was an unliquidated or contingent debt, the value of which could not be ascertained. Formerly a surety could not prove at all until payment, even for a dividend. Now, it would seem, by the decision in the case of Ex parte Delmar, In re Herepath & Delmar, 38 W. R. 752, that, under the provisions of section 37 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, a surety for a bankrupt is entitled to prove against the bankrupt's estate although he has not paid the debt for which he is surety. But that decision does not affect the present case, which comes under rule 9 of the First Schedule, and not under section 37. I do not object to May proving for a dividend, but to his vote at the first meeting.

No person appeared as respondent to the appeal.

CAVE, J.—I think the appellant is entitled to succeed. It is clear that the liability of a surety, if it can be the subject of proof before the debt is paid, as to which I express no opinion at present, nor do I think the question was finally settled by the very peculiar case of Ex parte Delmar, In re Herepath & Delmar, but if he can prove, it can only be a contingent liability in respect of which he can tender a proof. It is clear that until he has actually paid the debt his proof is not a liquidated one, but, at the outside, a contingent liability.

The appeal must be allowed.

Administration action — Married woman — Separate estate—Restraint on anticipation—Order for payment of costs by married woman—Order that arrears of income of married woman be not immediately paid to her—Married Women's Property Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 75), ss. 1 (2), 19.

A married woman was entitled, under the will of a testator whose estate was being administered in an action commenced before the passing of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, to part of the income of his estate for life for her separate use, without power of anticipation. In 1889 she, in her own name, without a next friend, first commenced an action in the Queen's Bench Division, and subsequently took out a summons in the administration action, for certain relief against the trustees of the will. Both her action and summons were dismissed, and she was ordered to pay the trustees their costs thereof respectively, both orders (being in the usual form as settled in Scott v. Morley, 36 W. R. 67, 20 Q. B. D. 120) limiting execution to her separate property not subject to restraint against anticipation, unless, by virtue of section 19 of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, such property should be liable to execution notwithstanding such restraint.

At the date of these orders the trustees had in their hands a sum representing arrears of the married woman's income, which had accrued due since the date of the summons, and which was more than sufficient to pay the costs.

The trustees having applied for leave to retain their costs of the Queen's Bench Division action and of the summons, out of the money in their hands,

The principle of law on which Pike v. Fitzgibbon, 29 W. R. 551, 17 *Ch. An order of the court made merely for convenience of administration, and in effect directing that money representing arrears of income which have actually accrued due to a married woman, should not be immediately paid to her, does not render such arrears "property subject to restraint against anticipation," and consequently such arrears can be taken in execution under an order made in the form settled in Scott v. Morley.

Appeal from Kekewich, J.

The action was commenced in 1867 to administer the estate of a testator under whose will the present appellant, Mrs. Laura Midwinter, who was a married woman and one of the defendants in the action, was entitled to the income of part of his estate for her life for her separate use without power of anticipation.

By an order of Bacon, V.C., dated the 22nd of April, 1882, and made upon the second further consideration of the action, Robert Brown and Walter James Midwinter were appointed new trustees of the will, and the trust estate became vested in the said new trustees jointly with John Bennett, the continuing trustee, upon the trusts of the will. After divers other directions the order proceeded: "And it is ordered that the said defendants, John Bennett, Robert Brown, and Walter James Midwinter, be at liberty, out of any moneys in their hands forming part of the testator's estate, to pay to each of the defendants, Emma Brown, Esther Elizabeth Bennett, and Laura Midwinter, upon their respective separate receipts, until further order the sum of one hundred and twenty-five pounds on the following days of each year (that is to say), the 24th of June, the 29th of September, the 25th of December, and the 25th of March, the first of such payments to be made on the 24th of June, 1882." After directing the accounts to be continued, the order proceeded: "And it is ordered that the defendants, John Bennett, Robert Brown, and Walter James Midwinter . . . be at liberty to pay to the defendants, Esther Elizabeth Bennett; Emma Brown, and Laura Midwinter respectively, upon their respective receipts, the residue, (after deducting the proportionate parts of the said costs as aforesaid, and after retaining sufficient to enable them to pay the proportionate parts of the outgoings in connection with the estate for the following quarter), of the balances from time to time of the accounts respectively in respect of the shares of the testator's estate devised and bequeathed in trust, for the benefit of them respectively and their respective issue; and any persons interested are to be at liberty to apply in chambers as to the residues of such balances respectively if the same are not so paid"; and the subsequent further consideration of the action was adjourned, with liberty to apply.

It appeared that Mrs. Midwinter, who was married before the passing of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, was separated from her husband, and that, in connection with the pecuniary arrangements between them, she had claimed that certain moneys in the hands of the trustees of the will should be paid over to her. Pursuant to that claim, in January, 1889, she instituted, in her own name, without a next friend, an action in the Queen's Bench Division for repayment to her of certain money already paid to her husband, and for payment to her of the moneys already mentioned as being then in the hands of the trustees. That action stood over pending an application to Kay, J., who was the judge before whom the administration action was being carried on.

In February, 1890, Mrs. Midwinter took out, also in her own name, without a next friend, a summons (in the administration action) against the trustees, and Kay, J., ordered certain sums to be paid to her at once, and that the summons should stand over. On the 16th of July, 1890, Kay, J., dismissed the summons, and ordered Mrs. Midwinter to pay the trustees their costs thereof.

The order (being in the usual form, as settled in the case of Scott v. Morley, 36 W. R. 67, 20 Q. B. D. 120) expressly limited execution to the separate property of the married woman not subject to any restraint against anticipation, unless, by virtue of section 19 of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, such property should be liable to execution notwithstanding such restraint.

On the 12th of August, 1890, a formal order in the same form was also made dismissing the action in the Queen's Bench Division, with costs.

At the time these orders were made the trustees had in their hands a sum of £304 2s. 8d., being arrears of Mrs. Midwinter's income actually accrued due since she took out her summons.

Section 1, sub-section (2), of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, provides that "a married woman shall be capable of entering into and rendering herself liable in respect of and to the extent of her separate property on any contract, and of suing and being sued, either in contract or in tort or otherwise, in all respects as if she were a feme sole, and her husband need not be joined with her as plaintiff or defendant, or be made a party to any action or other legal proceeding brought by or taken against her; and any damages or costs recovered by her in any such action or proceeding shall be her separate property; and any damages or costs recovered against her in any such action or proceeding shall be payable out of her separate property, and not otherwise."

Section 19 provides that "nothing in this Act contained shall interfere with or affect any settlement or agreement for a settlement made or to be made, whether before or after marriage, respecting the property of any married woman, or shall interfere with or render inoperative any restriction against anticipation at present attached, or to be hereafter attached, to the enjoyment of any property or income by a woman under any settlement, agreement for a settlement, will, or other instrument; but no restriction against anticipation contained in any settlement or agreement for a settlement of a woman's own property to be made or entered into by herself shall have any validity against debts contracted by her before marriage, and no settlement or agreement for a settlement shall have any greater force or validity against creditors of such woman than a like settlement or agreement for a settlement made or entered into by a man would have against his creditors."

The trustees having made an application for leave to retain the taxed costs of Mrs. Midwinter's summons (which she had been ordered to pay) out of the sum of £304 2s. 8d. arrears of her income in their hands, Kekewich, J., gave them permission to do so.

Mrs. Midwinter now appealed from the order giving that permission.

Mulligan and Watt, for the appellant.—A married woman cannot be made to pay costs out of money as to which she is restrained from anticipation. [KAY, L.J.—Some of this money was in the trustees' hands at the date of the dismissal of the summons.] Yes, but under the order of the 22nd of April, 1882, she was not entitled to payment of it till later. [LINDLEY, L.J.—Then the disability to receive it was not in consequence of the restraint on anticipation in the will, but in consequence of an order of the court.] There was a restraint on anticipation in the will. No part of this lady's income which has accrued due since she took out her summons can be taken to pay these costs: In re Glanvill, Ellis v. Johnson, 34 W. R. 118, 309, 31 Ch. D. 532. The other side rely on D'Oechsner v. Scott, 24 Beav. 239, 6 W. R. Ch. Dig. 91; but there the settlement contained a clause expressly providing that the trustees might reimburse themselves out of money coming into their hands any expenses incurred by them in the execution of the trusts. [KAY, L.J.—In In re Glanvill Cotton, L.J., in noticing D'Oechsner v. Scott, said that Lord Romilly decided it on the peculiar wording of the settlement there, which went beyond the usual terms in favour of the trustees.] They cannot rely on D'Oechsner v. Scott, or on In re Bown, O'Halloran v. King, 33 W. R. 58, 27 Ch. D. 411, because here the order limited execution to the separate property not restrained from anticipation. This case cannot turn on the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, as section 19 expressly provides that nothing in the Act shall affect any settlement made respecting the property of any married woman. Hyde v. Hyde, 36 W. R. 708, 13 P. D. 166, is not inconsistent with In re Glanvill. [KAY, L.J.—The real question is whether the appellant could, at the date of the issuing of her summons, have charged any of these moneys by instrument under her hand.]

They also referred to Pike v. Fitzgibbon, 29 W. R. 551, 17 Ch. D. 454; Stanley v. Stanley, 26 W. R. 310, 7 Ch. D. 589; and In re Andrews, Edwards v. Dewar, 34 W. R. 62, 30 Ch. D. 159.

Renshaw, Q.C., and Reginald Winslow (Bramwell Davis with them), for the respondents.—The only restraint on anticipation that cannot be disregarded is that created by the will, not that arising from the order of the court, and made merely for the purposes of the administration of the estate. At the date of the order dismissing the summons the trustees had £304 2s. 8d. arrears of income in their hands, and in the following month a further sum of about £55 came in, so that there was far more than enough to pay these costs, which only amounted to about £216 altogether. [KAY, L.J.—You say she could have made a valid mortgage of these moneys at that time?] Certainly. She could have charged the whole. It is merely for convenience of administration that she is only to be paid £125 quarterly, and the balance at the end of the year. As to D'Oechsner v. Scott, it shows that the trustees had a right to be indemnified out of moneys coming to their hands. Section 1, sub-section (2), of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, is the section that applies to this case. [LINDLEY, L.J.—You do not want that if you are right on the facts.]

Freeman, for another party.

Mulligan, in reply.—The court, in interpreting the will, fixed by its order the times of payment, and the income cannot be anticipated with reference to those times. [LINDLEY, L.J.—That order cannot affect the will so as to create a restraint on anticipation not directed by the will itself.] The income attached must be free from restraint at the date of the wrongful act in respect of which the married woman is ordered to pay costs. [KAY, L.J.—There was no positive order for payment by the lady out of her separate estate in In re Glanvill.] In Pike v. Fitzgibbon James, L.J., said at the end of his judgment that the only separate property which could be reached was that which a married woman had at the time of contracting the engagements which it was sought to enforce.

He also referred to Whittaker v. Kershaw, 38 W. R. 497, ante, p. 22, 45 Ch. D. 320, at p. 327.

Cur. adv. vult.

Feb. 26.—LINDLEY, L.J.—This is an appeal from an order made by Kekewich, J., authorizing the trustees of a will, under which a Mrs. Midwinter is entitled to income to her separate use without power of anticipation, to retain and pay certain costs which they had incurred in the execution of their trusts, and which costs she had been ordered personally to pay.

Now there were two orders, or one order and one judgment, affecting her. One was an order dated the 16th of July, 1890, by which a summons taken out by her without any next friend, that is to say, under the provisions of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, which alone entitles her to sue in that way, was dismissed, with costs. She was ordered to pay the costs, and then there was the usual limitation as to separate estate which she could not anticipate. It ran in this way:—"And it is ordered that execution be limited to the separate property of the defendant, Mrs. Midwinter, not subject to any restraint against anticipation unless by virtue of section 19 of the Married Women's Property Act such property shall be liable to execution notwithstanding such restraint." The other was a judgment against her, dated the 12th of August, 1890, when a certain action, instituted by her also in her own name and without any next friend, was dismissed with costs in the same way. So that we have here, on the 16th of July, 1890, and the 12th of August, 1890, two orders, or one order and one judgment (there is no necessity to distinguish between them) against her, made in proceedings instituted by her under the Married Women's Property Act, and ordering her to pay the costs.

Now, at the times those orders were made the trustees had in their hands certain arrears of the income which was settled upon her for her separate use, and which arrears are more than sufficient to pay the costs which she has been ordered to pay.

Under those circumstances Kekewich, J., made the order which is appealed from, giving the trustees liberty to retain out of the sum of £304 2s. 8d. (being the amount received by the trustees in respect of the rents and profits accrued due to the 16th of July, 1890, of certain property held on trust for her), certain sums of costs which I need not specify.

Now Mrs. Midwinter has appealed from that order, and she says it is wrong, inasmuch as it affects property as to which she is restrained from anticipation. Mr. Mulligan, on her behalf, puts it in this way—that the time to which we ought to direct our attention is a time anterior to those orders —I suppose the time when the legal proceedings were instituted—and that at that time it does not appear there were arrears that could be attached. He relies in support of that argument on a case of In re Glanvill, and upon the 19th section of the Married Women's Property Act.

Since this case was argued yesterday I have looked at In re Glanvill a little more closely. It appears to me that that case, and the reasoning on which it is based, does not apply to the present case at all. In the first place, in the case of In re Glanvill the action was not under the Act at all. There were no proceedings taken by the lady under the Act. In the second place, there was no order for payment by the married woman herself in that case, and that distinguishes the order appealed from in that case from the order which is now under appeal. In that case, in the third place, the order which was made by Bacon, V.C., which was appealed against, was evidently wrong, because it entitled the trustees to retain out of future accruing separate estate. To that extent it was obviously wrong. But there was this point raised. There was a small sum of £36 which was said to be arrears, and which it was said might be impounded or retained by the trustees. When you come to look at the judgments, you find that that £36, small sum as it was, accrued after the order on further consideration which did not order her to pay the costs, but ordered her next friend to pay the costs, and the court there came to the conclusion that even that sum could not be attached; and there is language in that judgment that goes the length of showing, or containing an intimation of opinion, that the only arrears that could be attached would be arrears that had accrued at the time of the institution of the suit. The main controversy was obviously not as to that £36. That was merely a small item in the matter; but the main controversy was as to the propriety of the Vice-Chancellor's order entitling the trustees to retain the costs that had been incurred (and which the married woman ought to pay) out of her separate property which was acquired afterwards. There the Vice-Chancellor was wrong. When you look at the case of Hyde v. Hyde, the Court of Appeal there, in dealing with a sequestration, did allow the sequestrator to attach and take in execution the arrears of a married woman's separate estate which were due at the time the sequestration issued, and they made no reference there as to any earlier time.

Now, quite apart from that, it appears to me that what we have to deal with is, not the case of In re Glanvill, but the Act of Parliament—the Married Women's Property Act. I confess I am not at all disposed to extend the decision in In re Glanvill to a case which arises under the Married Women's Property Act, for the reason which I will now give. In the first place, the court itself in In re Glanvill declined to say what would be right in a case arising under the Married Women's Property Act. Fry, L.J., dealt pointedly with that. He says, "The action was begun in 1882, before the passing of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882. How the case would have stood if the plaintiff had been suing without a next friend under the provisions of that Act I give no opinion. The question is one of some difficulty, and is not now before us." That is precisely the question which we have to deal with. The Married Women's Property Act enables a married women to sue without a next friend—that is, section 1; and what is far more important to my mind is this, that that Act departs from the principle upon which Pike v. Fitzgibbon was decided, and which was taken as the foundation of the decision in In re Glanvill. It alters the whole law, as I understand it, as laid down in Pike v. Fitzgibbon. Therefore, if we look at the Act, we find ourselves face to face with this difficulty:—Supposing a married woman avails herself of the provisions of the Act of Parliament by instituting proceedings at law or in equity without a next friend, and is ordered to pay costs, and supposing at the time of the institution of those proceedings she has no separate estate, but afterwards acquires separate estate, are those costs to remain unpaid if that separate estate is free from anticipation? It appears to me that they ought not, that is to say, if you can find at any time arrears that can be attached, you may attach those arrears of the separate estate, although of course you cannot attach the future income which she is restrained from anticipating. In giving that effect to the Act, it appears to me we are giving full effect to section 19, to which Mr. Mulligan referred. We are not in the least infringing the clause against anticipation. We are doing nothing more than taking arrears which she can anticipate and can deal with. That appears to me to be the true result of the Act of Parliament, and of the case of In re Glanvill so far as it has any bearing on cases arising under the Act. I say nothing about the decision in In re Glanvill; I daresay it was right, but it is clearly distinguishable from the case we have to deal with. It was not a case depending upon the Act, and I certainly am not prepared to introduce what would be a startling state of things if we applied In re Glanvill to proceedings taken under the present Act.

I think, therefore, the appeal must be dismissed.

KAY, L.J.—The difficulty in this case arises, undoubtedly, from the language used by the judges of the Court of Appeal in the case of In re Glanvill. Lindley, L.J., has stated the facts of this case, and I will not repeat any of them. In In re Glanvill an action had been dismissed, with costs. It was an action by a married woman by her next friend, and the question was, which part of her separate estate could be attached for the payment of those costs, and most certainly all the Lords Justices concurred in saying that no part of her separate estate, except that which was free from anticipation at the date when the action was begun—not when the order for costs was made—could be attached to satisfy those costs. The case was peculiar in this respect. The action, as I have said, was by a married woman by her next friend, and, therefore, commenced before the Married Women's Property Act, which has made the use of a next friend unnecessary. The order for costs was made, of course, against the next friend, but it in terms gave liberty to apply against the married woman if the next friend did not satisfy the costs; and it was under that liberty to apply that an application was made to have those costs paid. Now between the time of the institution of the action and the time of making the order dismissing it, with costs, or, at any rate, before the application was made under the liberty to apply, there had accrued some £36 of the income of the married woman as to which she was restrained from anticipation; but it had become due to her, and therefore that sum at the time of the application to the court constituted arrears of her income, and, of course, the fetter against anticipation was gone as soon as the income was payable to her. Therefore, if the date of the application to make her liable was the date to be looked at, those arrears, at any rate, would have been arrears that could have been attached. But the Lords Justices distinctly said No, we must not look at that date, but we must look at the date when the action which was dismissed with costs was begun, and as this sum had not then accrued, and did not constitute arrears so as to be free from the fetter against anticipation, the court has no power to make an order that the costs shall be paid out of the £36.

That raises the difficulty in this case, and we took a little time to consider it further. Lindley, L.J., has pointed out that this case differs in that particular—that the action and summons, both of which had been dismissed with costs (or at least the action was dismissed with costs, and the lady was ordered to pay the costs of the summons), were proceedings taken by her after the Married Women's Property Act had come into operation, and therefore without a next friend. [His lordship then read section 1, sub-section (2), of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, and proceeded:—] The question here is whether income which had accrued after the date of the action, but before the order for payment of costs, could be made liable? Of course, at the time when the order for payment of costs was made, these were arrears of income. There has been some question whether they could be properly called arrears of income, because it seems that under the will which gave her this income for her separate use, without power of anticipation, no days of payment were fixed, but the court, by an order of the 22nd of April, 1882, for convenience in the administration of the estate, directed that a certain sum should be paid out quarterly, and then that the residue of the income, if it exceeded that amount, was to be paid to her when the trustees passed their accounts at the end of the year, the object obviously being, for the convenience of administration, to let the trustees have a certain sum in their hands to pay for repairs and other outgoings which they had to pay. I have no doubt, notwithstanding this order of the court, that these were arrears of income due to the wife, though under the order they would not be payable; and that you cannot read that order into the will, so as to treat the days of payment in the order as though they had been days of payment fixed by the will, because it was merely for the purpose of convenience of administration that that order was made.

Therefore, upon that point I am clear that, at the time when this order for payment of costs was made, these moneys were arrears of income due to the married woman, as to which, of course, the restraint on anticipation had gone; that is to say, to put the proper test, at the moment when these orders were made she could have charged the money then coming to her which had accrued due, and was in the hands of the trustees—she could have charged that for valuable consideration, and made an effectual assignment of it, notwithstanding the restraint on anticipation. If she could have done that, surely the essential justice of this case is, that the order for the payment of costs should be an order which could be executed against that fund. The costs are not incurred at the moment of bringing the action: the costs are not incurred until after the action is brought, that is to say, in the progress of the action. These were costs of her own trustees; they were incurred during the action, which the court ultimately decided was improperly brought, and ought to be dismissed with costs. It seems to me it is only just and right, if you can arrive at it in any way, to say that those costs shall be paid, not merely out of separate estate to which she was entitled at the time of bringing the action, but out of any separate property she was entitled to when the order was made. To try the question it is only necessary to suppose she had, at the time of bringing the action, no separate property except that which she was restrained from anticipating, and that when the order for payment of these costs was made, there were no arrears of that particular property at all, but that in the meantime she had become entitled to a large sum under some other will or settlement for her separate use, as to which she was not restrained from anticipation. Would it be just and equitable to let her go free, and to let her take away that property, as to which there was no restraint on anticipation, and to say to the trustees, "You shall not have those costs"? Clearly not. It seems to me that the order which was in fact, and in terms, that she should pay out of her separate property, excepting only that as to which she was restrained from anticipation, would apply to any separate property which was hers at the date when that order was made. I arrive at that conclusion from a consideration of what seems to me the natural justice of the case, and also on principle. The only question is whether the case of In re Glanvill prevents our holding that. For the reasons which have been given by Lindley, L.J., in which I concur, I do not think that it does. That was a case, as he has pointed out, which did not come under the Married Women's Property Act at all, because the action had been commenced before the coming into operation of the Married Women's Property Act. All the judges carefully reserved any opinion as to what the decision in that case would have been if the action had been brought under that Act.

I think, therefore, with Lindley, L.J., that that case ought not to be extended to a case in which the facts are such as they are here, that is to say, where an order has been actually made for payment by the married woman, only limited to prevent that payment being recovered against the estate as to which she was restrained from anticipation—and it seems to me that that order ought to be treated as applying to all separate estate which belonged to her at the date of the order, and as to which she was not restrained from anticipation. I take the date of the order, rather than the date of the commencement of the proceedings, as the proper date to be looked at in this case. For these reasons I agree with the Lord Justice that this appeal must be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

In re HESELTINE.
WOODWARD v. HESELTINE. (a.)

Bill of sale—Statutory form—Address of attesting witness—Name and description of grantee—Bills of Sale Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 43), ss. 8, 9—Form in schedule.

The execution of a bill of sale was attested by "C.. clerk to the D. Bank, D.-street, Charing-cross." The affidavit made by the attesting witness, and filed with the bill of sale, gave the private residence of the witness as his address.

Held, by the Court of Appeal (differing on this point from North, J.), that the address of the attesting witness as given in the bill of sale was sufficiently in accordance with the statutory form.

A bill of sale was expressed to be granted to "the D. Bank, of 6, D.-street, Charing-cross (of which said bank S., of the same place, is the sole proprietor)." The chattels comprised in the bill of sale were thereby assigned to "the said bank and its assigns," and the bill of sale contained no further mention of S.

Held, that no irresistible inference could be drawn from the bill of sale itself that the "D. Bank" was in fact S., and accordingly that the bill of sale was void, on the ground that the name and description therein contained of the grantee was not in accordance with the statutory form.

Bird v. Davey, ante, p. 40, [1891] 1 Q. B. 29, distinguished.

Appeal from North, J.

The plaintiff was an unsecured creditor of the estate of W. Heseltine, deceased, and the action was for administration of the estate, for a declaration that a bill of sale executed by the deceased in favour of the defendant Simmons was void, and for an injunction to restrain Simmons from removing or selling the goods comprised in the bill of sale.

The widow of the deceased was also made a defendant.

The bill of sale, which was dated the 12th of June, 1890, was expressed to be made between Heseltine of the one part, "and the Discount Bank of London, of 6, Duncannon-street, Charing Cross, in the County of Middlesex (of which said bank Lewis Simmons, of the same place, is the sole proprietor) of the other part"; and "in consideration of the sum of £500 now paid to the said W. Heseltine by the said bank," Heseltine thereby assigned "unto the said bank and its assigns" the chattels specifically described in the schedule thereto annexed "by way of security for the payment of the sum of £500 and interest thereon at the rate of ninepence in the pound per month. And the said W. Heseltine doth further agree and declare that he will duly pay to the said bank the principal sum aforesaid, together with the interest then due, by monthly payments of £30 on the 18th day of every month, the first payment to be made on the 18th day of July next, provided always that the chattels hereby assigned shall not be liable to seizure or to be taken possession of by the said bank for any cause other than those specified in section 7 of the Bills of Sale Act (1878) Amendment Act, 1882."

The attestation, on the face of the bill of sale itself, of the execution thereof by the grantor was as follows: "Signed and sealed by the said W. Heseltine in the presence of me, William George Cleverly, clerk to the Discount Bank of London, 6, Duncannon-street, Charing Cross."

In the affidavit made by the attesting witness filed with the bill of sale he described himself as "William George Cleverly, residing at 12X, Peabody-avenue, Pimlico, clerk to the Discount Bank of London, 6, Duncannon-street, Charing Cross."

The grantor, W. Heseltine, died on the 2nd of December, 1890, and on the 3rd of December the defendant Simmons took possession of the chattels which were the subject-matter of the bill of sale.

North, J., granted an interlocutory injunction to restrain the defendant Simmons from selling, disposing of, or removing the chattels until the trial of the action, on the ground that the bill of sale was not in accordance with the statutory form, because the attestation of the execution of the bill of sale did not give the address of the attesting witness.

Simmons appealed.

Bosanquet, Q.C., and J. H. Poulter, for the appellant.—The statutory form has been complied with by giving the business address of the attesting witness, and it is not necessary to give also the place where he sleeps as his address; it is sufficient if either be given: Blackwell v. England, 6 W. R. 59, 8 E. & B. 541; Attenborough v. Thompson, 6 W. R. 135, 2 H. & N. 559; Hewer v. Cox, 9 W. R. 143, 3 E. & E. 448; Ex parte Breull, 29 W. R. 299, 16 Ch. D. 484. [LOPES, L.J., referred to Haslope v. Thorne, 1 Mau. & Sel. 103, and Alexander v. Milton, 2 Cr. & J. 424.] Stoy v. Rees, 38 W. R. 683, 24 Q. B. D. 748, which was relied on by North, J., was a case as to indorsement of a plaintiff's address on a writ of summons, and turned on the words "who resides at" used in Appendix A., Part 1, Form 4, of the Rules of the Supreme Court, and is, therefore, not applicable.

Napier Higgins, Q.C., and Ingpen, for the plaintiff.—The bill of sale is void for non-compliance with the statutory form in several particulars; first, the address of the attesting witness is not properly stated in the attestation clause, and the defect is not cured by its being stated in the affidavit filed with the bill of sale: Parsons v. Brand, Coulson v. Dickson, 38 W. R. 388, 25 Q. B. D. 110; Stoy v. Rees. The cases of Blackwell v. England and Attenborough v. Thompson were decided on the Bills of Sale Act, 1854, which did not contain the same stringent provisions as to registration as the Acts of 1878 and 1882. [LOPES, L.J., referred to Hickley v. Greenwood, 38 W. R. 686.] The Acts of 1878 and 1882 do not contemplate that the attesting witness could have two addresses, either of which it was sufficient to state; the place of residence and not the place of business should, therefore, have been given. Secondly, the bill of sale is void because the name of the grantee is not properly given in the bill of sale. It was Simmons who advanced the money, but the grantee named in the bill of sale is the "Discount Bank of London," and the bill of sale is so registered: Bills of Sale Act, 1878, s. 11 (2) and s. 12. The statutory form does not contemplate an incorporated company being the grantee of a bill of sale. It is doubtful whether in Acts prior to the Interpretation Act, 1889 (52 & 53 Vict. c. 63), the word "person" includes a body of persons corporate or unincorporate: see section 19 of the Interpretation Act, 1889. [They were stopped.]

Bosanquet, Q.C., in reply.—Simmons carries on a banking business under the name or style of the "Discount Bank of London." There is nothing in the Bills of Sale Acts to prevent either a corporate body or a trading firm lending money on the security of a bill of sale, and doing so in their trade name. This bill of sale states on the face of it that Simmons is the sole proprietor of the "Discount Bank of London," so that nothing is concealed, and there is no variance from the statutory form calculated reasonably to deceive: Ex parte Stanford, 34 W. R. 507, 17 Q. B. D. 259; Thomas v. Kelly, 37 W. R. 353, 13 App. Cas. 506. [LOPES, L.J., referred to Bird v. Davey, ante, p. 40, [1891] 1 Q. B. 29.] A firm or corporation can now sue or be sued in the firm or corporate name: R. S. C., ord. 16, rr. 14, 15.

Napier Higgins, Q.C. [having been previously stopped, was now again called on].—The Discount Bank being composed of one person only—viz., Simmons—no proceedings could be instituted in the name of the Discount Bank. The Rules of the Supreme Court do not apply to such a case. The Discount Bank might be a company in which Simmons had all the shares, and evidence extraneous to the bill of sale itself is required to show whether or not the Discount Bank is a corporate body, and therefore Bird v. Davey is distinguishable. The words "sole proprietor" are not equivalent to "trading in the name of." The grantor should be clearly informed by the bill of sale as to his legal position; if Simmons died, the grantor would not know to whom to apply for the purpose of redeeming the bill of sale, because by the operative part the chattels are assigned to the bank "and its assigns."

He referred to Ex parte Blain, 28 W. R. 334, 12 Ch. D. 522, at p. 533; Ex parte Corbett, 28 W. R. 569, 14 Ch. D. 122; and Pharmaceutical Society v. London and Provincial Supply Association, 28 W. R. 957, 5 App. Cas. 857.

Bosanquet, Q.C., in further reply, referred to Downs v. Salmon, 36 W. R. 810, 20 Q. B. D. 775.

D. L. Alexander, for the administratrix.

LINDLEY, L.J.—This is an appeal by Simmons, the holder of a bill of sale, from an order of North, J., granting an interim injunction to restrain him from selling or removing the goods therein comprised. The case was decided against him on the ground that the bill of sale was void because the proper address of the attesting witness did not appear upon it.

Other objections were also taken which were not discussed in the court below.

In the attestation clause the attesting witness is described as "W. G. Cleverly, clerk to the Discount Bank of London, 6, Duncannon-street, Charing Cross." In the affidavit filed with the bill of sale he describes himself as "of 12X, Peabody-avenue, Pimlico." The plaintiff contends that in the attestation clause the witness ought to have given his place of residence, but that argument does not seem to me to be sound. The address given in the attestation clause was the place where he was employed all day, a letter addressed there would have reached him, and a person wishing to see him might have found him more readily by going there than by going to the place where he slept. I think that the bill of sale cannot be held void on this ground.

Another objection was taken—that the bill of sale was void as not being in accordance with the form given by the statute. We all know the difficulty of construing section 9 of the Act. In construing it we must have recourse to the authority of the recent case of Thomas v. Kelly. Lord Macnaghten there says, 13 App. Cas. 506, p. 519:—"This section seems to me to deal with form and form only. So purely is it I think a question of form that I should be inclined to doubt whether a bill of sale would not be void which omitted the proviso referring to section 7, though I cannot see that the omission would alter the legal effect of the document or mislead anybody. It has been held, and I think rightly, that section 9 does not require a bill of sale to be a verbal and literal transcript of the statutory form. The words of the Act are, 'in accordance with the form,' not, 'in the form.' But then comes the question, When is an instrument which purports to be a bill of sale not in accordance with the statutory form? Possibly when it departs from the statutory form in anything which is not merely a matter of verbal difference. Certainly I should say when it departs from the statutory form in anything which is a characteristic of that form." Now one of the characteristics of the form is that the name of the grantee should be given, and it is important that there should be no ambiguity about the name. Here a bill of sale is given to a gentleman who lends money upon it. The grantee is described as "The Discount Bank of England, of 6, Duncannon-street, Charing Cross, of which said bank Lewis Simmons, of the same place, is the sole proprietor." A marked distinction is here drawn between the Discount Bank and Simmons himself, he is stated to be the proprietor of the thing called the Discount Bank of London.

We are asked to construe this bill of sale as made between Heseltine of the one part, and "Lewis Simmons, trading under the style or firm of the Discount Bank of London," of the other part. That is not what the bill of sale says, and the distinction between himself and the bank runs through the document. The chattels are expressed to be assigned "to the said bank," and Heseltine agrees that he will pay the money "to the said bank." Can we from what appears on the face of the bill of sale, without any extrinsic evidence, draw the irresistible inference that Simmons is the bank? I think we cannot, and I am therefore of opinion that the bill of sale departs from the statutory form in an essential point, and is void under the Act.

LOPES, L.J.—I entirely agree. As to the attesting witness I think that the court below came to an erroneous conclusion, and that the address was sufficient. The object of requiring the address to be given is to give such information as would enable a person to find the witness. A letter addressed to 6, Duncannon-street would find him, and a person wishing to see him would more readily find him there than at the place where he slept.

The other point, that the bill of sale is not in accordance with the statutory form, is of more importance. It is urged that it is not in accordance with the scheduled form because the description of the grantee is not clear. If the grantee is described in a way likely to mislead, I think that the bill of sale is not in accordance with the form and is void. In Ex parte Stanford, 17 Q. B. D., p. 270, it is said: "A bill of sale is surely in accordance with the prescribed form if it is substantially in accordance with it, if it does not depart from the prescribed form in any material respect. But a divergence only becomes substantial or material when it is calculated to give the bill of sale a legal consequence or effect either greater or smaller than that which would attach to it if drawn in the form which has been sanctioned, or if it departs from the form in a manner calculated to mislead those whom it is the object of the statute to protect."

I think that the present bill of sale does depart from the form in a manner calculated to mislead those whom it is the object of the statute to protect. The description of the grantee is such as to raise an ambiguity, and I think an intentional ambiguity. It appears to me that on the face of the instrument there is nothing from which an irresistible inference is to be drawn that Simmons is the bank or that the bank is not a corporation. I think, therefore, that the order appealed from is right. The case is distinguishable from Bird v. Davey on the ground that in that case there was, in the opinion of the court, an irresistible inference from what appeared on the bill of sale itself that the same person attested the execution by both grantors, and, if so, the statute was satisfied by his address being once given.

KAY, L.J.—There are two points settled by decision. First, that the words "in accordance with the form" have not the same effect as "in the form." This was laid down by the House of Lords in Thomas v. Kelly. It is difficult to define the degree of latitude which the Act allows, but all the lords agreed that some departure from the words of the form was allowable. Secondly, it was decided in Bird v. Davey that an imperfection on the face of a bill of sale which was corrected by other information supplied by the document itself, did not invalidate the bill of sale. Here the description of the grantee is, "The Discount Bank of London, of which bank L. Simmons is the sole proprietor." "The Discount Bank of London" might be the name of a corporation, and is there any irresistible inference from what appears on the bill of sale, that it was not? Unless there is such inference, Bird v. Davey does not apply, and the bill of sale is bad. If the description had been "The Discount Bank of London, which is not a corporation, but a firm in which L. Simmons is the sole proprietor," I do not say how the case would have stood. That is not the language used, but a description is given which might denote a joint-stock company in which Simmons held all the shares, and to say that there is any irresistible inference that "The Discount Bank of London" was the trade name of Simmons is going too far. I think, therefore, that there is a substantial departure from the statutory form, and that the bill of sale is invalid.

Appeal dismissed.

REG. v. JACKSON. (a.)

Habeas corpus—Husband and wife—Right of husband to capture and confine a wife refusing him conjugal rights—Matrimonial Causes Act, 1884 (47 & 48 Vict. c. 68).

A husband has no right to the custody of his wife's person.

(a.) Reported by A. P. PERCEVAL KEEP, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Where a wife had refused to obey a decree for the restitution of conjugal rights obtained by her husband,

Held, that he had no right to seize her by force and confine her in order to compel her to render him conjugal rights.

Return to a writ of habeas corpus.

On March 16 application for a writ of habeas corpus was made to a divisional court (Cave and Jeune, JJ.) on behalf of Emily Emma Maude Jackson, who, as was alleged, was detained in the custody of her husband, Edmund Haughton Jackson.

The application was refused, and on March 17 it was renewed before the Court of Appeal, who directed the writ to issue subject to their jurisdiction to entertain the appeal.

The return to the writ was now made, and the question came on for argument.

The return was in the following terms:—

"I, Edmund Haughton Jackson, in obedience to the writ, herewith do certify and return as follows:—

"1. The said Emily Emma Maude Jackson is my wife.

"2. During my absence in New Zealand in the year 1888, my said wife went to reside with her sisters and brother-in-law. It was arranged that she should shortly join me in New Zealand, but she wrote to me pressing me to return to England, and I did so, but on my return to England in July, 1888, she refused to live with me, and I was denied access to her.

"3. I commenced proceedings in the Divorce Division of the High Court of Justice against my said wife for restitution of conjugal rights, and on the 30th day of July, 1889, a decree was made for such restitution.

"4. Since the making of such decree, I have endeavoured to persuade my said wife by letters (personal access being still denied to me) to come and live with me, but, acting under the advice and counsel of her said sisters and brother-in-law, she has in no way responded to my overtures.

"5. I therefore, on the 8th day of March instant, took my said wife, and have since detained her in my house, using no more force or constraint than was necessary to take her or to prevent her returning to her said relations. She has had perfect liberty in and the full run of the house short of leaving it.

"6. Such restraint, I submit that I could lawfully use in order to have an opportunity of regaining the affection of my wife, which had become alienated from me, and which it was impossible I could do when she was under the influence of her said relations."

It appeared from Mr. Jackson's affidavit that he and his wife were married on November 5, 1887, after an engagement which had been broken, but had been renewed at Mrs. Jackson's instance.

The marriage was opposed by Mrs. Jackson's relatives, and it was agreed that Mr. Jackson should go out to New Zealand, and that Mrs. Jackson should join him there in six months' time.

Accordingly, on November 7, he started for New Zealand with his wife's consent. Mrs. Jackson continued to reside with her relatives, but on Mr. Jackson's arrival in New Zealand he received letters from her urging him to return, which he accordingly did. On his arrival in England he was refused access to her and she declined to live with him.

On July 30, 1889, he obtained a decree for the restitution of conjugal rights, with which, however, she declined to comply, and accordingly, on Sunday, March 8, with the assistance of two friends, Mr. Dixon Robinson and Dr. W. H. Robinson, he seized Mrs. Jackson as she was coming out of church w[illegible] her sister, and forced her into a carriage which he had in attendance, and drove her to his house at Blackburn, where she had since been confined.

"After the carriage started my wife offered no further resistance, though she continuously protested against having been taken, and desired to be released, saying that I could not force her to live with me. On arriving at the house she walked quietly in without any use of force whatever. My friend Dixon Robinson drove with us to Blackburn inside the carriage, and later in the day we were joined by Dr. Robinson, who was my other coadjutor in the seizure of my wife. Immediately on my arrival home I placed my wife in the charge of my sister, who now resides with me, with instructions to give her every attention, and I also engaged the services of a qualified nurse." "Until about 7 o'clock on Sunday evening my wife refused all refreshment of any description, but ultimately consented to take some light refreshment, insisting, however, in regard to everything she took that my friend Dr. Robinson should share it with her, as she feared it might be drugged. After the nurse came, however, she appeared to regain confidence, and since the Monday after her capture she has freely partaken of any food set before her." "During the whole period since the seizure of my wife she has been treated by myself and everyone in the house with every kindness and consideration, and I cannot remember to have said or done a cruel, unkind, or ungentlemanly word or act to her during the whole time." "Since Wednesday last my wife has had the free run of the house, doing just as she pleased (save leaving the house, had she so desired), but declining to come downstairs until evening. I have, moreover, several times offered to take her a drive with me, but she has declined. On one occasion only were the blinds of her room upstairs pulled down to prevent her exchanging signals with her relatives outside, and they were drawn up a few moments afterwards, and no restraint or interference was subsequently placed upon her so seeing or communicating with her relatives."

Mrs. Baldwin, the sister of Mrs. Jackson, filed an affidavit describing the capture. She said, "Mr. Jackson had his face almost covered with a black wrap, which went over his nose. He rushed at my sister and seized her by the arm, and said, 'You are my wife; come with me into this carriage.' She said, 'I will not,' and then said to me, 'Hold me fast and prevent him taking me.' I caught hold of her waist. He was accompanied by two young men named Robinson, one a surgeon, the other a solicitor's articled clerk. A struggle ensued, they endeavouring to force her into the carriage, and she resisting with all her might, and I assisting her to the utmost of my power. Eventually she was dragged backwards into the bottom of the carriage by her husband, I clinging to her all the time. He then bent back with great violence two of the fingers of my right hand, and so loosened my grip round her waist. When my hands were being thus loosened, Dixon Robinson (the articled clerk) pushed me violently on the right shoulder, and I fell back from the carriage. My sister's legs were sticking out of the carriage door when she was on the bottom of the carriage, and Dixon Robinson, after pushing me away, got hold of her legs and shoved them into the carriage and jumped in, and they immediately drove away with her. The struggle took place in the full view of the congregation coming out of the church. She resisted going with him to the utmost of her power and struggled violently against him, and was only taken away by main force."

Dixon Robinson, in his affidavit, said :—"I helped Mr. Jackson to separate them (Mrs. Baldwin and her sister), and he helped his wife into the carriage. I stood between Mrs. Baldwin and Mr. Jackson while he did so. After he had so lifted his wife into the carriage her feet were still outside, and I put them inside. No more force was used than was absolutely necessary." He further said that he did not see Mrs. Jackson again (after the day of capture) until the Tuesday, but he remained in the house until the 14th inst., and during the whole time he had never seen the slightest approach to cruelty, but Mr. Jackson always treated her with the greatest kindness and consideration. Dr. Robinson, who was also in the house until the 14th, made a similar affidavit, and said that during the time he was in the house he repeatedly saw Mrs. Jackson, and she was always treated kindly, and except on the Sunday, when he removed her from the room, he never saw anything on Mr. Jackson's part which had even the appearance of force. Dr. Martin also made an affidavit as to the lady having been attended by him. When he first saw her, he said, on the Sunday evening he found her suffering from excitement and exhaustion, having had no food since her breakfast. "The only complaint she made," he said, "was that her husband when he got in had rudely taken her bonnet off and thrown it into the fire." He found also, he said, an extensive bruise on her arm, which she said was done while they were struggling to get her into the carriage. He had attended the lady since, he said, and though she had suffered from fits of depression, she had kept up very well, and so far, he thought, her health had not suffered. He had observed, he said, no symptoms of harsh treatment, and she seemed to have been treated with every consideration. The nurse also made a similar affidavit.

No affidavits were filed by Mrs. Jackson, and it was admitted that she had had no opportunity of doing so, her solicitor having been denied access to her.

Henn Collins, Q.C., Malcolm Douglas, and T. Terrell, for Mr. Jackson.—This court has no jurisdiction to issue the writ. [Lord HALSBURY, L.C.—You are perfectly at liberty to argue that question, but it seems to me that it is a purely academic one, as I have myself undoubtedly original jurisdiction to grant it, and the result would be that if you should succeed in convincing the court that they had no jurisdiction to entertain the appeal, I should on my own account issue the writ; and as the parties are in court I should direct the return to be made instanter.] The decision in Bell Cox v. Hakes in the Court of Appeal (36 W. R. 209, 20 Q. B. D. 1), which has not been expressly overruled on this point in the House of Lords (ante, p. 145, 15 App. Cas. 506), was undoubtedly to the effect that this court had jurisdiction in such a case. It would, therefore, be hopeless to argue the question here further. As to the return to the writ, it is valid and sufficient. A husband has a right to the society and consortium of his wife. He may at common law take possession of his wife's person, using no more violence than is necessary, and may confine her to prevent her from absenting herself permanently from his society. He must not imprison her punitively, but he may confine her by way of restraint. He has a right to the custody of his wife's person. The law on the subject has been laid down in Ex parte Cochrane, 8 Dowl. Prac. Cases, 630, which was not overruled by R. v. Leggatt, 18 Q. B. 781. In Manby v. Scott, 1 Siderfin. 109, 2 Smith's L. C., 9th ed., 466, it is said that a wife is subject to her husband, but he cannot put her to death, or starve, or beat her. [Lord ESHER, M.R. —The right to beat and the right to confine a wife appear from the judgment in Ex parte Cochrane to stand or fall together.] That is not so. The right to beat seems to be taken from Bacon's Abridgement, Baron and Feme, 693. "The husband hath, by law, power and dominion over his wife, and may keep her by force within the bounds of duty, and may beat her, but not in a violent or cruel manner." For this Fitzherbert Natura Brevium 80 is cited. The passage goes on, "He has, by law, a right to the custody of her, and may, if he think fit, confine her, but he must not imprison her." This right was recognized in R. v. Lister, 1 Str. 477. Where a wife is in the custody of a third person a husband may have a habeas corpus in order to regain possession of her: R. v. Mary Meade, 1 Burr. 542. The right to beat a wife is entirely separate, and it is not contended that it now exists. It depends on the passage in Fitzherbert which speaks of castigatio, a phrase which was explained in Lord Leigh's case, 3 Keeble, 433, by Lord Hale to mean admonition, not personal chastisement: Atwood v. Atwood, Prec. in Ch. 492. In Sir T. Seymore's case, Godb. 215, a wife was said to be sub virgâ viri. R. v. Leggatt, according to the report in the Law Times, 19 L. T. 201, does not dispute the husband's right to the custody of his wife, and no mention of Ex parte Cochrane was made in the judgment.

Finlay, Q.C., and Forbes Lankester, for Mrs. Jackson.—There is not any such right as is asserted on the part of the husband. Ex parte Cochrane is entirely inconsistent with R. v. Leggatt, and is, therefore, overruled by it. The logical outcome of Ex parte Cochrane is that the husband's right to the custody of his wife should be enforceable by process of law, and this proposition is expressly negatived by R. v. Leggatt. R. v. Lister is a decision that only under certain circumstances, which do not exist here, is a husband justified in restraining his wife. [They cited R. v. Middleton, 1 Chit. 654; Lord Leigh's case; Vane's case, 13 East, 171n.] The result of the husband's contention would be that he might place his wife in perpetual confinement. The right to beat and the right to confine are inseparable, and if either ever existed they are both now gone. The Matrimonial Causes Act, 1884, deprives the court of the power to enforce a decree for the restitution of conjugal rights by imprisonment, and it is impossible to suppose that the husband, who is the interested party, should still have a right to do so. No authority has been cited in support of the alleged right to seize a wife by force, and it is submitted that serious breaches of the peace, and even riots, might occur if such a right were to be established. There can be no distinction between confinement and imprisonment. Every person who is restrained of his liberty is imprisoned.

Henn Collins, Q.C., in reply cited 1 Hale 628.

Lord HALSBURY, L.C.—We will see the lady herself in order to satisfy ourselves that she is a free agent in the course she has taken.

Their lordships accordingly had an interview with Mrs. Jackson in their private room.

Lord HALSBURY, L.C.—The court has satisfied itself, by hearing what Mrs. Jackson had to say, that in refusing to go to her husband's house, and in resistance to her continuance therein, she was acting entirely of her own will, and has not been forced—nor indeed, as far as present circumstances are concerned—induced by anyone else to refuse to continue in her husband's house, and that she was not compelled to remain where she was before he removed her. I confess that some of the propositions which have been laid down in the course of the arguments in the case are such as one is reluctant to suppose could ever have been the law of England. Whatever absurd and obsolete dicta may be found in old law books as to the right of the husband over his wife in respect of personal chastisement or confinement, I should have thought they would hardly be cited in a court of justice, in this or any civilized country, as authorities. It is important to bear this in mind, because a good many statements, far more moderate in character and involving less outrage to the common feelings of humanity, are bound up with these supposed dicta as to the right of the husband over his wife. The only justification which can be found for such dicta is in the free translation given to them by Lord Hale, who suggests that the term "castigatio" may be taken to mean not corporal violence, but admonition, and I am glad that somebody, even in that age, endeavoured to get rid of the law apparently involved in some of these dicta. I mention this because it appears to me that the authorities for the right now claimed are every one of them grounded on the same notion of the absolute dominion of the husband over his wife which lies at the foundation of the arguments here for the right to detain this lady. The question of law has never been raised in an abstract form unaccompanied by circumstances by which a qualification might be introduced into the abstract proposition laid down. I believe the first and only case in which it has ever been decided for the husband as to his right to the custody of his wife was that of Ex parte Cochrane. But no authority has been cited which establishes the proposition that the mere relation of husband and wife gives to the husband a complete dominion over the wife's person, when unaccompanied by any circumstances of misconduct, or any proximate approach to misconduct, on her part, which would entitle her husband to restrain her. I do not mean to lay it down as a proposition of law that there may not be some acts of misconduct by the wife, or a proximate approach to acts of misconduct, which might not give the husband a right to use some physical restraint. For instance, if she was about to elope with anyone; in such a case the exercise of the husband's authority to restrain her might be justified, on the same principle as he—or, indeed, any person—might restrain her if out of her mind and likely to do herself a mischief. Such exercise of authority, so understood and limited, may be justified as reasonable and in accordance with law.

But what we have on the return to this writ is very different, and it is on that we have to determine. After stating the circumstances of the marriage, the decree, and the refusal of the wife to cohabit, it states: "I therefore took my wife, and have since detained her in my house, using no more force or restraint than necessary to take her and keep her." That is the return which seeks to justify an admitted imprisonment of this lady. I do not know that I am able to express in sufficiently precise language the difference between "confinement" and "imprisonment," but if there is any distinction I can only say that upon these facts I should find an imprisonment here. It is put as a broad proposition that where there has been a wilful absenting of herself by the wife from her husband's house, it is his right to seize possession of his wife by force and detain her in his house until she renders him conjugal rights. That is the proposition of law involved in the return, and I am not prepared to assent to it. The Legislature has expressly deprived the Matrimonial Court of the power of imprisoning the wife for refusal to comply with a decree for restitution of conjugal rights, and the result, if the husband had the power to do so, would be that, whereas the court had no power to hand the wife over into her husband's hands, or to punish her for contempt by imprisonment, the husband might himself of his own motion seize and imprison her until she consented to the restitution of conjugal rights. That is the proposition I am called upon to establish by holding this return to be good. I am of opinion that no such right or power exists in law. I am of opinion that no such right ever did exist in our law.

Whatever authorities may be quoted for any such proposition, it has always been subject to this condition—that where the wife is reasonably apprehensive of ill-usage the court will never interfere to compel her to return to her husband's custody. Now this brings me to the particular circumstances of this transaction. I am prepared to say that no English subject has a right to imprison another English subject (who is sui juris and entitled to a judgment of his or her own) without any lawful authority, but if there were any qualification of that proposition I should be of opinion that the facts of this case would afford an ample justification to any court for refusing to allow this husband to retain the custody of his wife. It seems to have been thought that a lady, who is admitted to be of good position in society, may be dealt with roughly in this kind of way, subject only to a question as to the exact degree of force or violence used or of physical pain inflicted upon her by seizure under the circumstances stated. But is it nothing that a lady, coming out of church on a Sunday, is to be seized by three or four men, in the face of the congregation, and forcibly put into a carriage and carried off? Is not one to consider the element of insult involved in such a seizure. And what happens afterwards? If the lady's statement to the medical man be true (and it is not contradicted), the moment she entered the house her husband tore her bonnet off her head and threw it into the fire.

That is a statement made by the medical man in his affidavit made on behalf of the husband, and there is no denial or explanation of the statement. I confess I receive with indignation the statement of the facts in this case, and the utter absence of any apparent sense of the delicacy or the respect due to the wife, whom the husband had sworn to love and cherish and protect. The statements in the affidavits on the part of the husband I am unwilling to look at, for this reason—that though, if they are to be taken as undisputed, they may make out so far a case in his favour that the lady voluntarily entered into the marriage under circumstances which reflect no discredit upon him, yet I do not know how far I can trust them, as the lady has not been allowed to have any communication with her legal adviser as to any matters on which she might have contradicted these statements, and, therefore, I cannot rely upon them.

The result is that there is no power by law such as the husband professed to exercise, and the facts, to my mind, afford sufficient reason to the lady to apprehend violence in future, considering the circumstances of her seizure. On either of these grounds it would be enough to say that the return of the writ is, in my judgment, bad, and that the lady must be restored to her liberty, and allowed to choose her own place of residence wherever she pleases.

As there has now been an authoritative declaration of the law against the supposed power of the husband, any attempt on his part to exercise it again will be a serious contempt of court.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—In this case it is admitted that this lady is physically confined so that she is deprived of her liberty. The proposition is that a husband has a right to take possession of his wife by force, and to keep her in confinement, not imprisonment, in order to prevent her from leaving him and depriving him of her society. A series of propositions have been cited on behalf of the husband which, if true, make an English wife the abject slave of her husband. According to them she is a chattel with which he may deal as he pleases. The foundation for the whole doctrine appears to be contained in a Latin phrase in a writ in Fitzherbert's Natura Brevium. Whatever may be the right translation of castigatio, I do not believe that any such right ever existed or was recognized by English courts.

I confess that, to my mind, the distinction that has been drawn between confinement and imprisonment is too refined. To my mind it makes no difference whether the wife is confined to one room or has the run of the house, so long as she is deprived of her liberty. It is said that a husband has the custody of his wife, and may restrain her from extravagance, and confine her to the house to prevent her from spending his money at certain shops. I know of no such right, nor do I believe any such right has ever existed. A husband has not the custody of his wife in the sense that a gaoler has the custody of a prisoner, and the wife is not a chattel the property of her husband. But it is said that if she is doing wrong, or is about to do some wrong, he may seize and confine her. What is his authority for doing so? He could not exercise that right in the case of any other woman. The whole proposition is based on the erroneous loose idea which seems to have got abroad that a husband has a right of property in his wife. He has no more rights over her as to her personal liberty and freedom from assault or insult than he has over any other woman in England. I admit that Cochrane's case supports the contention of Mr. Henn Collins, but after reading through that long and complicated case I have come to the conclusion that if it is still law it is absolutely wrong, and must be overruled. Of course, restraint is not imprisonment or confinement, and if a husband perceives that his wife is about to injure his honour, he may stop her in the very act and restrain her, and so too if she should be taking his money or other property out of his house he may take it away from her. That is entirely different from the right insisted on here, which is a right to seize and confine her. It was admitted that the logical outcome of the argument was that the wife might be placed by her husband in perpetual confinement if she refused to yield him conjugal rights. I absolutely abjure any such right on the part of the husband.

But even if there were the right contended for in the present case, we are bound to take notice of the insulting manner in which the husband acted. The seizure of the lady was on a Sunday, as she was coming out of church, in the face of the congregation. She was seized by three men, dragged to a carriage, thrust violently in, her legs hanging out of the carriage, while she was lying at the bottom of it, and thrust in by the young man, the attorney's clerk. That was the way in which the husband had seized his wife, and then these young men were kept in the house with a "nurse." What for? Obviously, to keep a watch over her. The lady was seized and confined under circumstances of the grossest insult; and, in my opinion, her seizure was brutal, as between husband and wife—I say it was brutal. That being so, the law does not entitle this husband to retain his wife in confinement, and he has shown himself a man to whom the court will not give her back.

It is true that he has obtained a decree for the restitution of conjugal rights, but the Act of Parliament has expressly forbidden the enforcement of that decree by means of attachment, and can it be contended that the husband is entitled to enforce it by private violence? To my mind the Act is the strongest evidence to show that the Legislature had no idea that the husband had any such power. In my opinion, therefore, by English law a husband has not, and never had, the right to imprison his wife either by way of prevention or punishment. The return to the writ is consequently bad, and the lady must be discharged.

FRY, L.J.—The return to this writ raises a question of law. Has or has not a husband the right to capture and confine his wife until she consent to render him conjugal rights? On the assertion of that right the husband in this case relies. The proposition divides itself into two heads—the right to capture, and the right to confine. For the former of these no vestige of authority has been cited. In the case of Ex parte Cochrane, on which the husband's counsel placed reliance, the possession of the wife was obtained by strategy, and not by force. That question may therefore be dismissed and consideration confined to the question whether a husband has a right to confine or imprison his wife until she yield him his conjugal rights. The only authority for that contention is the case of Ex parte Cochrane, decided in 1840. No earlier authority for it can be found with the exception of the passage in Bacon's Abridgement, which is so vague that it cannot be considered a satisfactory statement of the law. The case of R. v. Lister is at direct variance with it, as it was there stated that the husband's right to restrain his wife depended on certain grounds, which, it is admitted, do not exist here, and on those grounds only. I cannot, therefore, regard Cochrane's case as a satisfactory authority. It is impossible to overlook the fact that similar cases must frequently have occurred. The recourse to the ecclesiastical courts for an order for the restitution of conjugal rights was habitual, and there is on the books no case of the assertion of such a right of private imprisonment as is here set up. That is, I think, cogent evidence to show that no such right existed. But after Cochrane's case came the case of R. v. Leggatt, which, to say the least, shakes the authority of the former case. In the latter case Lord Campbell laid down, and the other judges appeared to agree, that a husband has no right to the custody of his wife in the sense in which a parent has a right to the custody of his child. Even if that case stood alone, I think it would be sufficient to show that there is no such right as is here contended for; but if the law were ambiguous or doubtful before, it is plainly altered by reason of the Act of 1884, which deprived the court of the power of enforcing by attachment a decree for the restitution of conjugal rights. I cannot believe that after that, any right to enforce such a decree remains to the husband where he is at once an interested party, judge, and executioner. I do not think that there ever was such a right by law, and certainly, if there were, it has now ceased to exist. I wish to confine my judgment to that view of the law, and I prefer neither to animadvert on the old dicta of the judges, nor to comment on the conduct of the husband in this case. It would not, in my opinion, be right to do so without considering the circumstances of the marriage. There may have been causes which excuse the action he took, but, as the Lord Chancellor has said, our only information is derived from affidavits, on which I do not think we ought to rely. I base my judgment entirely on the ground that the right set up does not exist by the law of England. The lady must, therefore, be discharged.

Order accordingly.

LAWRENCE v. EDWARDS. (a.)

Parish clerk—Sequestration—Bankruptcy of incumbent—Appointment by stipendiary curate—Injunction—34 & 35 Vict. c. 45, ss. 1, 5, 6.

The rights belonging to an incumbent by virtue of his benefice are not taken away or interfered with by the issue of a sequestration, except in so far as they are taken away or interfered with by the express terms of the Sequestration Act, 1871.

The office of parish clerk is a temporal office.

Motion.

This was a motion by the plaintiff, the rector of Eversley, Hants, who had been adjudicated a bankrupt, to restrain the defendant from receiving any fees or emoluments belonging to the office of parish clerk.

In consequence of the bankruptcy of the plaintiff (the Rev. Arthur Lawrence), the bishop had issued a writ of sequestration in May, 1889, and in March, 1890, appointed a stipendiary curate. In October, 1890, the parish clerk died, and on the 1st of November the rector appointed his son to be parish clerk, and thereupon the stipendiary curate, on Sunday, November 19, announced to the congregation that he had appointed the defendant to be parish clerk in the place of the deceased clerk.

The 91st canon provides that "no parish clerk, upon any vacation, shall be chosen in the City of London, or elsewhere, but by the parson or vicar, or, where there is no parson or vicar, by the minister of that place for the time being, which choice shall be signified by the said minister, vicar, or parson to the parishioners the next Sunday following, in the time of Divine service."

No inhibition had been issued against the rector, who continued to reside in the parish and occupy the rectory-house.

Willis Bund, for the motion.—The rector not having been inhibited, he has the right to make the appointment. In Pinder v. Barr, 2 W. R. 589, 4 E. & B. 105, the incumbent had been suspended.

He also referred to Pack v. Tarpley, 9 Ad. & E. 468 482, and Tarrant v. Haxby, 1 Burr. 367.

The defendant did not appear upon the motion.

CHITTY, J. (after stating the facts, continued:—).—The injunction I am asked for at the bar is merely to restrain the defendant, until judgment or further order, from receiving the profits and fees of the office. I am not asked to interfere in any way with the defendant performing his duties as parish clerk in the church itself. It is unfortunate that the defendant has not appeared on this motion, and that I have not had the benefit of any argument on his behalf, but Mr. Willis Bund has put the whole case very fairly before the court, and I am bound to come to some conclusion for the purpose of this motion upon such argument as has been presented to me.

Now it has been decided in the case of Pinder v. Barr that, where the vicar was suspended for misconduct by the bishop from performing the duties and receiving the profits of the vicarage, he was not the proper person, and had no authority, to appoint a parish clerk so long as the suspension remained in force. The question there turned upon the construction of the 91st canon, which was considered by the Court of Queen's Bench, which in that case held that "the minister for the time being" was the curate who had been appointed by the bishop to perform the ecclesiastical duties of the parish, and the court also held that the curate was entitled to make the appointment, not by virtue of the bishop's licence, but by virtue of the canon, and that, on the true construction of this canon, inasmuch as the vicar had been suspended from his functions, the term "minister" applied to and included the curate. It follows, therefore, from that case, that if the rector in the present case had been suspended or inhibited, he would have no authority to appoint a parish clerk. But the rector has not been suspended or inhibited, though he has been adjudicated bankrupt and a sequestration has been issued, and I therefore turn to the Sequestration Act, 1871, with a view of ascertaining what is the effect upon the rector in this case of the sequestration. The 1st section provides that, on a sequestration, the bishop may appoint a curate and assign him a stipend; nothing turns on the particular language of that section, which goes on to provide how the stipend is to be paid and the amount; but the 5th section is one of considerable importance; it provides that, "in case any such sequestration remains in force for more than six months, the bishop, if it appears to him that scandal or inconvenience is likely to arise from the incumbent continuing to perform the services of the church while the sequestration remains in force, may, from and after the expiration of such period, inhibit the incumbent from performing any services of the Church within the diocese as long as the sequestration shall remain in force, and the bishop may at any time withdraw such inhibition." From this it seems plain that, during the sequestration, unless the bishop makes inhibition, the incumbent may still perform the services of the church, and, consequently, it appears to follow that sequestration is very different from suspension. In fact, sequestration is this, that the proceeds of the benefice are taken by an officer appointed by the bishop for the purpose, but in other respects the position of the incumbent, except so far as it may be expressly altered by the statute, remains the same. That position is, I think, established, not merely by the 5th section, but by the 6th, which provides that, "during such time as any sequestration remains in force the incumbent shall be absolutely disabled from presenting or nominating to any benefice then vacant of which he may be patron in right of benefice under sequestration." That is to say, one of the rights which belong to the incumbent in virtue of the benefice is taken away in express terms. This is properly made use of by Mr. Willis Bund to show that, except to the extent that the Act in terms interferes with his position, the incumbent in this case still retains the character of rector, as undoubtedly he retains the rights belonging to the rector. For these reasons I hold that the appointment to the office of parish clerk has on this occasion been rightly made by the rector, notwithstanding the sequestration, and I give effect to that opinion to the limited extent asked at the bar —viz., by restraining the defendant, until the trial or further order, from receiving the fees, profits, or emoluments belonging to the office of parish clerk. It will, of course, be open to the court to consider the matter again should there be a further argument upon the trial.

March 23.—The case came on again on this date upon motion for judgment in default of defence, the minutes asking that the defendant might be restrained from acting as parish clerk.

Willis Bund, for the plaintiff, cited the authorities given above.

CHITTY, J., gave judgment accordingly, saying that all the authorities were to the effect that the court had jurisdiction, and that the office was a temporal office.

In re COX AND NEVE'S CONTRACT AND THE VENDOR AND PURCHASER ACT, 1874. (a.)

Vendor and purchaser—Title—Defect not disclosed by abstract—Restrictive covenant—Discovery of restriction by purchaser after expiration of time for delivering requisitions upon abstract.

A purchaser at a sale by auction discovered that a deed immediately preceding the deed which, by the conditions of sale, was made the root of title, and which gave a title of thirty-eight years only, contained a restrictive covenant affecting the right of building upon part of the property purchased by him, which covenant was not disclosed by the abstract. The discovery was made after the expiration of the time fixed for delivering requisitions upon the abstract. The purchaser did not immediately acquaint the vendor with his objection to the restrictive covenant, but, the vendor's replies to the requisitions sent in not being satisfactory, the purchaser took out a summons under the Vendor and Purchaser Act, 1874, for a declaration that the requisitions had not been sufficiently answered, and that a good title had not been shown to the property, and in his affidavit in support of the summons stated his objection with respect to the restrictive covenant.

Held, that the objection was not taken too late, and that it was a good objection to the title.

Adjourned summons.

This was a summons under the Vendor and Purchaser Act, 1874, by a purchaser of real estate, asking for a declaration that the requisitions and objections made by him in respect of the title to the property had not been sufficiently answered, and that a good title had not been shown in accordance with the particulars and conditions of sale; and that the vendor might be ordered to return the deposit made by the purchaser and to pay his costs of investigating the title and the costs of the summons.

On the 11th of June, 1890, W. T. Neve purchased at a sale by auction two houses in Great Queen-street, Holborn, with buildings consisting of a boiler-room and warehouse at the back, and a right of way or passage running by the side of one of the houses and connecting the back buildings with Great Queen-street, the vendor being Louisa E. Cox. The property was described in the particulars as "freehold." The 4th condition of sale provided that the title should commence with a mortgage deed dated the 29th of July, 1852. The 5th condition provided that the purchaser should, within fourteen days from the delivery of the abstract, send in to the vendor's solicitors a statement of all his objections to and requisitions upon the title, and that subject thereto the title should be deemed to be accepted, that any answer to such objections and requisitions should be replied to within ten days after the delivery thereof, and if not so replied to should be considered as satisfactory, and that time should be deemed to be of the essence of that condition. The 7th condition provided for the case of any incorrect statement, error, or omission in the particulars, but had no application to the matter in question in the case.

(a.) Reported by J. TRUSTRAM, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

On the 24th of June the abstract of the vendor's title was delivered to the purchaser. It commenced with a mortgage deed dated the 29th of July, 1852, by which J. L. Cox, through whom the vendor derived her title to the property, mortgaged it to D. S. Bockett. The mortgage deed contained numerous recitals, among which was the recital of a deed of exchange dated the 3rd of March, 1847, and made between W. L. Farrer and J. L. Cox, whereby a portion of the property—viz., the boiler-room and warehouse—was conveyed to J. L. Cox in fee in exchange for other property conveyed by J. L. Cox to W. L. Farrer.

On the 8th of July the purchaser's requisitions were sent in to the vendor's solicitors. They included one requisition respecting the ownership of the right of way; and another was as follows:—Is the vendor, or are her solicitors, aware of any document or thing affecting the title or the property which is not noticed in the abstract, and which, if undisclosed, may prejudicially affect the purchaser?

On the 12th of July the vendor's solicitors sent in their replies to the purchaser's requisitions, their reply to the requisition set out above being, "We are not bound to answer this requisition."

The purchaser was not satisfied with the vendor's reply to the requisition with respect to the ownership of the right of way, and made inquiries of Messrs. Farrer & Co., the solicitors to the owner of the adjoining house, who produced the deed of exchange of the 3rd of March, 1847.

On the 23rd of July the purchaser sent in further requisitions upon the title, one of which was as follows:—"Messrs. Farrer & Co. have shown to the purchaser a deed of exchange dated the 3rd of March, 1847, which appears to show that J. L. Cox was not then entitled to any right of way."

On the 28th of July the vendor's solicitors delivered replies to the further requisitions, which replies were not regarded by the purchaser as sufficient.

On the 9th of August the purchaser took out the present summons. On the 13th of August the purchaser's solicitors wrote to the vendor's solicitors stating that they would not file their evidence until towards the end of the vacation, and informing them them they had obtained from Messrs. Farrer & Co. a copy of the deed of exchange of the 3rd of March, 1847, which they alleged ought to have formed part of the abstract of title.

On the 15th of October the purchaser filed an affidavit in support of his summons, in which, after stating that he had obtained from Messrs. Farrer & Co. a copy of the deed of exchange of the 3rd of March, 1847, he alleged at paragraph 23: "From the copy so obtained it appears that J. L. Cox thereby entered into a restrictive covenant with respect to the buildings that might be erected on the site of the boiler-room and warehouse. If I had known of the existence of such covenant at the time of sending my requisitions on the title I should have required the vendor to procure the release thereof." This was the first intimation received by the vendor that the purchaser objected to the restrictive covenant contained in that deed, and the vendor did not cross-examine the purchaser upon the allegation or make any reference to it in any affidavit in answer to the purchaser's affidavit.

The covenant in the deed of the 3rd of March, 1847, was as follows: "And the said John Lewis Cox, both for himself, his heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns, doth hereby ~~covenant,~~ promise, and agree with and to the said William Loxham Farrer, his heirs and assigns, in manner following—that is to say, that he, the said John Lewis Cox, his heirs or assigns, or any of them, will not, nor shall at any time or times hereafter, build or erect, or permit or suffer to be built or erected, or remain or be upon the said hereditaments hereinbefore conveyed, or any part or parts thereof, any building or erection whatsoever other than and except the present buildings and erections, or other erections or buildings of the same size, height, and dimensions which may be hereinafter erected or built in lieu or in place of the present buildings and erections."

It was in evidence that the buildings known as the boiler-room and the warehouse which were comprised in, and conveyed by, the deed of the 3rd of March, 1847, and to which the above covenant referred were only two floors in height, while the houses to which they were attached contained four or five floors, and consequently those buildings were capable of considerable improvement.

On the hearing of the summons it was arranged that the objection taken by the purchaser to the vendor's title on account of the existence of the restrictive covenant should be first disposed of, as, if decided in favour of the purchaser, it would be fatal to the vendor's title.

Everitt, Q.C., and Gaselee, for the summons.—The restrictive covenant in the deed of the 3rd of March, 1847, is still applicable to the boiler-room and the warehouse, which constitute a material portion of the property which the vendor professed to sell as freehold free from any restriction not shown by the abstract, and is therefore a fatal blot in the vendor's title. The vendor ought to have set forth that deed in the abstract of title, and so given the purchaser notice of the covenant. The purchaser did not refer to the covenant in his requisitions on the title because he was unaware of its existence, as he states in his affidavit. The deed was produced to him before the 23rd of July with reference to the question of the right of way, but he may have only seen the plan, and not read through the deed.

They referred to Mackenzie v. Childers, 38 W. R. 243, 43 Ch. D. 265; In re Ebsworth and Tidy's Contract, 37 W. R. 657, 42 Ch. D. 23; In re Higgins and Hitchman's Contract, 30 W. R. 700, 21 Ch. D. 95; Nottingham Patent Brick and Tile Co. v. Butler, 34 W. R. 405, 16 Q. B. D. 778.

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., and Hadley, for the vendor.—The restrictive covenant is contained in a deed prior to that at which, by the conditions of sale, the vendor's title is made to commence. If the purchaser had taken the property without notice of the covenant he would not have been bound by it, and if the purchaser looks up old deeds prior in date to that with which the vendor's title is made to commence, and thereby obtains notice of a restrictive covenant, the vendor ought not to be affected by that. If the purchaser intended to raise any objection because of the covenant he should have done so at once, and not waited until he made his affidavit. The objection is too late. The purchaser does not say that the covenant is material to him. It applies to a very small part of the property, and the matter admits of compensation.

NORTH, J.—In this case certain property was put up for sale by auction on the 11th of June, 1890, under conditions which provide:— [His lordship read conditions 4, 5, and 7, and continued:—] I do not find that there was any incorrect statement, error, or omission in the particulars, and therefore I do not think that the 7th condition has any application. An abstract of title was delivered to Mr. Neve, the purchaser, on the 24th of June commencing with a mortgage deed dated the 29th of July, 1852, which was mentioned in the conditions as the deed with which the title should commence. That deed contains several recitals which are abstracted, including a recital that by an indenture of the 3rd of March, 1847, between William Loxham Farrer of the one part, and the said J. L. Cox of the other part, certain hereditaments (being the residue of the hereditaments intended to be granted by the mortgage of the 29th of July, 1852) were conveyed to the use of the said J. L. Cox, his heirs and assigns. On the 8th of July requisitions on the title were sent in and were answered on the 12th. The question was asked, Is the vendor, or are her solicitors, aware of any document or thing affecting the title or the property which is not noticed in the abstract, and which, if remaining undisclosed, may prejudicially affect the purchaser? The solicitors take advantage of their right to say, "We are not bound to answer this requisition." On the 23rd of July further requisitions were sent in, one of which was, "Messrs. Farrer & Co. have shown to the purchaser a deed of exchange dated the 3rd of March, 1847, which appears to show that John Lewis Cox was not then entitled to any right of way." It is clear that the purchaser's solicitors had then seen the deed of exchange of the 3rd of March, 1847, and must be taken to have known all they thought material, and I cannot say that they had only seen the plan, as was suggested.

On the 23rd of July no requisition relating to that deed beyond what I have read was made. On the 28th of July the vendor's solicitors replied to the further requisitions. Some correspondence ensued, and on the 9th of August the purchaser's summons was taken out, asking that it might be declared that the purchaser's requisitions and objections had not been sufficiently answered, and that a good title had not been shown to the property. I read that as meaning that the requisitions and objections had not been sufficiently answered, and that by reason thereof a good title had not been made out. The latter part does not mean to set up a general objection to the title. The Long Vacation intervened, and the affidavit of the purchaser in support of the summons was not filed until the 16th of October. It states that he had obtained from Messrs. Farrer & Co. a copy of the deed of the 3rd of March, 1847, and adds: "From the copy so obtained it appears that the said J. L. Cox thereby entered into a restrictive covenant with respect to the buildings that might be erected on the site of the said boiler-room and warehouse. If I had known of the existence of such covenant at the time of sending in my requisitions on the title I should have required the vendor to procure the release thereof." I think the purchaser did there clearly and explicitly state his objection that there was a restrictive covenant affecting the property which must be released. His objection was that a good title had not been shown to that which the vendor had professed to sell as freehold, free from any restriction which was not noticed in the abstract. I think that an attempt has been made to take advantage of the purchaser. I am not satisfied with the course adopted by the vendor. The vendor's solicitor has made no affidavit upon the matter. The vendor has not made any affidavit that she has not in her possession a duplicate copy of the deed of the 3rd of March, 1847, which is in the possession of Messrs. Farrer. It is probable that a duplicate copy of that deed was made, and it must have been at some time in the possession of J. L. Cox. Under these circumstances the vendor does not choose to commence the title with an earlier deed than a deed of mortgage dated the 29th of July, 1852, which gives a title of thirty-eight years only. Then they say that the purchaser has been too vigilant—I never heard such an objection before—that if the purchaser had not found out the restrictive covenant he would have been a bonâ fide purchaser for value without notice of it, and would not have been bound by the covenant. It was the vendor's duty to set forth the deed of the 3rd of March, 1847, on the abstract, and inform the purchaser of the existence of the covenant; and I think the purchaser would have been bound by it if he had not found it out. If he had taken the property on a thirty-eight years' title he would I think have been bound by the restrictive covenant which would appear in a forty years' title. Otherwise, a man might agree to buy a property without any title, and then say he had not constructive notice of any incumbrance which would appear in an abstract of title. What, in the absence of agreement, a purchaser is entitled to, is a title for forty years, and so much more as it is necessary to go back to for a proper root of title. The purchaser is fortunate in discovering what the vendor ought to have told him. It is said that the purchaser is precluded from making the objection because he did not do so at the earliest possible moment after finding it out. I do not think he was under such an obligation. The condition that the purchaser should, within fourteen days after the delivery of the abstract, send to the vendor's solicitors a statement of all his requisitions upon the title, means that requisitions which arise upon the abstract are to be delivered within the time mentioned in the condition. This objection does not arise upon the abstract. I think the purchaser must be taken to have discovered the existence of the restrictive covenant, or to have had constructive notice of the contents of the deed of the 3rd of March, 1847, very shortly before he sent in his further requisitions on the 23rd of July. I do not see that he is bound to send in his objection within a short time, such as twenty-four hours, after discovering it. I think it was his duty to make this objection within a reasonable time. The conditions of sale allow him fourteen days from the time for delivering the abstract for sending in requisitions. I do not see why he should have a shorter time in case of objections not appearing in the abstract. If the vendor had been prejudiced by the delay of the purchaser in making the objection the case might be different. But there is nothing to show that the vendor has been prejudiced in this case. The parties were already at arms' length. I think, therefore, there was nothing to preclude the purchaser from taking the objection, when he did, by his affidavit.

It is said that the restrictive covenant only relates to a small portion of the property. I think that it relates to a material part of the property, as it prevents part of it from being raised above a certain height. It is useless to ask me to believe that a building near Lincoln's-inn-fields is not capable of being improved by being raised so as to become more valuable. The purchaser, in his affidavit, swears that if he had known of the existence of the restrictive covenant at the time of sending in his requisitions on the title he should have required the vendor to procure the release thereof. I think that a good objection to the title has been made out by the purchaser. The vendor must return the purchaser's deposit and pay the purchaser's costs of investigating the title, and his costs of this application.

Q. B. Div. (Pollock, B., and Charles, J.) Feb. 4.

BEASLEY v. RONEY. (a.)

Married woman—Husband and wife—Joint action for tort to wife—Damages—Separate property—Married Women's Property Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 75), s. 1, sub-section (2); s. 5.

A husband and wife brought an action for personal injuries sustained by the wife. The jury awarded £25 damages to the wife, and a sum to the husband for his expenses.

Held, that the £25 was the wife's separate property within the meaning of section 5 of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, and that a garnishee order attaching the whole sum recovered in the hands of the plaintiff's solicitor, to answer a judgment debt of the husband, was bad.

Appeal of defendant from a judgment of his Honour Judge Bayley at the Westminster County Court in an interpleader issue arising out of garnishee proceedings.

Beasley, the plaintiff in the issue, had obtained a judgment against James Roney, the defendant's husband, in 1888.

On the 27th of January, 1890, Mr. and Mrs. Roney obtained a verdict in an action brought by them against the London General Omnibus Co. to recover damages for personal injuries to Mrs. Roney. The verdict was for £71 6s. 6d., of which £25 was awarded specially to Mrs. Roney in respect of her injuries, and £46 6s. 6d. to Mr. Roney on account of the medical and other expenses to which he had been put. The £71 6s. 6d. and the taxed costs were paid to the Roneys' solicitor, and upon taxation of his bill it was found that £47 14s. 2d. was due from him to them.

Beasley, as a judgment creditor of the husband, obtained a garnishee order nisi charging the sum remaining in the hands of the solicitor, and Mrs. Roney claimed that £25 part thereof was her money. An interpleader issue was directed in which Beasley was plaintiff and Mrs. Roney defendant, in order to decide which of them was entitled to the sum in the hands of the solicitor. The solicitor paid the money into court to abide the result. The county court judge held that the plaintiff was entitled, and the defendant appealed.

Muir Mackenzie, for the defendant.—The £25 is the wife's money, and is not attachable for the husband's debt. If the whole sum had been paid to the husband directly he would have been a trustee of the £25 for his wife, and regard is had to equitable rights in garnishee proceedings: In re General Horticultural Co., Ex parte Whitehouse, 34 W. R. 681, 32 Ch. D. 512. The judgment was the joint judgment of the husband and the wife; the husband was not joined merely for conformity, but was suing for his expenses, a different cause of action from that of the wife. A debt due to the judgment debtor jointly with another is not attachable: Macdonald v. Tacquah Gold Mines Co., 32 W. R. 760, 13 Q. B. D. 535.

Wildey Wright, for the plaintiff.—The judgment was the husband's, and was not joint. Before the Married Women's Property Acts a wife could not sue without joining her husband as co-plaintiff, and the husband was entitled to the fruits of the action. In section 1, sub-section (2), of the Act of 1882 the words "any damages or costs recovered by her in any such action" relate only to actions in which the wife is suing alone under that section; if the husband is joined as a party the fruits are still his, as before the Act. The expression "money acquired" in section 5 does not include damages recovered in an action.

Muir Mackenzie replied.

POLLOCK, B.—In my opinion this appeal ought to be allowed and judgment entered for the defendant. The material facts are few. There was a verdict for £71 6s. 6d. in an action, as to which all we know is that it was an action for negligence brought by the present defendant, Mrs. Roney, and her husband, against the London General Omnibus Co. Of the amount so recovered the solicitor engaged in that action retained in his hands £47 14s. 2d. after his costs were paid, and it is clear that this amount was due from him to one or both of the plaintiffs. It is clear also that the jury arrived at the sum of £71 6s. 6d. by assessing the damages sustained by the wife at £25, and allowing the husband, speaking roughly, £46 to recoup him for the expenses he had been put to. Under the interpleader issue the question for decision was whether the garnishee, the solicitor, was to pay the whole amount to the present plaintiff, who was a judgment creditor of the husband, and that involved the question whether the amount recovered from the omnibus company was divisible. The county court judge held that it was not, for there was nothing to show that the whole of the money had not been received for the benefit of the male plaintiff. That seems to be contrary to the spirit of the Married Women's Property Act, and if this was a joint debt, owing to the husband and wife jointly, it is clear from Macdonald v. Tacquah Gold Mines Co. that attachment cannot go against a debt owing to the judgment debtor jointly with another person. Therefore, if the judgment is to be treated as the joint judgment of the husband and the wife, the decision of the county court judge is wrong. But the question arises in the present case whether the wife has a separate right to the damages which she recovered. Looking at the spirit of recent legislation, I think that she is so entitled, and that the £25 is hers, and cannot be attached to satisfy a debt owing by her husband. Whether that be clearly shown upon the construction of section 1, sub-section 2, of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, may admit of some doubt; but the case is clearly within section 5. Damages given to a married woman by the verdict of a jury are property acquired by her within that section, and she is as much entitled thereto as if she were an independent person altogether. I think there is no difference between the position of the husband and wife in the present case and the position of two persons who, being injured by a common accident, bring a common action in respect of it, each of whom would be entitled to the damages awarded to him in the action. The appeal, therefore, must be allowed.

CHARLES, J.—I am of the same opinion. The only way in which the case of the plaintiff can be successfully argued is by saying that the judgment, which professes to be joint, is really the husband's. It is either a joint judgment, in which case there is no attachment, or else it is the judgment of the husband. Let us assume it to be the husband's judgment; the husband is in that case the trustee of £25 of the amount for the benefit of his wife. It is suggested that the Married Women's Property Act has nothing to do with the case, because the husband was a co-plaintiff with the wife; but in my opinion, even where the husband is joined as plaintiff, damages which are given specially to the wife, as we must take this sum of £25 to have been, are the wife's property. I also entirely agree with the observations of my brother Pollock as to the construction of section 5. For these reasons I am of opinion that the order of the county court judge cannot be sustained.

Married woman—Husband and wife—Death of wife possessed of separate property—Liability of husband for debt of wife—Legal personal representative—Married Women's Property Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 75), s. 23.

Where a married woman possessed of leasehold property for her separate use dies intestate, such property vests in her husband jure mariti, without any necessity for taking out administration; but he is her legal personal representative within the meaning of section 23 of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, and therefore takes the property subject to the liability to pay thereout any debts which his wife may have incurred in respect of her separate property.

Appeal by the plaintiff from a judgment of the judge of the Birmingham County Court.

The action was brought to recover a sum of money lent by the plaintiff to the defendant's late wife. The defendant's wife had been married twice previously to her marriage with him. Her first husband, by a post-nuptial deed of gift, granted to her some leasehold property to her "own proper use and benefit," with "full power and authority to sue and give receipts." The sum sought to be recovered was lent to her while she was the wife of the defendant, after the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, had come into operation. She died intestate, being at the time of her death still possessed of the leasehold property. The defendant entered into possession of her property without taking out letters of administration. The county court judge held that the plaintiff was not entitled to recover.

Graham, for the defendant.

The following cases were cited:—Hulme v. Tenant, 1 W. & T., 6th ed., 536; Lee v. Prieaux, 3 Bro. C. C. 381; Tyler v. Lake, 2 Russ. & My. 183; In re Bellamy, Elder v. Pearson, 32 W. R. 358, 25 Ch. D. 620; In re Lambert, Stanton v. Lambert, 39 Ch. D. 626, 37 W. R. Dig. 88; Cotton v. Cotton, 2 Beav. 67.

POLLOCK, B.—The first question is whether this leasehold property was the separate estate of this lady. It was given to her "to her own proper use and benefit." Such words in a grant to a woman by her husband clearly have the effect of making the property separate estate. The deed also conferred on her "full power and authority to sue and give receipts." The case of Lee v. Prieaux, where a legacy to a married woman, "her receipt to be a sufficient discharge to the executors," was held to be a gift to her sole and separate use, is an authority to show that by this deed the property in question became separate estate.

The next question is, What was the effect of the wife's death? The decisions show that the course of devolution of a wife's separate property is not altered by the Married Women's Property Act, and that such separate property vests in the husband jure mariti without any necessity for taking out administration: In re Lambert, Stanton v. Lambert. Now comes the question which presents the only real difficulty in the case. The defendant contends that the property vested in him clear of all his wife's liabilities. I think that, under the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, that is not so. Section 1, sub-section 3, says: "Every contract entered into by a married woman shall be deemed to be a contract entered into by her with respect to and to bind her separate property, unless the contrary be shown." And section 23 says: "For the purposes of this Act the legal personal representative of any married woman shall, in respect of her separate estate, have the same rights and liabilities and be subject to the same jurisdiction as she would be if she were living." I think the true construction is that a woman's husband who takes her property jure mariti is her legal personal representative, and, therefore, the defendant took his wife's separate property subject to her liabilities, and he is liable with respect to that property in the same manner as she would have been. The plaintiff is entitled to judgment against him to that extent.

*Divorce—Husband's petition—Order for wife's maintenance—*Dum sola et casta clause.

Where the amount allowed for maintenance of a wife guilty of adultery is not a large income, but only a bare allowance, the court will not necessarily insert a dum sola et casta clause in the order.

Application to make absolute a decree nisi for dissolution of marriage on the ground of the wife's adultery and for the insertion in an order for the wife's maintenance of a dum sola et casta clause.

At the hearing of the petition on the 14th of June, 1890, before Hannen, P., without a jury it appeared that the parties were married in 1873, and shortly after the birth of the first child, a boy, the respondent became temporarily insane, and on her recovery in 1874 the petitioner was advised that if his wife became pregnant again it would be dangerous to her health and that of the child. It was thereupon agreed that they should live apart, the petitioner allowing his wife £1 a week for maintenance. They corresponded for some time till in May, 1879, the petitioner took the child away from his mother, and on her requesting an interview refused it, and required her in future to address any communications to his solicitor, but he continued the allowance till 1889, when rumours reached him which resulted in the charge, in the petition, of adultery with three co-respondents. Hannen, P., found the charges proved, and also that the petitioner had not been guilty of neglect conducing to the adultery, and granted a decree nisi.

(a.) Reported by J. GERARD LAING, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

He further intimated that some provision should be made for the wife's maintenance.

Searle, in support of the motion.—The petitioner has agreed to allow his wife fifteen shillings a week, but the order ought only to be made as long as she remains chaste and unmarried.

Durley Grazebrook, for the respondent, urged that under the circumstances of the case no such clause should be inserted.

HANNEN, P., made the order, but as it was not a question of a large income, but of a bare allowance, did not think it necessary under the circumstances of the case to insert a dum sola et casta clause in the order.

Solicitor—Lien for costs—Extent of lien—Taxable costs, charges, and expenses—Advances—Solicitors Act, 1860 (23 & 24 Vict. c. 127), s. 28—Taking security for costs—Interest—Waiver of lien.

A solicitor can only have a lien on his client's documents for taxable costs, charges, and expenses incurred by him as solicitor of the client, which will include all advances, made by the solicitor in the course of his business as a solicitor, which are liable to be moderated by the taxing master; but the lien does not extend to ordinary loans or advances by the solicitor not so made as aforesaid, and not liable to be so taxed or moderated.

As to whether the taking of a security from the client operates as a waiver of the lien where one exists, no fixed rule can be laid down; but it depends on the position of the parties and the circumstances of the particular case, as affording an inference of the intention of the parties. If that position and the circumstances of the case, or the nature of the security, are such that the taking of the security is inconsistent with the continuance of the lien, a sufficient indication is afforded of an intention to abandon the lien and rely on the security so taken.

A solicitor took as security from his client (a married woman) a promissory note (in which her husband joined as surety), with a provision for payment of interest at five per cent., and also a charge on a life policy; and nothing was said about the lien continuing, notwithstanding the taking of the security.

Held, that, inasmuch as a solicitor owes a duty to his client to explain clearly the effect of every transaction between them, and as the security in question gave more than the lien, the taking of it was inconsistent with the continuance of the lien, and afforded an inference of an intention to abandon the lien and rely on the security.

Decision of Stirling, J., reversed.

Appeal from Stirling, J.

Mrs. Agnes Mary Lawrenson Payne-Collier was, under the will of General John Lawrenson, entitled for her life to one-half the income of his residuary estate, but her interest was subject to a restraint upon anticipation. It appeared that Mrs. Payne-Collier, being in want of money, employed Messrs. Taylor, Stileman, & Underwood, who then acted as her solicitors, to make an application to the court with a view of raising a sum of money to pay debts and for other necessary purposes, notwithstanding the restraint on anticipation. This they carried out for her to the extent that a loan of £500 was allowed to be raised on mortgage for the aforesaid purposes. A further application for leave to raise a further sum of £500 to pay debts and enable her to remove from Bucks to Devonshire was subsequently made, and granted by the court with some reluctance, and only on condition that no further sum was to be raised, and that the present loan should be received and disbursed by her said solicitors. The sum raised proving insufficient to do more than pay the debts, those solicitors, at Mrs. Collier's request, advanced her £100 to pay the expenses of her removal to Devonshire, and to pay the first half-year's rent of her house there.

It appeared also that some furniture in the house had been seized by the sheriff, and that the solicitors, at Mrs. Collier's request, had paid the sheriff out; but during the hearing of the appeal it transpired that the sheriff had seized under a judgment against Mrs. Collier's husband. Messrs. Taylor & Co. had also advanced other sums to Mrs. Collier from time to time, and for the amount owing to them they had taken as security a charge for £200 on a policy of assurance on her life, and also a promissory note for £200 in which her husband joined as surety, and which carried interest at five per cent.

Mrs. Collier, having subsequently changed her solicitors, applied to Messrs. Taylor & Co. to give up all documents in their possession belonging to her; but they, considering that they had a lien on such documents for the amount owing to them from her, objected to give them up unless such amount was paid. The amount they claimed was £81 14s. 2d., of which £20 12s. 9d. was for costs proper, and the balance was in respect of advances, which they said they had only made to her as her solicitors, and would not have made had they not stood in that relation to her.

Her present solicitors tendered £20 12s. 9d. to Messrs. Taylor & Co., but the latter declined to give up the papers unless their full claim was paid.

Mrs. Collier then made an application to the court that she might be at liberty to pay the sum of £20 12s. 9d. into court to the credit of the matter without prejudice to taxation of the bill of costs, and that the solicitors might be ordered to deliver up all her papers in their possession.

Stirling, J., having refused the application, Mrs. Payne-Collier appealed.

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., and C. Macnaghten, for the appellant.—In the first place, solicitors cannot have a lien for money advanced, and, secondly, their lien (if any) is superseded by taking security: Cowell v. Simpson, 16 Ves. 275, at p. 282, per Lord Eldon, C. In any case, the court will order the papers to be given up on payment into court of the amount of costs proper not covered by security: Balch v. Symes, 1 Turn. & Russ. 87, at p. 92. [LOPES, L.J., referred to Stevenson v. Blakelock, 1 Maule & Sel. 535.] If a solicitor takes a promissory note for his costs payable on demand he loses his lien: Robarts v. Jefferys, 8 L. J. Ch. (O. S.) 137, which is on all fours with the present case. [LINDLEY, L.J., referred to Chase v. Westmore, 5 Maule & Sel. 180.] Solicitor's lien is only for "costs" properly so called, and does not extend to general debts: In re Galland, 34 W. R. 58, 158; 31

(a.) Reported by R. H. DEANE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Ch. D. 297. [LOPES, L.J., referred to Blunden v. Desart, 2 Dr. & W. 405.] The point as to the taking of security operating as a waiver of the lien was not argued before Stirling, J., as we were not at that time aware of the fact.

Graham Hastings, Q.C., and Maidlow, for the respondents.—Taking security only destroys solicitor's lien where there is something in the nature of the security taken or in the circumstances, which is inconsistent with the continued existence of the lien: Angus v. McLachlan, 31 W. R. 641, 23 Ch. D. 330, 335. The present case is distinguishable from Cowell v. Simpson and Balch v. Symes. A general lien is not excluded by a special agreement: Jones v. Peppercorne, 7 W. R. 103, Johnson, 430, 442 (a case of banker's lien), and Brandao v. Barnett, 12 Cl. & Fin. 787, at p. 809. [LOPES, L.J.—Is there any case in which it has been held that taking security does not destroy a solicitor's lien? Does not the rule "Expressum facit cessare tacitum" apply?] What Robarts v. Jefferys decided was that it was improper to take a security and then insist on the lien; but the ground of that decision was the fact, that interest was not at that time payable upon solicitor's costs; but now, under the Solicitors' Remuneration Act, 1881, s. 5, it may be payable. The £100 advanced to enable this lady to remove to Devonshire was advanced by the solicitors in their character as such, and they certainly would not have advanced it had they not been acting as her solicitors, and therefore it does not come within the description of "general debts" in In re Galland, but is protected by the lien. [FRY, L.J., cited the judgment of Sir T. Plumer in Worrall v. Johnson, 2 J. & W., at p. 218.] The advance was made in consequence of the solicitors having undertaken a duty towards Mrs. Payne-Collier, and in the course of carrying out the arrangement made with the sanction of the court. They had undertaken the responsibility of seeing that the order for removing the restraint on anticipation should be carried out for her benefit. [LOPES, L.J.—The amount was not remuneration for any services rendered by them as solicitors. KAY, L.J.—There could be no obligation on the solicitors to pay for her going down to Devonshire; it was a mere voluntary loan.] Then we paid out the sheriff who was in possession. Eleven guineas were paid him for his charges. [Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., explained that those were not the wife's costs at all, the sheriff having seized the furniture for a debt of the husband's, and the solicitors having paid him out at the request of the wife, their client.] There was nothing in the security given here which was inconsistent with the lien. It is all a question of intention, to be gathered from what was said and done. No doubt it is inconsistent if you take a security payable at a distant date in the future, as in the cases referred to decided by Lord Eldon. There was nothing inconsistent with the lien in the fact of interest being reserved by the security taken.

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., was not called on to reply.

LINDLEY, L.J.—This is an appeal from a decision of Stirling, J., refusing to direct certain solicitors to hand over their client's papers upon her paying into court the amount due from her to them in respect of their costs. The controversy which has arisen between these parties has assumed rather a serious shape. I will first consider for what a solicitor has a lien at all on his client's documents. I take it that he has such a lien for all his taxed or taxable costs, charges, and expenses incurred by him as the solicitor of his client. I take it that he has no lien for ordinary advances or loans made to the client; but his taxed, or rather his taxable, costs, charges, and expenses will not exclude all advances. He may make advances for his client in the course of his business as a solicitor, as, for instance, for the payment of counsels' fees, and other matters, all of which are taxable by the master in this sense—that they can be moderated. They are subject to the jurisdiction or discretion of the taxing master to moderate, and not merely to require them to be vouched; and whatever advances, costs, charges, and expenses can be so dealt with, for all such, it appears to me, a solicitor can have a lien upon his client's papers. It is a general lien extending to all such papers for all such costs, charges, and expenses, but it does not extend to other advances, such as the advances made in the present case, which do not come under the category which I have described. I arrive at this conclusion, not only upon the authority of decided cases, but upon the express language of section 28 of the Solicitors Act, 1860, which enables a solicitor to obtain a lien for his "taxed costs, charges, and expenses" on "property recovered or preserved through" his "instrumentality." That expresses, in as accurate language as I am able, the kind of costs for which a solicitor can have a lien.

Now, the solicitor claims here for advances which he contends come under that category, and I thought at one time that as to one item—the eleven guineas paid for the sheriff's charges—it was such an advance, because we were told there was a judgment against his client, that the sheriff was in possession, and that he, as solicitor, paid the sheriff out. If that were so, I think that would have been a charge properly taxable by the taxing master. But it now appears that it was a judgment against his client's husband, and that the wife requested the solicitor to pay the sheriff out because he had taken possession of her furniture. The sum advanced by the solicitor for that purpose had nothing to do with costs, charges, or expenses properly taxable as between this solicitor and his client. It was merely a loan. It was not taxable by the taxing master, nor open to moderation by him, and must come into the category of advances for which there is no lien, and not under that of taxable costs, charges, or expenses; on that point, therefore, the judgment below goes too far.

Another point which is important has been raised by Mr. Cozens-Hardy. He says that whatever lien these solicitors may have had, was destroyed by their having taken security from their client. The security taken consisted of a promissory note for £200 given by the solicitor's client, who was a married woman, and by her husband, and bearing interest at five per cent., and also of a charge upon a certain policy of insurance. He says that is a waiver of the lien, if there ever was any, and as authority for that proposition he relies on the case of Robarts v. Jefferys, a decision of Sir John Leach. The precise point in that case seems to me to be exactly the point which arises here. In that case the solicitor claimed a lien, and the client gave a promissory note payable on demand and bearing interest at five per cent., and Sir John Leach said: "The taking of this promissory note was altogether a waiver of the lien of this solicitor." In my opinion the question whether the taking of a security operates as a waiver of a lien must depend on the intention expressed or to be inferred from the position of the parties, and all the circumstances of the particular case. In this particular case we are dealing with a solicitor and his client, and it strikes me, I confess, that if a solicitor takes from his client such a security as this solicitor has taken, the primâ facie inference, in every sense, is that he does waive his lien, if he says nothing to the contrary; and it appears to me that that is a right and proper conclusion to come to, bearing in mind that it is a duty which a solicitor owes to his client to explain to him the exact effect of what he is about to do. The inference would not be the same in every case. If a banker asked me for a security I think the inference would be different. I should not understand that he was giving up his lien unless there was something expressed to that effect. But bearing in mind the relative position of the parties in the present case, and having regard to that decision of Sir J. Leach, I think, in the absence of all evidence of a contrary intention of the parties, that the true inference to be drawn from the circumstances of this case is that the lien was waived. Upon that point, also, I therefore think that Mr. Cozens-Hardy was right, and that the appeal ought consequently to succeed on both points.

LOPES, L.J.—A solicitor has a lien for all his taxed costs, charges, and expenses, but that clearly does not extend to advances made for any other purposes than purposes for which the solicitor is employed as such. Now in this case there was a sum of eleven guineas paid by these solicitors to release their client's furniture from the sheriff, and I thought at first that that item might be brought within the rule I have laid down. But it turned out, upon investigation, that the judgment under which the sheriff seized the client's furniture was a judgment, not against her, but against her husband. She then applies to the solicitor and asks him to pay out the sheriff, and he does so, not at all, as I understand, in his capacity as a solicitor, but as any ordinary friend might have advanced money to release the furniture. That payment, therefore, it seems to me, was not a taxable item, but a mere voluntary advance made by the solicitor, not as a solicitor, but in the way I have already stated.

In my opinion the costs or advances for which a solicitor may have a lien must be taxable—that is, liable to be reduced or moderated by the taxing master, and upon that point, therefore, Mr. Hardy is right.

Upon the other point raised with regard to a security taken from the client by the solicitor, it is contended that the lien here was lost, because the solicitor took a certain security from his client. As to that I do not think any fixed general rule can be laid down, but each case must be decided on its own circumstances, regard being had to whether those circumstances are sufficient to raise an inference (which may be rebutted) that the parties intended to abandon the old security. I will not go so far as to say that the mere fact that a new security has been taken is in itself sufficient to show an intention to abandon the old one. But if the circumstances are such as to make the one security inconsistent with the other, that, in my opinion, does sufficiently show such an intention. In this case part of the security consisted of a promissory note, with interest running at the rate of five per cent. from the date of the advance. That is more than could be recovered on the lien. There was also a charge on a policy, and the promissory note is not given by the wife alone, but the husband joins as surety. The security taken is a security larger than, and of a different nature from, his lien as a solicitor. I think, therefore, that it is a fair inference that an intention existed between the parties, in taking that security, to abandon the old security of the lien, and rely on that new security taken as I have described. Therefore, in my opinion, Mr. Hardy was right on that point too. The decision on this point, I may say, is in strict accordance with that in Robarts v. Jefferys, which was a decision of Sir John Leach. It seems extraordinary that his decision is not referred to in any text-book.

KAY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion, but as we are differing from the learned judge below, I think it is right to give my own reasons for doing so in my own words.

The appeal raises two very important points, the first being as to the extent of the ordinary lien of a solicitor, and the second, as to how that lien is affected by taking another security. I do not find in any of the cases cited, or in any of the books to which I have had to refer in the course of this appeal, any exact definition of how far the lien of a solicitor extends. In Morgan and Wurtzburg on Costs it is said, at page 551, "The solicitor has a lien on the papers of his client in his hands for the amount of his costs." Another text-book (Pulling on Attorneys, 3rd ed., at p. 371) substitutes the words "for his professional services" instead of "for the amount of his costs."

The nearest approach to such a definition which I have been able to find is by Sir T. Plumer, and occurs in the case of Worrall v. Johnson in 2 J. & W., at p. 218, which is this: "There are two kinds of lien that a solicitor has for his bill of costs; one on the funds recovered, and the other on the papers in his hands. If there be no fund and no cause, still the client cannot get back the papers without paying what is due, not only in respect of that business for which the papers were used, but for other business also. This lien, however, does not extend to general debts, but only to what is due to him in the character of attorney. That he has a right to retain, and it is in consequence the general practice for the client when he applies for an order for the delivery of his papers to submit to pay the bills of costs generally."

There the words used are "bills of costs," and I take it, therefore, that the lien extends to all those items properly included in the bill of costs—that is, in other and more definite words, to all such claims or charges by the solicitor as are liable to be considered and reduced or moderated by the taxing master, and I think that definition will be found to be one that works very well indeed in practice.

Upon the second point, which has been fully dealt with, I will only say a word or two about the law. Now as to the sort of security the taking of which will discharge the solicitor's lien we have the very much considered judgment of Lord Eldon in Cowell v. Simpson, where the security given was a promissory note payable in three years, and Lord Eldon said this in 16 Ves., at p. 281:—"The exigencies of mankind requiring the goods to be delivered for consumption, the implication from an engagement for security of an engagement to deliver the goods without payment is necessary, otherwise, from a promissory note payable in three years, a contract must be implied that the goods are to be retained during that period, destroying the other special contract. So, in this instance, if the solicitor says he will not proceed in the business, and will not deliver up the papers, the consequence is that he destroys the express contract to postpone payment for three years. Therefore, unless from the fact that he has taken this security, you can imply that he is to keep the papers three years, though the vital interests of the owner may depend on the possession of them, the implication is necessary that he is to deliver them up, and rely on the contract."

In Stevenson v. Blakelock, 1 M. & S., at p. 544, Lord Ellenborough, C.J., says, "It is unnecessary to canvass the doctrine of Cowell v. Simpson, inasmuch as there is a material distinction between that case and the present; for there the bills were running, and there was no reason to presume that they would not be duly paid; in this case the bills have been refused payment." [His lordship read to the end of Lord Ellenborough's judgment, and proceeded:—] And later, in Balch v. Symes, Lord Eldon said, "Notwistanding the Court of King's Bench has expressed a doubt whether my decision was right in the case of Cowell v. Simpson, I still entertain the opinion that an attorney who takes a security abandons his lien." That has been read as if he meant that in every case the simple fact of taking security was sufficient to show an intention to abandon the lien. But that was not the meaning. What he meant is shown by what he said in Cowell v. Simpson (at the top of p. 282 of the report in 16 Ves.). That is to say, he clearly meant that it is only where there is something in the security taken that is inconsistent with the lien, that an intention to abandon the lien can be inferred from the mere fact of taking the security. I take the true doctrine to be that which Lindley, L.J., has expressed, that in every case in which you have to consider whether a lien has been waived or given up you must look at all the circumstances of the particular case, and no doubt it is most material that we are here dealing with, a case between a solicitor and his own client. A solicitor has a duty when dealing with a client to explain to him all the circumstances and legal consequences of the transaction in a clear and intelligible manner, and where, as in this case, you find a solicitor taking from his client such a security as was here given without saying anything more, or expressly reserving his right of lien, or explaining that the lien would still remain notwithstanding the security, I agree with Lindley, L.J., that the inference ought to be against the solicitor and against the continuance of the lien, as being inconsistent with the nature of the security taken. The point which occurred in Robarts v. Jefferys, that interest was added, is present in this case also. In my opinion, therefore, Mr. Hardy is right on both points.

I think, therefore, that the appeal must be allowed with costs.

Hasker v. Wood, 33 W. R. 697, followed.

Appeal from chambers.

The plaintiffs had sued the defendant in the High Court for the recovery of four penalties of forty shillings each under 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 15, in respect of infringements of their copyright in a play called "The Area Belle." The defendant paid the amount claimed into court, and the plaintiffs took it out in satisfaction of their claim. The plaintiffs thereupon applied to have their costs taxed upon the footing of a "full indemnity" under 5 & 6 Vict. c. 97, s. 2. The master refused to tax, on the ground that the plaintiffs, having recovered less than £10, were not entitled to any costs under section 116 of the County Courts Act, 1888.

Pollock, B., on appeal, referred the question to the court.

3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 15, s. 2, enacts that every offender against the Act "shall be liable for each and every such representation to the payment of an amount not less than forty shillings, or to the full amount of the benefit or advantage arising from such representation, or the injury or loss sustained by the plaintiff therefrom, whichever shall be the greater damages to the author or other proprietor of such production so represented contrary to the true intent and meaning of this Act, to be recovered, together with double costs of suit, by such author or other proprietors in any court having jurisdiction in such cases in that part of the said United Kingdom or of the British dominions in which the offence shall be committed."

5 & 6 Vict. c. 97, s. 2, enacts that "so much of any clause, enactment, or provision in any public Act or Acts, not local or personal, whereby it is enacted or provided that either double or treble costs, or any other than the usual costs between party and party, shall or may be recovered, shall be, and the same are hereby, repealed. Provided always, that instead of such costs the party or parties heretofore entitled under such last-mentioned Acts to such double, treble, or other costs shall receive such full and reasonable indemnity as to all costs, charges, and expenses incurred in and about any action, suit, or other legal proceeding as shall be taxed by the proper officer in that behalf, subject to be reviewed in like manner and by the same authority as any other taxation of costs by such officer."

Section 116 of the County Courts Act, 1888, provides, with respect to "any action brought in the High Court which could have been commenced in a county court," that "if in an action founded on tort the plaintiff shall recover a sum less than ten pounds he shall not be entitled to any costs of the action."

Henn Collins, Q.C., and Morton Smith, for the plaintiffs.—This action was brought to recover penalties under a statute; it is not founded on contract or on tort, and section 116 of the County Courts Act, 1888, does not apply. The appellants have a statutory right to have their costs taxed upon the footing of a full indemnity, a privilege which was substituted by 5 & 6 Vict. c. 97 for the privilege of double costs conferred by 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 15. The County Courts Act has not taken away that privilege.

J. E. Bankes, for the defendant.—Section 116 deals with "any action brought in the High Court which could have been commenced in a county court"; these are governing words, and are not cut down by the sub-division as to actions founded on contract or on tort which follows. Moreover, this action is founded upon a tortious act—the performance of a play without the owner's permission. The sums recovered are not penalties, but damages for the tort: Adams v. Batley, 35 W. R. 437, 18 Q. B. D. 625. All costs are now in the discretion of the court: R. S. C., 1883, ord. 65, r. 1; Garnett v. Bradley, 26 W. R. 698, 3 App. Cas. 44. Ord. 22, r. 7, applies in this case, and the taxation there directed means taxation on the ordinary scale.

Henn Collins, Q.C., in reply.—These "double costs" and the substituted indemnity are not costs in the ordinary sense, but are part of the plaintiff's compensation under the Act, and no subsequent enactments as to mere costs apply. These provisions of the Act of William IV. are treated as still subsisting in, although they are modified as to musical compositions by, the Copyright (Musical Compositions) Acts, 1882 and 1888.

WILLS, J.—In this case we think that the plaintiffs are entitled to the order for which they ask. The foundation of the right is the Act 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 15, which, by section 2, gives to a person who succeeds in an action for infringement of copyright, damages which may be calculated upon one of three scales—either 40s. in respect of each representation, or the full amount of the benefit or advantage arising from such representation, or the injury or loss sustained by the plaintiff therefrom, whichever shall be the greater damages. He is also to recover double costs of the action. Then the Act 5 & 6 Vict. c. 97, by section 2, substitutes for double costs a full and reasonable indemnity. Now the sum which the plaintiffs have recovered they have recovered, not at common law, but by virtue of this statute. They have done so by bringing the defendant into court, and by the process of the court afterwards. This sum was paid into court, and the plaintiffs have taken it out under ord. 22, r. 7. That is, I think, a recovery of this sum within the meaning of the Act of William IV.

It is said that if any part of ord. 22, r. 7, is applicable to this case the whole of that rule is applicable, and that the costs are to be taxed accordingly. That would be true if there were any subject-matter to which the latter part of that rule could apply. It deals with costs, but in my opinion that means costs in the ordinary sense of that word; costs incidental to the main subject of relief, not costs provided for by statute; for these, I think, are not ordinary costs. I am much struck by the contrast in the language used in sections 1 and 2 of the Act 5 & 6 Vict. c. 97. By section 1 provisions in certain Acts giving double and treble costs are repealed, and in lieu thereof "the usual costs between party and party" are to be recovered. In section 2 there is a remarkable change of language which must have been intentional. The words are "such full and reasonable indemnity as to to all costs, charges, and expenses incurred in and about any action, suit, or other legal proceeding as shall be taxed." In my opinion the section to which I have last referred puts these costs on a different footing from ordinary costs, and they are not costs in the ordinary sense at all. This, therefore, is something quite different from an ordinary award of costs to which the rules and orders of the Supreme Court or those under the County Court Acts apply.

The question was raised whether this can be considered to be an action founded on contract or tort. It is not necessary to decide that question, for the indemnity asked for here does not fall within the rules as to costs.

I think that, for the reasons given, apart from that question, the plaintiffs are entitled to what they ask.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J.—I agree that this order should be made as prayed. But I do not come to that conclusion upon quite the same grounds as my learned brother. The action was brought to recover damages given by the Act 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 15, s. 2, which section is amended by 5 & 6 Vict. c. 97, s. 2. Now it is said that the costs recoverable under these two sections are not costs in the ordinary sense, but are an indemnity, and fall outside the scope of the County Courts Acts and the rules as to taxation. I am not sure that I agree with that conclusion. Inasmuch as it was held in Finlay v. Seaton, 1 Taunt. 210, and in subsequent cases that it is not necessary that the right to such costs as these should appear on the record, and inasmuch as no rule or order of court has been considered necessary to give a right to them, it must have been thought that these were costs in the ordinary sense, and that the statute merely empowered the taxing officer to apply a higher scale. The master must look at the proceedings and judge whether the case falls within the statute, and conduct the taxation accordingly. Under these circumstances I do not feel prepared to say that these costs are intended to be an indemnity so different in its nature from ordinary costs that the County Court Acts shall not apply. I think that these are costs to which ord. 22, r. 7, is applicable, and that, that being so, it is impossible to get rid of the difficulty raised by the County Courts Act in the way suggested. As to ord. 22, r. 7, however, it is a doubtful point whether the section of the County Courts Act applies in a case where a sum has been paid into court, and by that means a sum is recovered of less amount than the amounts fixed in section 116 of that Act. But the court has, in my opinion, a discretion as to ordering what costs shall be paid, and I think that the plaintiff acted wisely in asking the judge for an order as to these costs. I have, therefore, arrived at the conclusion, not that these are not costs because they are an indemnity, but that the court has a discretion in ordering these costs. In this case I think that the order ought to have been made; there was good reason for ordering these costs to be paid. I therefore agree that the order should be made.

The COURT (Lord HALSBURY, L.C., Lord ESHER, M.R., and FRY, L.J.) held, upon the authority of Hasker v. Wood, that the plaintiffs' right to a "full and reasonable indemnity," under 5 & 6 Vict. c. 97, s. 2, even assuming it to be the same thing as "costs" (as to which they expressed no opinion), was not affected by the general provisions either of the Judicature Acts and Rules or of the County Courts Act, 1888.

GREEN v. MOORE. (a.)

Practice—Setting aside judgment in default of defence—Short cause—Length of notice—Chancery Judges' Regulations, 1876.

Under the regulations made by the Master of the Rolls and the Vice-Chancellors in 1876, motions for judgments in actions are entered in the cause book, and, if marked "short," will be placed in the paper on the first short cause day after the day for which notice has been given.

The plaintiff gave notice of motion for judgment for the 14th of March, 1891. The case was marked "short," and the 14th of March was the regular short cause day. The defendant not appearing, judgment was given for the plaintiff.

The defendant moved that judgment be set aside, on the ground that the case was placed in the paper prematurely.

Held, that "the first short cause day after the day for which notice is given" means "the first short cause day available after the giving of the notice"; but, having regard to the circumstances of the case, the judgment was set aside and leave given to defend the action, on payment of costs of the motion and costs subsequent to the statement of claim.

Motion.

This was a motion by the defendant to set aside a judgment obtained against him in default of pleading.

The writ was issued on the 21st of January, 1891. The statement of claim was delivered on the 12th of February.

The defendant having failed to deliver a defence, on the 11th of March the plaintiff served him (by leaving it at his chambers) with notice of motion for Saturday, the 14th of March, for judgment in accordance with the statement of claim. The notice stated that the action would be marked "short." The regular short cause day was the 14th of March.

The defendant, being away, did not receive the notice, and did not appear. Judgment was given in his absence in accordance with the statement of claim.

On the 18th of March the defendant returned and found the notice.

On the 19th of March he delivered a defence, which was returned by the plaintiff's solicitors, on the ground that judgment had already been given in the action.

The defendant now for the first time became aware of the judgment, and gave notice of the present motion on the 23rd of March.

The regulations made by the Master of the Rolls and the Vice-Chancellors in 1876 provide that motions for judgment in actions shall not be brought on as ordinary motions, but shall be set down in the cause book, and can then be marked "short" on production of the usual certificate of counsel, and will then be placed in the paper on the first short cause day after the day for which notice is given.

Ribton, for the defendant.—The case came into the paper prematurely on the 14th of March. According to the regulations, the notice being given for a Saturday, which was a short cause day, the case ought not to have been placed in the paper until the following Saturday, the 21st of March, the next short cause day after the day for which notice was given: Gibbings v. Strong, 32 W. R. 757, 26 Ch. D. 66.

Vernon R. Smith, for the plaintiff.—Two clear days' notice was given, all that was necessary.

NORTH, J.—I do not think the plaintiff was wrong in his proceedings. There is some ambiguity in the words of the regulations, but I think that "the first short cause day after the day for which notice is given" means "the first available short cause day after the giving of the notice." If the notice is given for a Saturday I do not think it is necessary to lose a whole week. If the notice is given for any other day except Saturday the difficulty could not arise. I do not think the defendant was at all misled, but, having regard to all the circumstances, I think it is fair that he should have an opportunity of defending. The judgment must be set aside, and leave given to the defendant to deliver a defence on his paying the costs of this motion and the costs subsequent to the statement of claim.

BLYTH v. FLADGATE.
MORGAN v. BLYTH.
SMITH v. BLYTH. (a.)

Solicitor—Trust money passing into hands of firm with notice of trust—Investment by partner on improper security—Negligence—Liability of partners—Notice—Implied retainer—Liability of deceased partner's estate—Contribution—Trustee Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 59), s. 4 (1).

Trust funds were deposited in 1883 at a bank in the name of a firm of solicitors (consisting of three partners, of whom S. was one) who acted for the trustees. The last surviving trustee died in 1883, and in 1884 the trust funds were invested in a mortgage of house property of a hazardous nature. The mortgage was taken in the names of S. and two other persons, all of whom had then agreed to become new trustees of the trust funds, but who were not actually appointed trustees until after the execution of the mortgage.

S. acted for his firm throughout the whole transaction as to the investment, and the costs of his firm in relation to the transaction were retained out of the trust fund. S. had full knowledge of the nature of the property taken as security, but the other members of his firm had no actual knowledge on the matter. The security proved insufficient, and in 1888, in an action brought by the beneficiaries against S. and the two other trustees of the fund, it was held that they were jointly and severally liable to make good the loss sustained by the trust fund. This not having been done, the present actions were brought.

Held (1), that the trust funds having come into the hands of the firm of solicitors with notice of the trusts, all the partners were affected with knowledge of the nature of the security through S., who acted throughout within the scope of his authority as partner, and were therefore implicated in the breach of trust; that the liability, being joint and several, was not discharged by the judgment, obtained in 1888, against S.; that the Trustee Act, 1888, s. 4, afforded no defence, as the security was one of a class attended with hazard; and that the estate of a deceased partner of S. and the surviving partner personally, were liable to make good the loss.

Lechmere v. Fletcher, 1 Cr. & M. 623, 3 Tyr. 450, and King v. Hoare, 13 M. & W. 494, followed.

Held (2), that the relation of solicitor and client existed between the firm of S. and each of the two new trustees, although no express retainer had been given, and that S., and through him the firm, having failed in the duty of calling the attention of the trustees to the rules as to investment of trust money, the firm was liable for negligence, and that such liability extended to the estate of the deceased partner.

The law as to implied retainer, as laid down in Bean v. Wade, 1 Times L. R. 404, 2 Ibid. 157, followed.

As to an action for indemnity where no claim had actually been made, Hughes-Hallett v. Indian Mammoth Gold Mining Co., 31 W. R. 285, 22 Ch. D. 561, distinguished.

These three actions arose out of an investment on mortgage of funds subject to the trusts of a settlement made on the marriage of Mr. and Mrs. Blyth, which was held by Stirling, J., in a previous action of Blyth v. Smith, to be a breach of trust.

These three actions were tried separately, and to some extent on independent evidence, but the following facts are common to all.

(a.) Reported by W. H. QUARRELL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The settlement in question was dated the 20th of August, 1855, and was made between Philip Thomas Blyth of the first part, William Kemp of the second part, Isabella Mary Blyth (then Isabella Mary Kemp, spinster) of the third part, and Henry George Gordon, Archer Thomas Upton, and Philip Patton Blyth of the fourth part. The last-named parties were the trustees, and were to hold the trust funds upon trust, with the consent of Mr. and Mrs. Blyth, during their joint lives to invest (inter alia) at interest on real securities in England or Wales, or upon leasehold securities in England having at least sixty years to run, and from time to time, with the like consent, to vary, and to pay the income to Mrs. Blyth during her life for her separate use without power of anticipation, and after her death for the issue of the marriage as Mr. and Mrs. Blyth should during their joint lives jointly appoint, and in default for sons at twenty-one and daughters at twenty-one or on marriage in equal shares.

The marriage took place shortly after the date of the settlement, and there were issue of the marriage several children, and among them a son, Philip William Blyth, a daughter, Mrs. Morgan, and Mary Ellen Blyth and Francis Ernest Blyth.

Archer Thomas Upton died on the 5th of January, 1875, Philip Patton Blyth on the 30th of January, 1881, and H. G. Gordon on the 7th of June, 1883.

Part of the trust funds had been invested on mortgage, which was paid off in the lifetime of H. G. Gordon. By his direction the mortgage money was received by Messrs. Fladgate, Smith, & Fladgate (a firm of solicitors) who had acted for the trustees, consisting of Wm. Mark Fladgate, Horace Wm. Smith, and William Francis Fladgate. By the like direction the money when received was invested in exchequer bills, which were deposited with Messrs. Drummond, the bankers of the firm of solicitors, in the name of the firm, and remained so deposited at the time of Gordon's death.

After this event Philip Thomas Blyth (the husband) interested himself in seeking a mortgage suitable for the investment of the trust funds, and on the 8th of October, 1883, he wrote to Mr. Horace Wm. Smith, the member of the firm who attended to the affairs of the trust, a letter saying that a Mr. Pocock had proposed to him a security for £11,000, and asking Smith, as a member of the firm, to look into it and see if the money could be safely lent on it. Simultaneously Pocock wrote to Smith with reference to the same proposed mortgage security for the proposed advance by trustees, and Smith took the matter up and procured the property forming the proposed security to be valued by Mr. George Sanders, a surveyor, whose competence was not called in question in any of these proceedings.

Sanders made two unfavourable reports as to the proposed security, and after receiving these reports, Smith himself, in a letter of the 23rd of November, 1883, written by him to Searle, the proposed mortgagor, pronounced against the proposed security on three grounds—(a) the depressed state of the property; (b) the large amount of ground-rent; and (c) the inadequate proportion of the value of the property to the amount proposed to be advanced.

Shortly afterwards, however, Smith reconsidered and altered this determination, and, as was admitted by him in the original action of Blyth v. Smith, this change was not based on any new facts, but on the opinion of Philip Thomas Blyth and of himself that Sanders had taken too gloomy a view of the situation. In December, 1883, and January, 1884, Smith, acting as a member of the firm of Fladgate, Smith, & Fladgate, corresponded with Searle (the mortgagor) and the mortgagor's solicitors, and received and perused the abstract of the mortgagor's title, and made requisitions thereon.

Prior to the 24th of February, 1884, the exchequer bills were sold, and the proceeds, amounting to £9,658 2s. 8d., placed to the credit of Messrs. Fladgate at Messrs. Drummond's.

During all this time there was no duly appointed trustee of the settlement. On the 9th of January, 1884, Smith had called the attention of Philip Thomas Blyth to the question of the appointment of new trustees, stating that there must be three trustees. On the 19th of January Smith was informed that C. H. Morgan, a son-in-law of Philip Thomas Blyth, would act as one trustee, and Philip William Blyth, a son, as another. Smith himself ultimately (but at what date did not clearly appear from the evidence) agreed to become the third.

On the 13th of March, 1884, Searle executed the proposed mortgages to Smith, P. W. Blyth, and Morgan, and on the same date £11,000 (partly made up of the trust funds, and partly of funds belonging to Mr. and Mrs. Blyth) was transferred to his credit in Messrs. Fladgate's ledger. This was applied as follows:—£1,596 9s. 10d. in payment of a mortgage debt on part of the property; £8,997 10s. 2d. to Searle himself; £21 to Sanders as his fee for surveying the property; £250, one year's interest, to Mrs. Blyth; £115 4s. 7d. was, in pursuance of an agreement in that behalf made between Searle and the Messrs. Fladgate, retained by Messrs. Fladgate for their costs; and £19 5s. 5d. remained in their hands. The appointment of Messrs. Smith, Blyth, and Morgan as trustees of the settlement was not executed until April, 1884, after the mortgage had been executed, and the trust funds dealt with in the way above mentioned.

The security proved an insufficient one, and no interest beyond £250 was ever paid on the mortgage debt.

On the 1st of May, 1884, the partnership between Smith and the Messrs. Fladgates was dissolved.

In October, 1886, an action of Blyth v. Smith was commenced by Mrs. Blyth against Messrs. Smith, P. W. Blyth, and Morgan for the purpose of obtaining a declaration that they were jointly and severally liable to replace the trust fund. To this action Mary Ellen Blyth and Francis Ernest Blyth (two children of Mrs. Blyth) were added as plaintiffs, and by the judgment given at the trial of the action (dated the 9th of August, 1888) it was declared that the investment of the trust funds (being the sum of £9,658 2s. 8d.) was improper, and that C. H. Morgan, H. W. Smith, and P. W. Blyth were jointly and severally liable to make good any loss sustained by such investment, with interest on the said sum at the rate of £4 per centum per annum from the 13th of September, 1884, up to which date interest had been paid by the mortgagor, George Searle. And it was ordered they should pay to Mrs. Blyth the sum of £1,208 1s. as interest, less £257 0s. 7d. already paid to her. A sale out of court of the property comprised in the mortgages was ordered, and also that the plaintiffs, Mrs. Blyth and her two children, should have a charge on the said property.

This judgment had not yet been fully worked out. Some payments on account of interest were made to Mrs. Blyth, a portion of the property was sold (not on very advantageous terms), but for the greater part no bid was obtained on either of two occasions when it was offered for sale by public auction.

On the 12th of September, 1888, William Mark Fladgate died, and Helen Louisa Fladgate, widow

Maria Frances Fladgate, and William Francis Fladgate were his legal personal representatives.

The first action, Blyth v. Fladgate, was commenced on the 23rd of February, 1887, by Mrs. Blyth, and her daughter and son, Mary Ellen Blyth and Francis Ernest Blyth (the same plaintiffs as in Blyth v. Smith), against Helen Louisa Fladgate, Maria Frances Fladgate, and W. F. Fladgate, and Smith, Morgan, and P. W. Blyth, claiming a declaration that the estate of W. M. Fladgate, and that W. F. Fladgate personally, were liable to the payment of the sum of £9,658 2s. 8d. to the defendants Smith, Morgan, and P. W. Blyth as trustees of the settlement, with interest thereon.

The second action, Morgan v. Blyth, was commenced on the 9th of November, 1888, by Morgan, one of the trustees, against P. W. Blyth, W. F. Fladgate, and Smith, claiming, as trustee, (1) a declaration that the defendants Fladgate and Smith were jointly and severally liable to replace the sum of £9,658 5s., a part of the funds comprised in the settlement, and to indemnify the trust estate against all liabilities in respect of the investment; and (2), if necessary, execution of the trusts of the settlement; and, in his personal capacity, from the same defendants indemnity against all liabilities in respect of the investment, damages against the same defendants for negligence as his solicitors, and a declaration that he was entitled to be recouped out of the share of the defendant P. W. Blyth under the settlement in any sum which he might be called upon to pay in replacing the said sum of £9,658 5s., or in respect of costs in the action of Blyth v. Smith, and to be entitled to a lien on such share for such sum as aforesaid.

The third action, Smith v. Blyth, was commenced on the 20th of March, 1889, by Smith against P. W. Blyth, and claimed a declaration that P. W. Blyth, as trustee, was liable to contribute a proportion of all sums necessary to replace, pursuant to the judgment in Blyth v. Smith, the trust fund of £9,658 2s. 8d. and other liabilities arising out of the same matter; that the plaintiff was entitled to be recouped out of the beneficial interest of the defendant under the settlement; and, until so recouped, to a lien on such interest. A counter-claim was put in by P. W. Blyth against Smith, W. F. Fladgate, and the representatives of W. M. Fladgate, charging negligence against the firm of solicitors, Fladgate & Co., and claiming damages.

It was agreed that the shorthand writers' notes and the vivâ voce evidence in Blyth v. Smith and all documents put in in that action should be admitted in the present action.

Graham Hastings, Q.C., and R. C. Dobbs, for the plaintiffs.—Section 4 of the Trustee Act, 1888, does not apply, as the security was an improper one ab initio. The solicitors do not discharge themselves of the liability which they incurred by receiving money fixed with a trust. By so acting they are liable as trustees: Morgan v. Stephens, 3 Giff. 226, 9 W. R. Ch. Dig. 89.

Phipson Beale, Q.C., and L. H. Jenkins, for the defendant Morgan, supported the plaintiff's case.

Crackanthorpe, Q.C., and G. Farwell, for the legal personal representatives of Wm. Mark Fladgate and for W. F. Fladgate.—The Messrs. Fladgate took no part in the business and had no knowledge of any irregularity. Smith was the negligent party. Smith acted outside his business as a solicitor, and consequently could not implicate his partners, for he acted as a scrivener in receiving the money for investment generally. The Fladgates had, therefore, no notice of the trust: Lindley on Partnership, 5th ed., p. 142. In Blair v. Bromley, 2 Phill. 354, 5 Ha. 542, the solicitors were held severally liable, but the plaintiffs were their clients. The plaintiffs did not retain Messrs. Fladgate as their solicitors. The case of Morgan v. Stephens is different, for there the solicitors wilfully allowed an executrix to misappropriate money. Messrs. Fladgate have never received any money into their own hands, so cannot be liable as agents of the trustees: Barnes v. Addy, 22 W. R. 505, L. R. 9 Ch. App. 244; Harries v. Rees, 16 W. R. 91. [STIRLING, J., referred to Lindley on Partnership, 5th ed., p. 150.] The liability, if such exist, was joint, and a judgment has been given against Smith in respect of it, which is a bar to any action against Messrs. Fladgate: Kendall v. Hamilton, 28 W. R. 97, 4 App. Cas. 504; Ex parte Adamson, In re Collie, 26 W. R. 890, 8 Ch. D. 807; Cheetham v. Ward, 1 Bos. & P. 630; Nicholson v. Revill, 4 Ad. & E. 675, 6 N. & M. 192, 1 H. & W. 756; Co. Litt., ed. 1832, p. 232a; In re Hodgson, Beckett v. Ramsdale, 34 W. R. 127, 31 Ch. D. 177; Serrao v. Noel, 15 Q. B. D. 549, 34 W. R. Dig. 70; Cambefort v. Chapman, 35 W. R. 838, 19 Q. B. D. 229.

H. A. Giffard, Q.C., and A. Cass, for the defendant Smith.—These proceedings do not really affect Smith, as he has already been declared liable for the money.

Graham Hastings, Q.C., in reply.—All the partners had full notice through Smith. The mortgagor paying the costs by an arrangement does not affect the fact that the firm were acting as solicitors for the mortgagees. Kendall v. Hamilton has no application, for the liability is joint and several. Judgment has been recovered against Smith as a trustee, not as a solicitor, and that judgment does not release his partners as solicitors from the liability resulting from their negligence: In re Davison, Ex parte Chandler, 13 Q. B. D. 50, 32 W. R. Dig. 18; Blackwood v. Borrowes, 4 Dr. & War. 441, 475; In re Blundell, Blundell v. Blundell, 36 W. R. 779, 40 Ch. D. 370.

MORGAN v. BLYTH.

Beale, Q.C., and Jenkins, for the plaintiff.—The plaintiff relied wholly on Smith, the solicitor to the trust, to find a proper investment, he knew nothing of the nature of the security. Smith was guilty of negligence as solicitor, and the liability must fall upon him and his partners: Bahin v. Hughes, 34 W. R. 311, 31 Ch. D. 390; In re Partington, Partington v. Allen, 57 L. T. Rep. 654, 36 W. R. Dig. 210; Sawyer v. Goodwin, 24 W. R. 493, 1 Ch. D. 351. There was an agreement equivalent to a retainer, so the firm is liable for negligence in having received the trust money and having improperly invested it, and is bound to replace it: Bean v. Wade, 1 Times L. R. 404; Craig v. Watson, 8 Beav. 427; Blair v. Bromley; Morgan v. Stephens; Sawyer v. Goodwin; Dooby v. Watson, 36 W. R. 764. The firm accepted the position of solicitors to the mortgagees: Rigley v. Daykin, 2 Y. & J. 83. A person who takes part in dealing with the property of others is bound to act in a prudent manner, although he may be acting under a contract: Pollock, Law of Torts, 1st ed., pp. 353, 354. Smith is also liable, apart from his being the solicitor, by his representations to his co-trustees: Lockhart v. Reilly, 1 De G. & J. 464, 6 W. R. Ch. Dig. 90; Burrowes v. Lock, 10 Ves. 470; Cann v. Willson, 37 W. R. 23, 39 Ch. D. 39. The plaintiff is entitled to be recouped what he has to pay in replacing the trust money out of P. W. Blyth's share: Raby v. Ridehalgh, 3 W. R. 344, 7 De G. M. & G. 104.

Dobbs (Hastings, Q.C., with him), for the defendant P. W. Blyth.—In Raby v. Ridehalgh the cestuis que trustent had instigated the breach of trust. P. W.

Blyth only acquiesced in the investment. In that case the cestuis que trustent had to refund the benefit they had received from the breach of trust. P. W. Blyth has received nothing.

Crackanthorpe, Q.C., and Farwell, for W. F. Fladgate.—The firm was never instructed by Morgan, and did not act as the plaintiff's solicitors, their client was Philip Thomas Blyth. This is a quia timet action, for the plaintiff has as yet paid nothing under the judgment, and he cannot maintain it: Hughes-Hallett v. Indian Mammoth Gold Mines Co., 31 W. R. 285, 22 Ch. D. 561. [STIRLING, J.—A trustee is clearly entitled to an indemnity against losses sustained by him otherwise than by his own default, in the execution of his trust: Lindley on Partnership, 5th ed., 373, 374. A judgment has been recovered against these trustees. That is different from the case cited.] To make the firm liable, fraud must be proved, for a firm is not liable for the misrepresentation of one of the partners, unless such misrepresentation was fraudulent: Lindley on Partnership, 5th ed., 162, 163. No fraud has been proved against Smith. The cases cited do not apply. This investment was one of a proper class, and Morgan consented to it; the loss is owing to errors of judgment, so the money cannot be followed as if it were still in the possession of the firm.

Giffard, Q.C., and Cass, for the defendant Smith.—There was no relation of solicitor and client between Smith and Morgan. Smith was not really a solicitor, trustee. He could not charge profit costs, he did not manage the trust estate. Smith did not undertake to find a fit and proper investment. In Lockhart v. Reilly, In re Partington, and Thompson v. Finch, 8 De G. M. & G. 560, 5 W. R. Ch. Dig. 100, a trustee who was held entitled to indemnity against his solicitor co-trustee had been misled by him. Such is not the case here. It is not the ordinary business of a solicitor to receive money for purposes of investment generally: Harman v. Johnson, 1 W. R. 326, 2 E. & B. 61; Plumer v. Gregory, L. R. 18 Eq. 621. For that duty a special retainer is necessary. So Smith cannot be made liable for loss by reason of alleged negligence as a trustee. A solicitor who acts for trustees is not solicitor to the trust estate, for no such office exists, but to the trustees personally: Stanier v. Evans, 35 W. R. 286, 34 Ch. D. 470. When Smith took up the business there were no trustees, and those who have been subsequently appointed were not ascertained or capable at the time of the acts in question, so cannot ratify his acts so as to make him liable on them: Kelner v. Baxter, 15 W. R. 278, L. R. 2 C. P. 174; In re Northumberland Avenue Hotel Co., 33 Ch. D. 16, 35 W. R. Dig. 38; In re Empress Engineering Co., 29 W. R. 342, 16 Ch. D. 125; Wilson v. Tumman, 6 Man. & Gr. 236. There could be no retainer till the trustees came into existence.

Jenkins, in reply.—One of two trustees who have both been guilty of breach of trust can sue his co-trustee, so as to make him replace the trust fund: Baynard v. Woolley, 20 Beav. 583, 4 W. R. Ch. Dig. 99. [STIRLING, J., referred to Butler v. Butler, 26 W. R. 85, 7 Ch. D. 116.] The fact that the Fladgates' costs were paid by the mortgagor does not relieve them of liability as the solicitors of the trustees: Young v. Wallingford, 31 W. R. 838. The measure of damage sustained by us is the loss we have incurred, or are likely to incur, by reason of the negligence: Mayne on Damages, 4th ed., p. 442; Howell v. Young, 5 B. & C. 259. A trustee who commits a breach of trust with the approbation of the cestuis que trustent is entitled to indemnity out of the estate of the person consenting to it: Trafford v. Boehm, 3 Atk. 440, 444.

He also referred to Wood v. Braddick, 1 Taun. 104; Pritchard v. Draper, 1 Russ. & M. 191; Sharland v. Mildon, 5 Ha. 469.

SMITH v. BLYTH.

Giffard, Q.C., and A. Cass, for Smith.—Smith has made payments on account of interest to Mrs. Blyth out of his own moneys, and may have to pay more. He is entitled to contribution.

Graham Hastings, Q.C., and R. C. Dobbs, for P. W. Blyth, a defendant in the action, and on the counter-claim.—Smith cannot now claim contribution, if at all. The security has not been realized. He cannot set up any right over P. W. Blyth's share any more than Morgan. [Upon the counter-claim the argument was to the same effect as in Morgan v. Blyth.] As to the Statute of Limitations the principle of Howell v. Young applies.

They also referred to Priddy v. Rose, 3 Mer. 6.

Giffard, Q.C., and Cass, for Smith, upon the counter-claim.

Crackanthorpe, Q.C., and Farwell, for W. F. Fladgate and the representatives of W. M. Fladgate.

Giffard, Q.C., replied for Smith in the action.

Hastings, Q.C., on the counter-claim, replied.

Cur. adv. vult.

BLYTH v. FLADGATE.

STIRLING, J. (after stating the facts and reading and referring to the letters and documents, the effect of which has been above stated, proceeded:—) Mr. Smith appears to have pronounced, from the letter of the 23rd of November, 1883, against the security, on three grounds—(1) the depressed state of the property; (2) the large amount of ground-rent; (3) the inadequate proportion of the value of the property to the amount sought to be advanced; and in my opinion every one of these objections was well founded. [His lordship then referred to the pleadings, and continued:—] Upon the admissions in the pleadings Messrs. Fladgate admit (1) that the exchequer bills were in the custody of the firm, (2) that all the partners knew or were affected with knowledge that these bills formed part of the funds subject to the trusts of the settlement, (3) that the bills were sold by order of the firm, and the proceeds placed to the account of the firm at their bankers. The trust funds, therefore, came into the custody and under the control of the firm with notice of the trusts on which they were held, and as against the plaintiffs it lies with the firm to discharge themselves by showing that the funds were duly applied in accordance with the trust. This Messrs. Fladgate attempt to do by saying that the funds were paid over to Searle by direction of the trustees of the settlement on the security of mortgages of real estate, a mode of investment which was within the power of the trustees, and of the impropriety of which they had no notice. It is to be observed that, at the date of the payment to Searle, Smith, Blyth, and Morgan had not been appointed trustees, and that neither the investment of the funds in their names nor the application of them by their direction could, in the first instance, be a discharge to the firm. Smith, Blyth, and Morgan were, however, shortly afterwards appointed trustees, and never repudiated the transaction or disclaimed any interest under the mortgage deeds, and under these circumstances it is contended (and I think rightly) that they must be treated as having sanctioned the application of the funds.

That sanction, however, would not avail the partners in the firm of Fladgate, Smith, & Fladgate if they had knowledge or notice that the investment was one which could not properly be made by duly constituted trustees. It is admitted that neither William Mark Fladgate nor William Francis Fladgate had any actual knowledge of the nature of the security taken for the advance made to Searle, but it is contended that each of them was affected with notice through their partner Smith, to whom the whole of the facts were known. This point requires careful consideration. As I have already said, the matter was brought before Smith by Philip Thomas Blyth, who, by his letter of the 8th of October, 1883, asks Smith to "look into this and see whether this money can be safely lent on it." This letter was addressed to Smith as a member of the firm of Fladgate, Smith, & Fladgate, and it is clear from the contemporaneous letter of Pocock that the advance was to be made by trustees, and consequently that what he was asked to do was to advise whether the security was a safe one for trustees, a matter which falls within the scope of a solicitor's ordinary duties. Smith, as a member of the firm, proceeded to investigate the nature of the security, and ultimately placed himself in communication with Searle's solicitors, received and perused the abstracts of title, made requisitions thereon, and prepared the securities (which were made to himself, Blyth, and Morgan, the intended new trustees of the settlement), and saw to their due execution by the mortgagor. In all this he was acting within the scope of his authority as a partner in the firm of Fladgate, Smith, & Fladgate, and for the work done by Smith as such partner, the firm received payment by deducting (in pursuance of an arrangement made with Searle, the mortgagor) the sum of £115 14s. 7d. from the money advanced to Searle, which passed through their hands. Smith, therefore, while acting as a member of the firm, became acquainted with the nature of the security in which the money under the control of the firm, and known by the firm to be a trust fund, was advanced, and the knowledge so acquired by Smith must, as it seems to me, be imputed to the other partners, whose agent he was for the purpose of dealing with this trust fund under their control. I think, therefore, that these other partners must be taken to have had notice that the security was not of a character suitable for the investment of trust funds, and was one which the trustees of the settlement could not properly sanction as an investment of the funds in the custody of the firm. The partners were consequently implicated in the breach of trust which was committed.

It was next contended on behalf of the partners that the liability was a joint liability only, and that, as judgment had been recovered against their copartner Smith, they were discharged, and Kendall v. Hamilton was cited on this point. To this the answer is that the liability arising out of a breach of trust is not joint merely, but joint and several: see Wilson v. Moore, 1 Myl. & K. 127, 337. It was, however, said that even if this were so, the judgment against Smith operated as a discharge of the joint and several liability, on the principle laid down in Cheetham v. Ward and Nicholson v. Revill. This principle, however, does not apply to the case of a judgment recovered against one of several joint and several debtors. The law is thus stated by Bayley, B., in Lechmere v. Fletcher, at p. 635 of 1 Cr. & M.:—"There are many cases in the books as to joint and several bonds (Whitacres v. Hamkinson, Cro. Car. 75; Higgins' case, 6 Rep. 45) from which it appears that, though you have entered judgment on a joint and several bond against one obligor, you are still at liberty to sue the other, unless, indeed, the judgment has been satisfied; but so long as any part of the demand remains due you are at liberty to sue the other, notwithstanding you have obtained judgment against one. This, I think, establishes the principle that where there is a joint obligation, and a separate one also, you do not, by recovering judgment against one, preclude yourself from suing the other." This statement of the law is recognized by Parke, B., in King v. Hoare.

Lastly, the defendants claimed the benefit of the Trustee Act, 1888, s. 4 (1). To this the answer is that the trustees were not charged with a breach of trust "by reason only of the proportion borne by the amount of the loan to the value of such property at the time when the loan was made." They were so charged because the security was (in the language of Lord Watson in Learoyd v. Whiteley, 36 W. R. 721, 12 App. Cas. 727, see p. 733) one of a "class which is attended with hazard." The property was situated in a new neighbourhood, and its future was uncertain. The mortgagor himself admitted it was "under a cloud." Many of the houses were unlet, there was a heavy groundrent payable, and as Smith pointed out it was possible that the rents might be insufficient to keep down the accruing interest. In Blyth v. Smith the defendant Smith admitted, on his cross-examination, that, apart from its deficiency in value, he was satisfied it was not a first-class security, not a desirable one for trustees.

In my opinion William Francis Fladgate and the estate of William Mark Fladgate are severally liable to make good the loss occasioned by the investment of the trust fund on such improper security, and the judgment will contain a declaration to that effect. As regards the rest, I feel that the case is in some respects a hard one, and I am willing that the order should be framed so as to press as lightly as may be on the defendants; but two years have elapsed since the judgment in Blyth v. Smith, and it seems to me that the property comprised in the mortgage ought to be at once realized, and the deficiency be made good. An order for that purpose must be made. As regards the costs, I thought the circumstances were such that the defendants to the action of Blyth v. Smith, of whom Smith was one, ought not to be fixed with costs. If I was right (and I think I was) in coming to that conclusion, then it seems to me that I ought not in this action to hold Smith's more innocent partners liable for costs. I therefore propose to make no order as to the costs of this action, but the plaintiffs will be at liberty to apply in the action of Blyth v. Smith for payment of their costs out of the trust funds when replaced. If the legal personal representatives of Mark William Fladgate do not admit assets, there must be the usual order for administration of their testator's estate.

MORGAN v. BLYTH.

This is an action of a different kind. [His lordship referred to and read parts of the pleadings.] One main question raised by these pleadings is whether the relation of solicitor and client subsisted between the plaintiff Morgan and the firm of Fladgate, Smith, & Fladgate. It is quite plain that no formal or express retainer was ever given by him to them, but this is not necessary, for although no such express retainer has been given, the relation may subsist, and its existence may be inferred from the acts of the parties. If authority for this proposition be required it is sufficient to refer to the decision of the Court of Appeal in Bean v. Wade.

It was agreed between the parties that the evidence adduced in Blyth v. Smith should be used also in this action, and accordingly in this action no witnesses were examined vivâ voce. In dealing with the question to which I have just referred I think it best to commence by referring to the evidence of Smith, the only member of the firm who was called. I may remark, in the first place, that he distinctly stated in his examination in chief that whatever he did as solicitor with reference to the investment of the money he did as a partner in the firm of Fladgate & Co. Now the matter was first brought before him on the 9th of October, 1883, by Philip Thomas Blyth by the letter which I have already read. It is to me quite plain that what he was asked to do was to advise whether the proposed advance was one which trustees could properly make, and it was to this that he directed his attention. The contemporary entry made by Smith in his journal was under the heading "P. T. Blyth's Trustees," and under the like heading all subsequent entries relating to the advance are placed. These include one relating to an interview between Smith and Morgan on the 7th of March, 1884, in these terms:—"Attending Mr. Morgan, giving him full information as to the nature of the security; and he wished to have twenty-four hours' notice to consider the matter, and proposed to give us his decision by Monday morning." Now until after the advance was made there were no trustees such as are referred to in those entries. In his examination in chief Smith was asked: "On whose retainer, and by whose instructions, were you acting throughout?" Answer: "The person I looked to for instructions was Mr. Philip Thomas Blyth." Question: "Did your firm receive instructions from anyone else in the matter of the sale and investment?" Answer: "No." It is not to my mind insignificant that Smith avoided saying on whose retainer he acted. At the same time it is right to say that in some of his letters he plainly refers to Philip Thomas Blyth as his client in the matter. On the other hand, in a letter written a short time after he had called Philip Thomas Blyth's attention to the necessity of appointing new trustees of the settlement, he refers to "clients" in the plural. There can be no doubt that it was on behalf of the mortgagees that Messrs. Fladgate purported to act. The mortgagor was represented by separate solicitors. It was made a term of the advance that the fees of Fladgate, Smith, & Fladgate (in accordance with a very prevalent custom) be deducted from the advance. Those fees were due to Messrs. Fladgate for work done on behalf of the mortgagees, and in respect of them a deduction was made from the sum advanced to the mortgagor. Further, care was taken (as is shown by the correspondence) to avoid as far as possible the necessity of recourse for payment to any person on whose behalf Messrs. Fladgate could be supposed to be acting. From this portion of the evidence I come to the conclusion that the matter was in the first instance taken up by Smith and his firm without any authority or retainer, in the expectation that his and their acts would be taken advantage of by persons clothed with due authority to deal with the funds to be invested, and that their services would be rewarded by a payment either out of the advance, in accordance with a usual custom, or if necessary out of the trust funds. I next turn to the evidence of Morgan, the plaintiff in the action, on which the defendant's counsel most properly placed great reliance. [His lordship read parts of the evidence given by Morgan as to his relations with the firm, and proceeded:—]

It is to be remembered that when this evidence was given Morgan was disputing his liability to the cestuis que trustent in respect of the trust funds, a point which has now been decided against him. I think that his denials of authority given to Smith and the Messrs. Fladgate to act for him are not to be pressed too far. He certainly never gave them any express authority, but it still remains to be considered what obligations arise out of any implied authority which he gave them. He knew that Messrs. Fladgate had been acting with reference to the proposed mortgage, and that as he said, "The mortgage and everything, were all prepared before I gave my consent at all. It was only waiting for my signature and consent to become a trustee." No man of business, no sensible man, could suppose that Messrs. Fladgate's services were given gratuitously. It was with this knowledge that Morgan consented to become a trustee, and authorized the mortgage to be carried out. Now, the law as to implied obligations is discussed by Bowen, L.J., in Falcke v. Scottish Imperial Insurance Co., 35 W. R. 143, 34 Ch. D. 234. [His lordship referred to the argument of counsel for the respondents in that case, and to the judgment of Bowen, L.J.] In my opinion, the facts in the present case justify the inference that there was an implied contract on the part of Morgan that Messrs. Fladgate should be paid. It is not necessary, as I think, that the contract should be for payment by him personally; a trustee or executor may retain a solicitor upon the terms that he is to look only to the estate for repayment. The just conclusion from the facts in the present case appears to me to be that Morgan directed Messrs. Fladgate to advance the funds in their hands to Searle, upon the terms arranged between them and Searle, including the stipulation that the work done by Messrs. Fladgate should be paid for by means of a deduction from the advance. If this view is correct it follows that the cases of Kelner v. Baxter and Scott v. Lord Ebury, 15 W. R. 517, L. R. 2 C. P. 255, which were relied on in argument, have no application.

In both those cases the defendants were sued on contracts which they had purported to enter into as agents for non-existing principals, and it was held that the defendants were personally liable, on the ground that the contract they had entered into could not be adopted or ratified by a person not ascertained at the time of the act done. Here no contract has been entered into by Messrs. Fladgate as agents for anyone; the question is not whether Morgan is bound by some act purported to be done by Messrs. Fladgate on behalf of the non-existent trustees of the settlement, but whether he has impliedly entered into an agreement with Messrs. Fladgate as to services rendered by them of which he and his co-trustees have had the benefit.

I come to the conclusion, therefore, that Messrs. Fladgate were retained to act as solicitors for Morgan and his co-mortgagees, and I proceed to inquire whether any breach of duty is chargeable against them.

Now (as appears from the letters of the 8th of October, 1883) it was known from the very first that the proposed advance was to be made by trustees, and Smith in fact took on himself the duty of advising whether that advance was one which could properly be made out of trust funds. How is such a duty to be discharged by the person who undertakes it? A trustee may not delegate the execution of the trust; all that he is entitled to do is to avail himself of the services of others in the usual course of business. It is, therefore, the duty of the solicitor not so much himself to form or express an opinion on the value of the property offered to a trustee as security for an advance (though the law does not prohibit him from so doing, if he thinks fit), as to see that the trustee has before him the proper materials for forming a judgment thereon. He ought, therefore, not only to see that the trustee has before him proper valuations of the property, and that he is made acquainted with any facts known to the solicitors, and not actually appearing by the valuation, which may affect the value of the property, but that his attention is directed to any rules laid down by the courts for the guidance of trustees with reference to such matters. In my judgment Smith entirely omitted to call the attention of Morgan to the rules laid down by the court for the guidance of trustees, and in this respect he failed in his duty. That such rules exist, is shown by the cases of Learoyd v. Whiteley and Priest and Uppleby, 38 W. R. 150, 42 Ch. D. 351. [His lordship read the earlier part of the judgment of Lord Watson in Learoyd v. Whiteley.] To such rules, therefore, it would be the duty of the solicitor to call the attention of the trustee he was advising. Further, I think that the evidence shows that he omitted to bring to Morgan's attention matters known to him which materially affected the value of the property as a security; as for instance, the fact that the property was in a depressed condition.

It has been seen that down to the 23rd of November Smith advised against the security. The only ground he had for altering his opinion he states to have been from what Philip Thomas Blyth told him: "He seemed to think, and I did too, that Mr. Sanders had spoken rather severely against the property." [His lordship read portions of the evidence at length.] I come to the conclusion that Smith, and through him the firm of Messrs. Fladgate, Smith, & Fladgate, failed to discharge the duty which he and they had undertaken towards Morgan; and that Smith and William Francis Fladgate, the surviving members of the firm, are liable for negligence.

It was contended, however, that if this were so the action was premature, as up to the present time the plaintiff Morgan has suffered no damage, and for this, the case of Hughes-Hallett v. Indian Mammoth Gold Mining Co. was relied on. That was, however, simply an action for indemnity arising out of an obligation to indemnify against calls in respect of shares standing in the plaintiff's name. The company in which the shares were held had been ordered to be wound up, but there was no evidence to show whether calls were likely to be made in the winding up. The action was dismissed, on the ground that it was merely a quia timet one. Here the cestuis que trustent under the settlement have brought an action against Morgan, and have recovered judgment against him, though they have not enforced it. I do not think that under these circumstances the action can be treated merely as a quia timet one, and consequently the ground of the decision referred to, fails. Further, the action in that case was founded on an obligation to indemnify, here the action is founded on a breach of duty on the part of solicitors. Between the two classes of actions there is a great difference. In an action for indemnity time does not begin to run until the party entitled to the indemnity has made a payment: Collinge v. Heywood, 9 Ad. & Ell. 633. On the other hand, in an action for negligence time begins to run from the date of the act complained of, and runs from the date of that act until the expiration of six years from its commission: Howell v. Young, 5 B. & C. 259; and with respect to the damages recoverable, the law is laid down by Holroyd, J., at p. 268: "So here, if the action had been brought immediately after the insufficient security had been taken, the jury would have been bound to give damages for the probable loss which the plaintiff was likely to sustain from the invalidity of the security."

I am of opinion that Smith and William Francis Fladgate, as the surviving members of the firm of Fladgate, Smith, & Fladgate, are liable for the negligence of Smith, and that there must be an inquiry as to the damages sustained by Morgan by reason of such negligence. It remains still to be considered whether the other relief claimed ought to be granted. As regards paragraph 1 of the claim, Messrs. Fladgate, Smith, & Fladgate have no longer the trust fund in their hands. They have paid it to the mortgagor Searle, or to his use, by the direction of the mortgagees, of whom the plaintiff Morgan is one. I fail to see how they can at Morgan's instance be required to replace the fund.

Again, by paragraph 6, Morgan claims a declaration that he is entitled to be recouped out of the beneficial interest of his co-trustee, Philip William Blyth, any sum paid or to be paid by him in replacing the trust fund, or for the costs of Blyth v. Smith, and to a charge for the same on the said beneficial interest. This relief is sought on the authority of Raby v. Ridehalgh, where it was held that trustees who had made an improper investment at the instance and request of cestuis que trustent were entitled to recover, against the cestuis que trustent who instigated the breach, the benefit actually received by them in consequence of such breach of trust. In the present case that authority seems inapplicable. Philip William Blyth's interest in the trust fund is entirely reversionary; he has not received any part of it, he has derived no benefit from the breach of trust. Further, he does not appear to me to have instigated the breach of trust in the sense in which that expression is used in the judgment of Turner, L.J., in Raby v. Ridehalgh. What he did was to acquiesce as Morgan did himself, in an investment really instigated by Philip Thomas Blyth. Equally with Morgan he neglected his duty as trustee with reference to the investment. The case of Bahin v. Hughes shows that one of two trustees liable for a breach of trust is not entitled to an indemnity from the other unless there are special circumstances. In the present case there are no circumstances which would entitle Morgan to throw the liability for the breach of trust on Philip William Blyth. Doubtless, it is possible that questions of contribution may hereafter arise between them, but at present Morgan has paid nothing in respect of his liability, nor has he since been called to pay anything; and in this respect the action appears to me to be premature.

Further, it seems to me probable that these rights might be adjusted by means of the proceedings in Blyth v. Smith; but in case any doubt exists as to that, I am willing, if the plaintiff desires it, to reserve to him liberty to apply with reference to any question of contribution or otherwise which may arise between him and Philip William Blyth, but this ought not to affect Philip William Blyth's right to costs.

I propose, therefore, to direct an inquiry what is the amount of damage which has been occasioned to the plaintiff by the negligence of the firm of Fladgate Smith, & Fladgate, and to order that the amount of such damage, when ascertained, be paid by the defendants Smith and William Francis Fladgate. There will be liberty for the plaintiff to apply as to any question of contribution which may arise between him and the defendant Philip William Blyth. The plaintiff's costs of the action must be borne by the defendants Smith and Fladgate. The plaintiff must pay the costs of Philip William Blyth.

SMITH v. BLYTH.

This, the third action, is one by Smith against his co-trustee, Philip Wm. Blyth, for contribution. It is met by a counter-claim on the part of Philip Wm. Blyth against Smith, Wm. Francis Fladgate, and the representatives of Wm. Mark Fladgate, alleging that the firm of Fladgate, Smith, & Fladgate acted as solicitors for the mortgagees, and were guilty of negligence, and seeking relief on that footing.

This raises a question as to whether the relation of solicitor and client existed between the firm and Philip Wm. Blyth similar to which I have already dealt with in the action of Morgan v. Blyth. It is necessary, however, to consider it separately, because in this action the evidence is somewhat different. Philip Wm. Blyth was called as a witness. He said he saw Smith on one or two occasions before he executed the deed appointing him trustee, one of these being in the latter part of November or the beginning of December, 1883. On that occasion (according to his evidence in chief) he "was silent or comparatively so." Another interview took place on the 13th of April, 1884, when Philip Wm. Blyth signed the deed appointing himself trustee. He then describes what took place. [His lordship referred to the evidence]. On cross-examination on behalf of the Fladgates he continues to describe himself as "comparatively silent," when he saw Smith on the first two occasions, but on cross-examination on behalf of Smith he gave evidence from which it appears that he maintains that he gave express instructions that the proposed security should be looked into by Messrs. Fladgate on his behalf. Having heard his evidence I am bound to say that I feel considerable doubt whether in this respect it can be relied upon. I do not attribute to Mr. Blyth the intention of wilfully misleading the court, but I think it very possible that his memory may have misled him in speaking of matters which occurred upwards of six years ago, and which has since formed the subject of much discussion and controversy in more than one legal proceeding to which Mr. Blyth has been a party. I, therefore, do not rest my judgment on this part of Mr. Blyth's evidence. Smith was again called, and gave evidence similar to that given by him in Blyth v. Smith. He stated, as to the entries in the journal, that the heading did not necessarily indicate the client; that I am quite prepared to believe. He further said, that if the mortgage had not gone through, it would have been a matter of grave consideration who would have been charged. That seems to me to confirm the view which I have already expressed as to the circumstances under which the business was undertaken by Messrs. Fladgate.

It appears to me that Philip William Blyth was well aware that Messrs. Fladgate were making investigations into the nature and value of the security, and that in his case, no less than in that of Morgan, the facts are such as to justify the inference that there was an implied contract that Messrs. Fladgate should be paid for their services.

I come, therefore, to the conclusion that Smith, having been guilty of negligence as solicitor to Philip William Blyth, cannot claim from him any contribution in respect of the liabilities imposed by the judgment in Blyth v. Smith (see Lockhart v. Reilly, 1 De G. & J. 464), and, further, that Philip William Blyth is entitled to relief similar to that which I have held ought to be given to Morgan. It is however to be observed that Philip William Blyth seeks relief, not only (like Morgan) against Smith and William Francis Fladgate, but also against the representatives of William Mark Fladgate, and it may be right that I should express my views on that part of the case. If the claim of Philip William Blyth be considered to arise ex delicto, the maxim actio personalis moritur cum personâ affords an answer on the part of the legal personal representatives of the dead partner, William Mark Fladgate. The claim may, however, be regarded as arising ex contractu, and as founded on an implied promise on the part of the firm to exercise reasonable care and skill in the performance of their duties as solicitors of the plaintiff in the counter-claim. At law, previously to the Judicature Acts, declarations in actions against solicitors for negligence were frequently framed on this principle of assumpsit, as appears from Bullen and Leake's Pleadings, 3rd ed., p. 83; and Sawyer v. Goodwin, 36 L. J. Ch. 578, is a decision in equity founded upon it. The contracts of partners are at law joint contracts, not joint and several, as is shown by the case of Kendall v. Hamilton, and consequently, if an action at law were brought, Smith and William Francis Fladgate would be the proper defendants. It appears, however, from what is laid down in the case just cited, and from the decision of the Court of Appeal in In re Hodgson, Beckett v. Ramsdale, that in equity a creditor of the firm has a remedy against the estate of a deceased partner, a remedy which was actually applied in the case of Sawyer v. Goodwin, arising out of a breach of duty on the part of a firm of solicitors. In my opinion, therefore, the legal personal representatives of William Mark Fladgate are properly made defendants to the counter-claim, and his estate is liable for the amount of damages which may be found due to Philip William Blyth. If the executors do not admit assets, there must be judgment for administration on the basis of the form adopted in Hills v. McRae, 9 Hare, 297, and In re Hodgson, Beckett v. Ramsdale.

The result is that the action of Smith v. Blyth must be dismissed, with costs. On the counter-claim there will be an inquiry as to damages similar to that directed in Morgan v. Blyth, and an order for payment of the amount, when ascertained, by Smith, William Francis Fladgate, and the executors of William Mark Fladgate, by whom the costs of the counter-claim must be paid.

BURT v. GRAY. (a.)

Landlord and tenant—Forfeiture—Breach of covenant—Application for relief by underlessee against lessor—Underlease of part of premises—Conveyancing Act, 1881 (44 & 45 Vict. c. 41), s. 14.

An underlessee, whether of the whole or a part of the premises comprised in a lease, is not entitled to apply for relief under section 14 of the Conveyancing Act, 1881, as against the lessor.

Application for relief under section 14 of the Conveyancing Act, 1881.

The action was brought by the assignees of the lessor of twenty-four houses to recover possession thereof under a proviso for re-entry on breach of the lessee's covenant to repair. Originally, the sole defendant was the lessee; but, the property having been underlet in three lots, the three underlessees were joined as defendants.

One of the underlessees, whose underlease comprised eight houses, all of which were in good repair, applied at chambers for relief under section 14 of the Conveyancing Act, 1881.

A. L. Smith, J., referred the matter to the court.

A. B. P. Gaskell, for the applicant.—By section 14 of the Conveyancing Act, 1881, sub-section 1, a right of re-entry or forfeiture under any proviso in a lease for breach of any covenant is not to be enforceable until the lessee has received notice of the breach complained of, and has had an opportunity of remedying or making compensation for the same. By sub-section 2, where a lessor is proceeding by action or otherwise to enforce such a right of re-entry or forfeiture, the lessor may apply to the court for relief. And by sub-section 3, for the purposes of this section a lease includes an original or derivative underlease, and a lessee includes an original or derivative underlessee. The effect of sub-section 3 is that an underlessee is as much entitled to apply for relief against the lessor as the original lessee would be. Neither does it make any difference that he is underlessee of only a part of the premises included in the original lease. The underlessee of one part of the premises may be liable to have his underlease determined by re-entry by the original lessor for a breach of covenant committed on another part, and that liability is not affected by the Conveyancing Act: Cresswell v. Davidson, 56 L. T. N. S. 811, 35 W. R. Dig. 110. The intention of the section clearly is that where an underlessee is so liable, he is entitled to apply for relief. [VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J.—The effect of that construction would be that where the premises comprised in a lease were underlet in two parts, and an order for relief was made in favour of one underlessee and refused in the case of the other, the lease would be put an end to in respect of one part of the premises, while it would still subsist as to the other part.]

McIntyre, for the plaintiffs.—An underlessee is not entitled to apply for relief under the section as against the lessor. The case of Cresswell v. Davidson is in favour of the plaintiffs on that point. There Kay, J., expressed the opinion that the section did not apply to the lessee of a lessee. The words in sub-section 3 are to be read distributively, that is to say, "lessee" in sub-section 2 is to mean original underlessee in the case of an underlease, and derivative underlessee in the case of a derivative underlease. [VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J.—Your argument is that the Act was not intended to create a privity where there was none before, but to grant relief where there was privity already.]

MATHEW, J.—I am of opinion that this appeal must be dismissed. There are two objections to the order which has been asked for. I agree with the construction which has been put upon sub-section 3 by Kay, J., in the case cited. I do not think the Act was intended to create a privity of contract between lessor and sub-lessee, or that it in any way affects their relation to one another. Then the other point argued was that a lease includes a sub-lease of part of the premises, and a lessee includes sub-lessee of a part. But such a construction would lead to a most inconvenient result; for, if an order granting relief were made in favour of the sub-lessee of one part of the premises comprised in the lease, the subject-matter of the lease would be dislocated. It is enough to say that the Act does not say that sub-lessee means sub-lessee of a part.

Q. B. Div. (Cave and Vaughan Williams, JJ.) Jan. 20.

Ex parte JENKINS.
In re JENKINS. (a.)

Bankruptcy—Discharge—Absolute refusal—Rash and hazardous speculations—Stock Exchange transactions—Gambling for differences—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), s. 28.

On application by the bankrupt for discharge, the official receiver reported that the bankrupt had been guilty of rash and hazardous speculations in buying on the Stock Exchange for clients who were speculating for the differences, and had no intention of making bonâ fide investments, and that the bankruptcy was caused by such clients not paying up their differences at the time, owing to sudden and heavy falls in the markets in which the operations were carried on. The discharge of the bankrupt was absolutely refused by the county court judge, on the ground that to buy for a client who was intending to pay or receive the differences was a transaction of a more rash and hazardous nature than to buy for one who was intending to take up and pay for the shares, and that contracts for differences were in themselves immoral.

Held, on appeal, that the risk of a purchase by a stockbroker for a client did not depend upon whether the bargain was a bargain for differences or whether it was a purchase for investment, but upon whether the client had the means to pay the differences which might be expected to result; that it was not the duty of the Bankruptcy Court to take into consideration the general morality of transactions for differences; and that, having regard to the particular facts, the case would be sufficiently met by a suspension of the discharge for three years.

Appeal against an order of his Honour Judge Heywood in the county court at Manchester, absolutely refusing an order of discharge.

In September, 1886, the bankrupt commenced business as a stockbroker at Manchester, and in January, 1889, one E. H. Roylance, who had previously been an engineer, joined him in partnership, the business being so carried on down to the date of the receiving order against the firm, which was made in April, 1890.

On application by the bankrupts for their discharge the official receiver reported that the bankrupts had been guilty of rash and hazardous speculations, it being alleged that the bulk of their business consisted of gambling on the Stock Exchange on behalf of clients who were simply speculating for the differences and had no intention of making bonâ fide investments; and that the bankruptcy was caused by such clients not paying up their differences at the time, owing to sudden and heavy falls in the markets in which the operations were carried on at the end of February, 1890. It was, however, pointed out that the bankrupt Jenkins appeared to be more blameworthy than Roylance, the latter having been little more than a cypher in the business.

The county court judge suspended the discharge of the bankrupt Roylance for one year, but the discharge of the bankrupt Jenkins was refused absolutely.

The bankrupt Jenkins now appealed.

E. C. Willis, Q.C., for the bankrupt.—The firm of which the bankrupt was a member had several clients, and there was a heavy fall in South African Stock, by which they lost £20,000. The only speculative action was in not selling and closing the contracts earlier than they did, believing their clients would be able to pay. There was no speculation on their own account. The bankruptcy was caused by a sudden run. The bankrupt is doubtless deserving of some punishment, but here the punishment is too great for the offence. The county court judge was influenced by his idea of the morality of the transactions. The case falls within the principle laid down by this court in the case of In re Rankin, Ex parte Rankin (5 Morrell's Bankruptcy Cases, 23), that if the highest punishment is imposed for an offence like this, what can the court possibly do in a worse case.

Muir Mackenzie, for the official receiver.—The true ground on which the judgment of the county court judge ought to be supported is that the entering into these transactions without capital, and without ascertaining that the persons the bankrupt represented could pay was a rash and hazardous speculation. [CAVE, J.—There was doubtless a rash and hazardous speculation. The real question is whether the punishment was a proper one. If the discharge is absolutely refused for an offence of this kind, what is to be done when the offence is much worse?] When one of the offences in section 28 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, is of a very serious character it is not too much to absolutely refuse the discharge.

CAVE, J.—The order of the county court must be modified. In the first place the county court judge bases his decision upon the ground that it is more risky and more hazardous to buy for a client who is intending to pay or receive the differences, as the case may be, than it is to buy for a client who is intending to take up the shares and pay for them. I cannot see how that can be made out. Whether it is risky at all depends entirely upon whether the client has the means to pay the difference which may be expected to result or has not. If he has the means of paying that difference, then it is absolutely unimportant whether the bargain is a bargain for differences or whether it is a purchase for investment. The only thing the broker makes himself liable for is the difference, and he can never be called upon in either case to pay more than the difference. So that the question of hazardous speculation does not in the least depend upon whether it is a purchase with an intention on the part of the client to take or pay the difference, or whether it is a purchase with an intention on the part of the client to take up the shares. It depends entirely upon the probability that the client will be able to pay the amount of the difference which it may not unreasonably be thought possible will occur, and if he is able beyond all question to pay any difference which is at all likely to occur, then it is impossible to say that it is a rash and hazardous speculation on the part of the broker to buy the shares for him.

The second ground upon which the county court judge bases his decision apparently, is that contracts for differences are immoral, and that it is the duty of the court to discourage them. Now I very much doubt whether that is at all the duty of the Bankruptcy Court, to punish, that is to say, one particular person because a particular class of transactions is thought by the learned judge to be an immoral one. It is not illegal in any sense to go and buy shares for a client on the Stock Exchange with the knowledge that he means to pay only the differences, and with the certainty that if he cannot pay the difference you will be called upon to do so. That is not at all illegal, and I do not think the court has anything to do with the general morality of transactions for differences. Of course, if it could be shown that the particular debtor whose conduct is under consideration had bought on the Stock Exchange to a very large extent for some person whom he must have known could not have paid, and who, if he lost, might possibly be tempted to resort to illegitimate means of attempting to satisfy the claims upon him. If, for instance, he were buying largely for a person whom he knew to have no other means except his salary or wages, or if he were inducing an infant or a person of weak mind to gamble by giving him advice or anything of that kind; all that is perfectly legitimate matter to be looked into and inquired into, and it would have to be seen how far it affected the case of the individual debtor whose case was before the court. But because this kind of thing may be done by other persons, that, therefore, a man who is not shown to have done it at all himself is to be punished with the notion that you are thereby striking a blow at gambling in general, does not seem to me to be at all a legitimate mode of wielding the powers which are conferred upon the court.

Now as far as I can judge those seem to me to be the whole of the grounds upon which the county court judge has come to the conclusion that this debtor ought not to have his discharge. I entirely disagree with those grounds, and I must therefore look for myself and see what it is that this particular man has done, and to what extent it is shown by the report or by the evidence that was before the county court judge that his transactions were rash and hazardous. I think he has not sufficiently explained the fact that he entered into transactions which might not unnaturally eventuate in his becoming liable for a sum larger than he was able to pay; and when a man does enter into a transaction which may have such a result as that, it seems to me that he is indulging in a rash and hazardous speculation. He bought shares which might be expected to fall, and in point of fact did fall, and fall to an extent which he was not able to meet unless his clients were able themselves to pay. If the result of what he did had been that the bonâ fide creditors, tradesmen, and others to whom the bankrupt was indebted had lost their money, I should have taken a more serious view of this matter, as being a case in which the man had been gambling practically with the money of other people. But in the present case the list of unsecured creditors shows very few debts to creditors of that description. The great bulk of the debts are owing to stockbrokers, with regard to whom I do not feel quite the same feeling. They know perfectly well when they are dealing with a man of this class that he ought to have a cover; but they know also pretty well that according to the prevailing practice—which is to be regretted I admit—but still according to the prevailing practice he probably will not, in his hurry to get business, ask for sufficient cover.

I do not want to put too low the offence of which this man has been guilty, because, undoubtedly, it has ended in his becoming indebted to a very considerable extent; and although I am not disposed to take so very severe a view of his not having obtained cover, yet it must not be taken that one approves of that course. He ought, if he is carrying on his business in a careful and proper manner, to ascertain that his clients are able to take up or pay for the differences which may go against them upon their Stock Exchange operations; or if he is not satisfied of that he ought to obtain from them cover, and as long as he does that he will not run the risk of being unable to pay the differences and of becoming a bankrupt. The result is, in fact, due to his own careless manner of carrying on his business, and that is a thing which deserves punishment. The case might, however, be much more grave than it is. It really reduces itself to a case of trading with some degree of recklessness and want of caution, and I think that will be sufficiently punished by the suspension of the order of discharge for three years from the date of adjudication.

Divorce.

WITT v. WITT. (a.)

Divorce—Custody of children—Innocent wife—Order for custody — Subsequent misconduct — Husband leading moral life—Order for change of custody—General principles.

No hard and fast rule can be laid down as to custody of children, but in every case the court is bound to do what it conceives to be best for their interests.

A wife, on a decree absolute for dissolution of the marriage with her husband for his adultery being made, obtained an order for the custody of the children, including a daughter aged eleven, who was the only child given up to her under the order. Subsequently she lived in the same house with a young man on such intimate terms that the registrar inferred immorality. She gave way to drink and neglected her daughter. The husband meanwhile had married again, and ample proof was given of his present fitness.

The court ordered the custody of the daughter to be taken from the wife and given to the husband.

Motion to rescind or vary an order for custody of children and to reduce the amount of permanent maintenance payable by the husband to his wife.

The motion was originally made on the 16th of December, 1890, when it was referred to the registrar for report.

From his report it appeared that on the 22nd of January, 1889, a decree absolute was pronounced dissolving the marriage on the ground of the husband's adultery and cruelty, and an order was made giving to the mother the custody of the two children of the marriage—a son aged fifteen years, and a daughter aged eleven years. In compliance with this order the mother took charge of the daughter, but it was not complied with in the case of the son, who remained with the father. On the 18th of February, 1889, an order was made by consent that the respondent should pay £75 a year to the petitioner for her maintenance. Since the divorce the petitioner had lived at various places with her daughter, and a young man named Wheale had also lived in the same house, and, although he occupied a separate room, yet was on such intimate terms with the petitioner as, in the absence of explanation, to lead to the conclusion that they lived together as man and wife. The petitioner was given to drink, completely neglected her daughter's education, and was in the habit of sending her out late in the evening. The respondent had married again, and an affidavit was produced from the clergyman of his parish to the effect that he was leading a respectable life and was a fit person to have charge of his daughter.

The registrar was of opinion that the wife was an unfit person to have the custody of her daughter, but he did not recommend that her charge should be given to the husband, because it was unusual to give the custody of children to a father proved to have been guilty of adultery. He was therefore of opinion the custody of the girl should be given to a Mrs. Elizabeth Price, a schoolmistress, of whose fitness he was satisfied. It was suggested the £75 was fixed, on the supposition that the mother would have the custody of her daughter, and was subject to reduction if she was relieved of her charge. The registrar was of opinion that there was no evidence of this, and the order expressly stated that it was for the maintenance of the petitioner. The petitioner's address could not be discovered, and no notice of the reference to the registrar was served, and she did not appear before him.

Powles, for the husband, in support of the motion, cited Symington v. Symington, L. R. 2 H. L. Sc. 415.

The wife did not appear.

JEUNE, J.—The first question raised here is the most important, and I feel some difficulty about it, because there seems to be no case where, after custody has been given to an innocent wife after decree absolute, an order has been made restoring the custody to the husband. Obviously it ought only to be done in exceptional cases. The language of the Scotch Acts is substantially the same as that of the English Acts, and in 1875, in a Scotch case, Symington v. Symington, it was held in the House of Lords that no hard and fast rule should be laid down as to the custody of children, but that in every case the court is bound to do what it conceives to be best for the interests of the children. In the present case I have come to the conclusion, on the facts stated in the registrar's report, that it is for the interests of this child that she should be removed from the custody of the mother and placed under the charge of the father, strong evidence of whose present fitness for such custody has been given, rather than in the charge of a stranger. With regard to the reduction of the maintenance, no materials have been placed before me to show that the sum is too large, and the original order was for the maintenance of the mother. I think, therefore, I ought to make no order, but I express no opinion as to whether I could make such an order, if so inclined, on petition, and not by motion.

1882. The will was written on the first and second pages of a sheet of foolscap paper. On the first page, a few lines down, the name of John Hawkins had been substituted as executor for that of Frederick Povey, and the same alteration had been made on the second page, about five lines from the end of the will. The attesting witnesses had signed their names in the margin opposite the alterations on both pages. There was a full attestation clause at the end of the will, and the testator had signed his name opposite to it, but the attesting witnesses had not signed there. The attesting witnesses were examined and cross-examined, and stated that on some day in February, 1882, the testator called them into his house and asked them to witness his will. He then wrote his name in the presence of both of them, and they wrote their names where they were told, opposite to the alteration on both pages, intending thereby to attest his signature, and fully believing that they had done so. Nothing was said to them about the alterations.

On account of the smallness of the estate, and by consent of all parties, the court allowed the opinion of the court to be taken on motion.

Appeal from Kekewich, J.

The circumstances under which this injunction was granted were as follows:—

By an agreement dated the 25th of September, 1885, the defendant had agreed to act as manager for the plaintiff company for a term of five years at a salary of £300 a year, and a commission of 7½ per cent. on the dividends or profits of the company, and that he should give due diligence to the performance of his duties, conduct himself with propriety, and conform to the reasonable requirements of the board of directors.

By a subsequent agreement between the plaintiff company and the defendant dated the 24th of July, 1889, which recited the former agreement, it was provided that the defendant should be manager for a further term of ten years, determinable at the end of the term, or thereafter by three months' notice given on either side, and that "the said manager shall give the whole of his time to the company's business; he shall give due diligence to the performance of his duties, and shall conform to the reasonable requirements of the board of directors; and he shall reside within two miles of the company's said works." Neither of the agreements contained any negative covenant by the defendant.

The business of the plaintiff company consisted in working a patent process for carbonization of coal and coal shale; and the treatment of coal gas for obtaining benzole, solvent naphtha, and the like. The defendant was a manufacturing chemist, and had a special knowledge of this business.

In January last the plaintiff company became aware that the defendant was engaged in the construction of a rival company to carry on business in the immediate neighbourhood of the plaintiff company's works. The object of the proposed new company was to be the carbonization of coal under the same process as that in use by the plaintiff company. In this company the defendant was to be a director, and was to invest a large sum as capital therein.

The defendant, in a letter addressed to one of the directors of the plaintiff company, stated that he had "decided to instruct (sic) a new company . . . and take the position of director, and take up one-third of the capital." Some further correspondence ensued, and ultimately the plaintiff company moved for an injunction to restrain the defendant from setting up any business, or entering into any agreement, or making any engagement with any person or company (other than the plaintiff company), by which the whole of the defendant's time would cease to be devoted to the business of the plaintiff company, or by which the defendant would be prevented from carrying out the agreement of the 24th of July, 1889, and in particular from assisting in the formation of and from becoming a director, manager, or agent of any company or partnership now or hereafter to be formed for the purpose of carrying on a similar business and manufacture to those carried on by the plaintiff company until the hearing of the action or further order.

The defendant professed his willingness to continue to act as manager for the plaintiff company, but at the hearing of the motion he offered to resign his appointment.

Kekewich, J., held that, following Lumley v. Wagner and Montague v. Flockton, such a covenant could be enforced, and granted an injunction to restrain the defendant from giving less than the whole of his time to the plaintiff company's business.

Marten, Q.C., and A. Brown, for the appellant.—The decision of Kekewich, J., is contrary to the principles of the court as laid down in all the cases with the exception of the decisions in Montague v. Flockton, 21 W. R. 668, L. R. 16 Eq. 189, and Webster v. Dillon, 5 W. R. 867, which should not be regarded.

Warmington, Q.C., and Dibdin, for the respondents.—We rely on Montague v. Flockton. Further, the force of the word "whole" in the agreement is in effect equivalent to a negative covenant. [KAY, L.J.—Can a man, then, get an injunction to restrain his butler from not giving all his time to his service?] The defendant is more in the position of a partner than of a servant. He is in a position of trust and confidence, and acquires a special knowledge of how the processes of that company's business can be most profitably carried on: Dean v. McDowall, 26 W. R. 486, 8 Ch. D. 345. No damages can remedy the injury done us by this breach: Doherty v. Allman, 26 W. R. 513, 3 App. Cas. 709.

LINDLEY, L.J., after stating the facts, continued:—The plaintiff company seek to obtain an injunction to restrain the defendant from giving, in breach of his agreement with them, some of his time to a rival company. This they naturally desire to stop during the ten years he is bound to serve them for. To that extent the plaintiffs are right, and have a good ground of complaint if the defendant has committed a breach of the agreement.

The question is as to what form of remedy they are entitled to. For such a breach there are various remedies—dismissal of the defendant, or an action for damages, or an injunction. The plaintiffs have disregarded the first two remedies, and come to the court for an injunction. The terms of the one for which they asked in the court below differed from those of that which the court granted—to restrain him from giving less than the whole of his time to their business. The question is whether an injunction in these terms ought to have been granted, having regard to the principles upon which the court acts in cases of this nature.

It is first of all to be observed that there is no negative term in the agreement between the plaintiffs and the defendant. The parties have not expressly stipulated that the defendant shall not do that which the plaintiffs now complain of. The agreement is in the affirmative, and this appears to me to be of importance as showing more clearly what the parties had in contemplation when they entered into the agreement—that there was no definite undertaking by the defendant not to do what is now complained of.

In one sense, of course, every positive agreement to do a particular thing includes the negative, that nothing will be done contrary to it. But it does not follow that because a person has agreed to do a particular thing he is to be restrained by injunction from doing something contrary to it. The court is here dealing with an agreement of a particular class—a contract for personal service, of which it will not enforce specific performance, and to restrain a breach of which it will not as a general rule grant an injunction. The exception is, as in such cases as Lumley v. Wagner and Wolverhampton and Walsall Railway Co. v. London and North-Western Railway Co., where either there is a negative covenant in the agreement or you can see that the parties were actually contracting in this sense. What injunction can be granted in the present case which will not go far beyond the decision in Lumley v. Wagner, and amount in substance and effect to an order for specific performance of the agreement between the plaintiffs and the defendant, the very thing which the court will not grant in the case of a contract of personal service?

I see nothing in the present case to take it out of this general rule, except the decision in Montague v. Flockton (for I pass over that in Webster v. Dillon, which was decided without argument). In Montague v. Flockton Malins, V.C., did go the length of restraining an actor from performing elsewhere than in pursuance of an agreement, though this contained no negative covenant on his part. I think this decision was founded on a misapprehension by the Vice-Chancellor of the judgment of Lord St. Leonards in Lumley v. Wagner, for his observations show clearly that he overlooked the positive statement of Lord St. Leonards at p. 622 (of Lumley v. Wagner): "I may at once declare that if I had only to deal with the affirmative covenant of the defendant J. Wagner that she would perform at Her Majesty's Theatre, I should not have granted any injunction."

Apart from this case of Montague v. Flockton there is no case which warrants the granting of an injunction in the present case.

Then, is there anything else here which would justify the injunction being granted? The principle is the other way as regards contracts of service, and it lies upon the plaintiffs to show that there is something to create an exception here. I agree with the view expressed by Jessel, M.R., in Fothergill v. Rowland that no very distinct line is laid down in such cases, or to be found in the authorities; and I also agree with the observations of Fry, L.J., in De Francesco v. Barnum, that "I should be very unwilling to extend decisions the effect of which is to compel persons who are not desirous of maintaining continuous personal relations with one another to continue those personal relations. I have a strong impression and a strong feeling that it is not in the interest of mankind that specific performance should be extended to such cases" (45 Ch. D., p. 438). I confess I look upon the case of Lumley v. Wagner as an anomaly—an anomaly to be followed in precisely similar cases, but an anomaly not to be extended. In my opinion, the decision of Kekewich, J., is wrong, and the appeal ought to be allowed.

KAY, L.J.—I think that Kekewich, J., has been rather carried away by his desire to prevent the defendant from committing the wrong he is threatening to do, and has not given sufficient consideration to the right of the court to interfere by injunction in this case. In truth, this contract contains no negative covenant whatever, but only a term that he should give the plaintiff company the whole of his time. The plaintiffs are not really seeking to obtain specific performance of that term. They do not want to prevent the defendant by any order of this court from devoting part of his time to some other purpose than the plaintiffs' business; but, apprehending that the defendant is about to assist in founding a company which will carry on a rival business, they wish to prevent the defendant from acting as a director of that rival company. It is not because they think that the defendant will thereby be prevented from giving his whole time to them, but because he is about to carry on a rival business which will be to their detriment. That is quite plain from the terms of the notice of motion. They are, therefore, in seeking to obtain this injunction, trying to prevent the defendant's setting up a rival business, a thing he has never contracted in any way not to do.

Has the court ever before gone so far as to grant such an injunction as has been granted in this case by Kekewich, J.? The nearest cases are those of Webster v. Dillon and Montague v. Flockton. The first of these was decided without argument, and can, therefore, be disregarded. In Montague v. Flockton Malins, V.C., quite plainly misapprehended the decision of Lord St. Leonards in Lumley v. Wagner, for while he cites his statement at p. 618—"I am of opinion that if she had attempted, even in the absence of any negative stipulation, to perform at another theatre, she would have broken the spirit and true meaning of the contract as much as she would now do with reference to the contract into which she has actually entered"—he omitted to observe the sentence at p. 622 [quoted by Lindley, L.J., suprâ]. The case of Lumley v. Wagner went to the extreme limit, for it held that, though the contract was one of which the court would not enforce the specific performance, yet the defendant was bound by the terms of his express negative covenant.

There have been cases, such as De Mattos v. Gibson, where the court has gone so far as to grant an injunction in the absence of a negative covenant; but such cases are very rare, and certainly not to be followed without extreme consideration; and I know of no other cases than Webster v. Dillon and Montague v. Flockton where the court has granted an injunction to restrain the breach of a contract of personal service, under such circumstances.

If these cases are to be followed, the court would, for example, have to enforce by injunction a butler's breach of his contract of service for any time he should employ otherwise than in his master's service; for a similar negative term can be clearly implied in every such contract.

I think Kekewich, J., has in the present case gone far beyond any of the previous cases, and I feel strongly disinclined to follow his decision, and all the more so that the form of injunction sought for here is not really wanted bonâ fide for the purpose alleged.

I think the appeal must be allowed, and the costs in this court and in the court below will be the defendant's costs in the action.

Practice — Defamation — Injunction — Application to restrain publication of libel—Jurisdiction of the High Court—Rules upon which court exercises discretion.

Jurisdiction to grant an injunction to restrain the publication of an alleged libel pending trial or after verdict has existed in the common law courts since the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854, and in the Chancery Division since the Judicature Act, 1873, and, by section 25, sub-section 8, of the latter Act any judge of the High Court can grant such an injunction where it shall appear "just or convenient." But the court will be very cautious against granting such an injunction in any action for defamation previous to trial where justification of the defamation is pleaded, and will, as a rule, decline to interfere in such cases.

Per Kay, L.J.—An affidavit by a defendant pleading justification of a libel in opposition to an interlocutory motion for restraining the publication must show the grounds of his belief in such justification, and, in default of any such grounds being shown, the court is justified in granting such an injunction.

Appeal from an order of North, J., for an interlocutory injunction restraining the defendant until after trial of action from publishing or circulating in a certain newspaper article alleged by the plaintiffs to be a libel.

An article had been published by the defendant, as proprietor of the Financial Observer and Mining Herald, making strong reflections upon the character and honesty of the plaintiffs in the management of certain mining companies. The article appeared in an issue of the 7th of February, 1891, but had been repeated in subsequent issues. The plaintiffs had obtained from North, J., an interlocutory injunction restraining the defendant from any further issue or repetition of the aforesaid article pending the trial of an action for libel entered by the plaintiffs against the defendant in the Chancery Division, and to which the defendant pleaded justification in fact of the statements in the article. Against this order the defendant now appealed.

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., and W. E. Vernon, for the appellant.—There is no jurisdiction in the Chancery Division to grant an interlocutory injunction in an action for libel pending its trial before a jury, and in which the defendant pleaded justification of the libel: Kelly v. Kellond, 36 W. R. 363, 20 Q. B. D. 569; The Prudential Assurance Co. v. Knott, 23 W. R. 249, L. R. 10 Ch. App. 142. The jurisdiction of the Chancery Court as to granting injunctions was not extended by the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854, ss. 79 and 82, nor by the Judicature Act, 1873, s. 25, sub-section 8, but was only to be exercised according to previously established principles. The wording of the Common Law Procedure Act, though wide, should not be extended to interfere with any common law rights to a trial of issues by a jury. The cases show the established principles upon which interlocutory injunctions are granted: Saxby v. Easterbrook, 27 W. R. 188, 3 C. P. D. 339, this was after verdict; Sutton v. South-Eastern Railway Co., 14 W. R. 130; Day v. Brownrigg, 27 W. R. 217, 10 Ch. D. 294; Beddow v. Beddow, 26 W. R. 570, 9 Ch. D. 89; Thorley's Cattle Food Co. v. Massam, 28 W. R. 966, 14 Ch. D. 763; Hermann Loog v. Bean, 32 W. R. 994, 26 Ch. D. 306; Liverpool Household Stores v. Smith, 36 W. R. 485, 37 Ch. D. 170; Quartz Hill Gold Mining Co. v. Beall, 30 W. R. 583, 20 Ch. D. 501; Coulson v. Coulson, 3 Times L. R. 846. Secondly, an injunction, if within the jurisdiction of the Chancery Court, ought not to have been granted in the present case where justification was pleaded, which, if proved, would show the publication to have been for the public interest in warning persons from dealing in the companies mentioned in the article or with the plaintiffs.

The COURT intimated that the respondent's counsel need only answer the latter point.

Napier Higgins, Q.C., and Dunham, for the respondents, the plaintiffs.—The discretion of the court in granting an interim injunction is to be determined by the balance of justice or convenience, according to the Judicature Act, s. 25, and ord. 50, r. 6. The defendant would not be damnified by the injunction even though, ultimately, the libel were proved true. The plaintiffs would certainly be damnified by the repetition of the libel, even though ultimately successful. A plea of justification cannot oust the discretionary jurisdiction of the court to grant an injunction. The court, in exercising its discretion, will consider the evidence on affidavit in support of the plea of justification. Here the defendant's affidavit shows no facts which the defendant is able, of his own knowledge, to prove, nor his grounds of belief in the facts alleged as required by ord. 38, r. 3, and vide Lord Selborne's remarks in Bidder v. Bridges, 32 W. R. 445, 26 Ch. D. 1, p. 8. The onus is on the defendant to show primâ facie evidence of justification. Trial by jury in civil actions for libel was not primarily contemplated even by Fox's Libel Act. Since the Judicature Acts, such a tribunal is optional. The plaintiff had a clear right to bring an action for libel in the Chancery Division if he chose, and if neither party took any step to secure a jury, a judge of the Chancery or any other division could proceed to try any action for defamation. R. S. C., 1884, ord. 36, r. 2. The same principles on which the court or judge can grant interim injunctions in any other case must be applied in an action for defamation. Here, on the principles of justice and convenience, and in the absence of primâ facie evidence in support of the defendant's plea, North, J., granted the injunction, and his order ought to be sustained.

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., replied.

By consent, apart from the questions of jurisdiction and legal exercise of discretion, the action was arranged to be transferred to the London Special Juries List in the Queen's Bench Division so as to expedite its trial.

Cur. adv. vult.

Lord COLERIDGE, C.J., delivered the following written judgment of the whole court on the question of jurisdiction, and of the majority of the court on the question of the exercise of discretion :—

The plaintiffs in this case are two gentlemen carrying on business as financial agents under the title of the Mercantile and General Trust. The defendant Perryman is the proprietor and publisher of a paper called the Financial Observer and Mining Herald. The defendant Allen is in some way (not material to ascertain) connected with this paper, and appears to have printed the particular number which contains the matter of which the plaintiffs complain. In the number of the 7th of February, 1891, appeared the article which the plaintiffs assert to be a libel upon them, and in respect of which, having issued a writ in the Chancery Division, they applied for and have obtained from North, J., the injunction which we are asked upon appeal to dissolve. One point raised in the course of the argument has become immaterial to decide—namely, whether the Court of Appeal, sitting with its full number, can, according to the course and practice of the court, overrule a court consisting of three or any other number of members, if the decision which they are asked to review appears to be clearly wrong. It is unnecessary to discuss or to decide this question, because the previous decisions of this court on the main question before us appear to us to be perfectly correct, and we found our own decision upon them. It is only necessary to decide two questions—(1) is there jurisdiction in the Supreme Court to issue an injunction to restrain the publication of an alleged libel either at all or before the libel has been adjudged to be such? And (2) is this a case in which, as matter of discretion, the jurisdiction should be exercised, if it exists? The decision of the first question is, it appears manifest, independent of the circumstances of any particular case; the decision of the second entirely depends upon them.

As to the first, we are unable to entertain any doubt; the point is clear, and is settled by authority. The authorities, indeed, are few and recent for obvious reasons; but they are uniform and they are clear. Prior to the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854, neither courts of law nor courts of equity could issue injunctions in such a case as this; not courts of equity, because cases of libel could not come before them; not courts of law, because prior to 1854 they could not issue injunctions at all. But the 79th and 82nd sections of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854, undoubtedly conferred on the courts of common law, if a fit case should arise, the power to grant injunctions at any stage of a cause in all personal actions of contract or tort with no limitations as to defamation. This power by the Judicature Act, 1873, was conferred upon the Chancery Division of the High Court, representing the old courts of equity. Nevertheless, although the power had existed since 1854, there is no reported instance of its exercise by a court of common law till the case of Saxby v. Easterbrook, which was decided in 1878. In that case the injunction was not applied for, nor, of course, granted, till after a verdict or judgment had ascertained the publication to be a libel. That case was acquiesced in; and about the same time the Chancery Division began and has continued to assert the jurisdiction, which has been questioned before us, of granting injunctions on the interlocutory application of one of the parties to an action. Sir George Jessel in The Quartz Hill Consolidated Gold Mining Co. v. Beall distinctly asserted the jurisdiction; and it was considered and established in an elaborate judgment of this court in The Liverpool Household Stores Association v. Smith, in which Cotton, L.J., affirming indeed the refusal of Kekewich, J., to issue the injunction prayed for in that case, asserted the jurisdiction in plain language, and went on to explain the principles on which, in his opinion, the jurisdiction should be exercised. There have been other examples, but these are sufficient; and we do not doubt, upon the true construction of the statutes and upon authority, that as matter of jurisdiction North, J.'s order might lawfully be made.

But it is obvious that the subject-matter of an action for defamation is so special as to require exceptional caution in exercising the jurisdiction to interfere by injunction before the trial of an action to prevent an anticipated wrong. The right of free speech is one which it is for the public interest that individuals should possess, and, indeed, that they should exercise without impediment so long as no wrongful act is done; and unless an alleged libel is untrue there is no wrong committed; but, on the contrary, often a very wholesome act is performed in the publication and repetition of an alleged libel. Until it is clear that an alleged libel is untrue, it is not clear that any right at all has been infringed; and the importance of leaving free speech unfettered is a strong reason in cases of libel for dealing most cautiously and warily with the granting of interim injunctions. We entirely approve of and desire to adopt as our own the language of the present Master of the Rolls in Coulson v. Coulson, "That to justify the court in granting an injunction it must come to a decision on the question of libel or no libel before the jury have decided whether it was a libel or not; that the jurisdiction, therefore, was of a delicate nature, and ought only to be exercised in the clearest cases, where any jury would say that the matter complained of was libellous, and where, if the jury did not so find, the court would set aside the verdict as unreasonable." In the particular case before us, indeed, the libellous character of the publication is beyond dispute, but the effect of it upon the defendant can be finally disposed of only by the jury, and we cannot feel sure that in the present case the defence of justification is one which, on the facts which may be before them, the jury may find to be wholly unfounded; nor can we tell what may be the damages recoverable. Moreover, the decision at the hearing may turn upon the question of the general character of the plaintiffs; and this is a point which can rarely be investigated satisfactorily upon affidavit before the trial, on which, further, it is not desirable that the court should express an opinion before the trial. Otherwise an injunction might be granted before the trial in a case in which at the trial nothing but nominal domages, if so much, could be obtained. Upon the whole we think, with great deference to North, J., that it is wiser in this case, as it generally and in all but exceptional cases must be, to abstain from interference until the trial and determination of the plea of justification.

The appeal, therefore, must be allowed and the order discharged, the costs in this court and in the court below to be costs in the cause.

KAY, L.J.—I agree with all the members of the court that since the passing of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854, by sections 79, 81, and 82 of that Act, courts of common law had, and by sections 16 and 25, sub-section 8, of the Judicature Act, 1873, the High Court of Justice now has, undoubted jurisdiction to grant injunctions at or before the trial in actions of libel. We are also agreed that in such actions this jurisdiction before trial should be very cautiously exercised, especially because the questions of libel or no libel, and of the validity of a justification, if pleaded, are eminently matters to be determined by the verdict of a jury. The only point in this case on which I have felt any difficulty is whether it is expedient or right altogether to discharge the interlocutory injunction which has been granted. The alleged libel is in coarse and abusive language, which would incline anyone reading it to the belief that some personal feeling of spite or malignity against the plaintiffs, and not merely a desire to protect the interests of the public, was among the actuating motives of the defendant. Some of the most serious allegations in the articles are those by which the defendant associates the plaintiffs with a person whom he represents to be of infamous character. I know nothing whatever of the individual except what appears in the evidence before us, and have no means of judging whether the allegations made against him are true or false. It appears from another page in the same paper that since February, 1890, the defendant has been in the habit of publishing concerning this person accusations in some of the strongest language of his well-furnished vocabulary. The individual so traduced is, it seems, the editor or owner of another financial paper published in London, called the Financial News, and the defendant's paper states that the defendant intends to repeat the article against him until some notice is taken of it by the London County Council (of which we are told this person is a member), the Incorporated Law Society, the Houses of Parliament, or the police. The article so published, which the defendant intends to repeat, calls the person denounced a City thief, a vulture, speaks of his swindles and his nefarious practices, and says, amongst other choice phrases, that there is no phase of the criminal law that has not been scoffed at by him, and that fraud, conspiracy, burglary, and felony have been used to aid his schemes to despoil and hoodwink the public.

Now in the article complained of in this action it is stated that the plaintiffs have been lucky enough to ingratiate themselves with this person by offering him inducements to puff one of the companies which they promoted, and that the Mercantile and General Trust, which is the style under which the plaintiffs are carrying on business, is composed of themselves, the man so villified, and two other persons named Deakin and Campbell. These statements that the plaintiffs are carrying on business in partnership or in close association with a man who is described in this way as a swindler and a thief are undoubtedly calculated to damage the plaintiffs extremely, if not to ruin them. We are relieved from one of the difficulties which occur in most cases of this kind, because counsel have admitted in the argument before us that if the statements in this article are untrue it is unquestionably a libel. They say, however, that they intend to plead that the statements are true, and the truth or falsehood of them must be determined at the trial by a jury. They decline to give any undertaking not to repeat these statements before the trial, but insist that the defendant has a right to do so. My doubt arises upon the affidavit evidence which is now before the court. What may be the case at the trial I can only judge at present from that evidence, and I do not wish to say anything which can influence the trial in any way. [His lordship then dealt with the affidavits of the plaintiffs and of the defendant, and continued:—] By ord. 38, r. 1, it is provided that an affidavit should be confined to such facts as the witness is able of his own knowledge to prove, except on interlocutory motions, on which statements as to belief, with the grounds thereof, may be admitted. Lord Selborne, L.C., in Bidder v. Bridges, said:—"I do not think this court can for a single moment give countenance to the notion that any common neglect, if there be such common neglect, of the provisions of that order can absolve persons from the consequences of disregarding them when the question is raised, as it is here raised, by a person having a right to raise it. That order requires, in effect, that affidavit evidence as to matters of fact by a person who is not able strictly to prove them must show, not only the fact, but also the grounds of his belief."

To the same effect is the judgment of the late Master of the Rolls in the Court of Appeal in The Quartz Hill Gold Mining Co. v. Beall, where the injunction in a libel case case was dissolved partly on the ground that the plaintiff's affidavit did not comply with this order. Speaking for myself, I entirely agree with this view of the meaning and effect of this order, and think it essential to the ends of justice that it should be strictly observed. In the case now before us the defendant's answer to the express and categorical denial by the plaintiffs of any kind of association with the person in question is only met by these statements as to the defendant's belief, which do not attempt to show the grounds of his belief otherwise than by stating that the association is through Engel or Campbell, and there is no other evidence in support of the defendant's case on this point.

Now, I agree that in order to justify the court in granting an interlocutory injunction in such a case there must be strong primâ facie evidence that the statement is untrue. In my opinion, in this state of the affidavits, there is that strong primâ facie evidence. If that is so, according to the ordinary practice, the court should be actuated in granting or refusing the injunction by consideration of what is commonly termed the balance of convenience and inconvenience. To which side in this case does that balance incline? If this injunction be continued in the whole or in part it will not prevent the defendant from protecting the public by any other statements he can legitimately make against the plaintiffs; it will only prevent him from repeating this particular allegation. Even if at the trial the defendant should be able to adduce evidence showing that the plaintiffs' denial of their association with a person described as a swindler is untrue, it is impossible to conceive that the defendant can be damnified by being restrained meanwhile from repeating it. On the other hand, I can easily believe that this statement, if repeated, as the defendant admits he intends to do in the interval before the trial, may occasion very great injury, if not ruin, to the plaintiffs. If it should turn out at the trial of this action that the plaintiffs' denial on this point is true and that the defendant's allegation is false an irreparable injury may have been done to the plaintiffs by denying them this relief by interim injunction. I think the true result of the affidavit evidence is that the defendant has a suspicion of the plaintiffs' connection with the person whom he so defames for which he is not able to allege any substantial foundation. For these reasons I should have granted the injunction, at least as to this part of the libel, and I should have been glad if the Court of Appeal had been prepared to sustain it.

Appeal allowed.

BECKETT v. TOWER ASSETS CO. (a.)

Bill of sale—Assignment and hire and purchase agreement—True nature of the transaction—Bills of Sale Acts, 1878 (41 & 42 Vict. c. 31), s. 4, and 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 43).

The plaintiff having applied to the defendants for an advance of £30 upon the security of his furniture, it was arranged that the landlord, to whom the plaintiff owed £25 for rent, should put in a friendly distress, when the defendants would buy the goods from him. The landlord accordingly, at the plaintiff's request, distrained upon the goods in question for £25 rent due, and the goods seized were appraised at £29 5s. The broker then, at the request of the plaintiff, sold the goods to the defendants at the condemned price. The next day the defendants produced an agreement by which the goods were to be hired to the plaintiff's wife upon the terms that, on payment of £50 by monthly instalments, the goods were to become her property, the defendants to have power to take possession upon non-performance of any of the provisions of the agreement. The plaintiff objected to pay £50 for an advance of £29 5s., upon which the defendants said that they had bought the goods, and that the plaintiff knew whether they were worth £50 or not. The plaintiff then said that he saw how he was placed, and his wife signed the hiring agreement. This agreement was not registered as a bill of sale. Default having been made, the defendants took possession, and the plaintiff brought this action to recover damages for trespass to the goods.

Held, that the true inference from the facts was that by the purchase from the landlord the property in the goods passed to the defendants, subject to a resulting trust in favour of the plaintiff until the execution of the hiring agreement; that, as the beneficial interest in the goods remained in the plaintiff until the execution of that agreement, the defendants had no title to the goods independently of that agreement; and that, as the agreement was not registered under the Bills of Sale Acts, the plaintiff was entitled to recover.

Judgment of Cave, J. ([1891] 1 Q. B. 1), reversed.

Appeal from the judgment of Cave, J., in favour of the defendants, upon the trial of an action to recover damages for trespass to goods.

The facts were as follows:—

In October, 1888, the plaintiff, seeing an advertisement of the defendants', applied to them for a loan of £30 upon the security of his furniture. A man named Collins, from the defendants' office, accordingly made an inventory of the furniture and included in it by consent, though after some objection, the tools and plant of the plaintiff's trade. At this time the plaintiff owed his landlord some rent, but the landlord was not pressing for it. Collins suggested that it would be much better not to have a bill of sale, but to get the landlord to put in a friendly distress, as it would save exposure, give them a better title, and be a better security to the plaintiff against any future creditor. The next day the plaintiff went to the defendants' office and assented to this course. The landlord accordingly, at the request of the plaintiff, put in a friendly distress for £25, rent due on September 29, 1888, and the goods seized were appraised at £29 5s. On October 17 Godbolt, a representative from the defendants, went to the plaintiff's house, and the plaintiff having signed a memorandum requesting the broker to sell the goods to the defendants at the condemned price, Godbolt paid the broker £29 5s., and got a receipt from him. The next day, October 18, the plaintiff and his wife went to the defendants' office, when a hiring agreement of the goods from the defendants to the plaintiff's wife was produced for her signature. By this agreement the hirer was to pay the defendants £1 8s. a month until the sum of £50 was paid, when the goods were to become hers; the hirer was from time to time to pay the rent due in respect of the house where the goods were; and in case the hirer should make default in payment of any money payable under the agreement, or should break or fail to perform or observe any of the provisions of the agreement, the defendants were to be at liberty to enter the house and take possession of the goods and sell them. The plaintiff objected to paying £50 for an advance of £29 5s., on which the defendants' representative said, "You can please yourself; we have bought the goods, and you know whether they are worth £50 or not." The plaintiff thereupon said that he saw "how he was placed," and told his wife to sign the agreement, which she did. The plaintiff then signed another document, guaranteeing the due payment of the sums under the hiring agreement. The monthly instalments were duly paid, but the rent was not punctually paid, and an agreement was made between the plaintiff and his landlord that the quarter's rent due on Lady Day, 1889, should be paid by instalments.

On June 20, instalments of the rent being in arrear, the landlord agreed to forego the whole of the rent from Christmas to Midsummer provided the plaintiff would give up possession of the house on June 24, and on the same day the landlord sent to the defendants an undertaking not to distrain for any rent due to Midsummer if the plaintiff gave up possession of the house on or before that date.

On June 22 the plaintiff wrote to the defendants that he was going to remain in the house with the goods for another week, but was to hand over the keys and turn over the lodgers to the landlord on the 24th. The defendants thereupon asked the landlord to extend his undertaking of the 20th, which was refused. Consequently, on the evening of the 24th, the defendants seized and removed the goods. The plaintiff had on the morning of the 24th delivered up the keys of the house to the landlord. The jury found that the value of the plaintiff's tools was £30; that the value of the furniture was £33; and that the plaintiff sustained damage to the amount of £125 in addition to the value of the goods. It was arranged that all other questions should be decided by the learned judge. The learned judge held that the transaction was a sale by the plaintiff to the defendants with a right of repurchase, and that the transaction was independent of a document; and, further, that, whether the transaction was a sale or mortgage, there was no document requiring registration under the Bills of Sale Acts: see [1891] 1 Q. B. 1.

Cur. adv. vult.

March 21.—FRY, L.J.—The facts have been stated very fully by the learned judge in the court below, and I accept the facts as stated by him. Upon those facts the questions arose whether the defendants had any title to the goods independently of the hire-purchase agreement, and whether that agreement required registration as a bill of sale. A great deal of argument was addressed to us as to how far the court will look into the real transaction between the parties, and how far such an investigation may bear upon the operation of the Bills of Sale Acts. It seems to me to be plain upon the true construction of the statute that, in considering questions under the Act, the court may, and therefore must, inquire into the real nature of the transaction. For instance, the question whether a bill of sale is within the Bills of Sale Act, 1882, turns upon the inquiry whether it was given as security for the repayment of money. If it is so given, however absolute in form it may be, it is a bill of sale within the provisions of that Act. Thus, if A. be the real owner of the goods, and B. the pretended owner, and B. by a document purports to let the goods to A. with a liberty to B. in a certain event to seize, this may be construed as a licence by A., the real owner, to B. to take possession, and requires registration. That was the case of Madell v. Thomas.

Again, the real truth of the transaction must be applied to the construction of the document, and if the document so construed would be a bill of sale it requires registration. This was the case of In re Watson. But if the defendant has a title by some transaction independently of any document, and then a document is executed which, according to its true construction, is a bill of sale, and it is not registered, the mere avoidance of the bill of sale will not deprive the defendant of his independent title. In the present case it is said that the defendants had such an independent title. We must inquire whether they had. I agree with the learned judge in thinking that the answer to the inquiry depends upon this—what was the real intention of the parties? And, in determining that, I also agree that we must have regard to the substance, and not the mere form of the transaction, to the position of the parties, and the whole circumstances under which the transaction came about.

Now, it is to be observed that in the present case the transaction derived its force from the consent of the plaintiff Beckett, and the distress put in by the landlord was a friendly distress, and it might, indeed, almost be deemed a sham distress, including, as it did, the tools, which could not be distrained by law without the consent of Beckett; and in like manner the valuation was not real, as it was the exact amount of the money advanced. It is obvious, therefore, that the transaction depended on the intention of Beckett in conveying. Now, it appears to me that the true construction of the facts is that it was agreed between the parties that there was to be a sale and a hire-purchase agreement; that the sale was to be in appearance absolute; and to operate as a sale if and when the hire-purchase agreement was executed; but that if it was not executed then the beneficial interest in the goods did not pass, the intention being that in such an event the property should pass subject to a resulting trust. To illustrate my meaning, let me take the interval of time between the hour on the 17th of October when the sham sale took place and the hour of the 18th of October when the hire-purchase agreement was executed. How did things stand. If the defendants had refused to execute the hire-purchase agreement, could they have held the property in the goods as against Beckett; or in that interval could he have recovered the goods on his repayment of the sum advanced by the defendants, with expenses? It appears to me that he might have recovered the goods if on the 18th of October the defendants had refused to execute the hire-purchase agreement. I conclude, therefore, that though it was the intention of both parties that the legal estate should pass, it was to pass subject to a resulting trust in favour of Beckett until the hire-purchase agreement was executed. It follows from that view that there was no independent title in the defendants; that the beneficial interest in the goods remained in Beckett until the hire-purchase agreement was executed; that, therefore, the defendants had not any title independent of the bill of sale, and consequently, as they had no title but under that, and it was not registered, the plaintiff was entitled to recover. I think, therefore, that the conclusion of the learned judge was erroneous in not giving effect to the resulting trust, which arose from the real nature of the transaction and the circumstances of the case. The learned judge relied upon the language used by Beckett when his wife was asked to execute the hire-purchase agreement. But it appears to me that the remark that he saw how he was placed only shows that Beckett was ignorant of his true rights, and therefore complied with the terms inserted by the defendants in the hire-purchase agreement. The judge, in my opinion, placed too much reliance upon that remark of Beckett, which merely expressed the difficulty of the position in which he found himself.

There is another ground on which, also, if it were necessary, I am inclined to think that the judgment is erroneous. The defendants justified their seizure by reason of the default of Beckett in paying his rent. But it appears to me that there was evidence to show that there was a course of dealing between the parties which would preclude them from availing themselves of that default; because from December, 1888, to June, 1889, there had been a series of undertakings given by the landlord not to distrain until a certain day, and this had been accepted by the defendants, and he had given such an undertaking down to June 24, and the defendants had sent to inquire whether it would be enlarged, and, finding no further undertaking would be given, they entered and seized on June 24, when the undertaking was in force. It is not necessary to decide the point, but I am disposed to think the judgment wrong on that ground. The result is that we must set aside the judgment, and give judgment for the plaintiff for the amount found by the jury.

BOWEN, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. It is necessary to bear in mind that the Bills of Sale Act avoids, not the transaction, but the document. If the transaction can stand without the document, there is no provision in the Act avoiding the transaction. To my mind this transaction of purchase and hire might be thought to be a sham but for one thing. The sale cannot be a sham as against the landlord. It is impossible, therefore, to say that no legal effect attaches to that part of the transaction. Still, though that is so as against the landlord, there was an understanding or agreement—and we must so find as a fact—between the debtor and creditor that, while the property in the goods passed to the creditor, the goods were to be held upon trust for the debtor until some other document settling the rights of the parties had been signed. The beneficial property in the goods remained in the debtor until the execution of that document. That being so, the creditor is placed in this dilemma. The goods were only to become his by virtue of a further document. If the hiring agreement gives him the title, it is an assurance of personal chattels, and therefore a bill of sale within the Act. If the hire agreement only operates as a licence to the creditor to take possession of the goods, the beneficial interest being in the debtor, it is a licence to take possession of personal chattels as security for a debt, and a bill of sale within the Act. In either view the hiring agreement is a bill of sale within the Act, and a necessary document as part of the defendant's title. That seems to me to be the true interpretation to be placed upon this transaction. The inference which we are drawing from the facts and circumstances of the case does not seem to have been presented to the learned judge in the court below. Upon the question of waiver I have nothing to add to what has been said by Fry, L.J.

REG. v. COMMISSIONERS UNDER THE BOILER EXPLOSIONS ACT, 1882. (a.)

Boiler — Boiler explosion — Explosion in coal mine — Meaning of "boiler" — Jurisdiction of Board of Trade to order inquiry — Boiler Explosions Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 22), ss. 3, 4—Boiler Explosions Act, 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 35), s. 2.

By section 4 of the Boiler Explosions Act, 1882, the Act was not to apply to "any boiler used exclusively for domestic purposes, or to any boiler used in the service of her Majesty, or any boiler on board a steamship having a certificate from the Board of Trade, or to any boiler explosion into which an inquiry may be held under the provisions of the Coal Mines Regulation Act, 1872, and the Metalliferous Mines Regulation Act, 1872."

By section 2 of the Boiler Explosions Act, 1890, "So much of section 4 of the Boiler Explosions Act, 1882, as relates to any boiler other than a boiler used in the service of her Majesty, or used exclusively for domestic purposes, is hereby repealed, and the said Act shall apply in the case of any boiler explosion occurring on board a British ship."

Held, that the provision in section 4 of the Act of 1882 excepting from the operation of that Act any boiler explosion into which an inquiry may be held under the Mines Regulation Acts, 1872, was repealed by section 2 of the Act of 1890, and therefore the Board of Trade has jurisdiction under the Act of 1882 to order an inquiry into such a boiler explosion.

On the surface of a mine there was a boiler, from which the steam was conveyed by a pipe down the shaft of the mine and along the workings to a receiver, and from the receiver by a pipe to an engine in the mine. Stop-valves were placed upon the pipe at different places, the last valve being close to the engine, the distance from the boiler on the surface to the engine being 1,363 feet. When all the valves were open steam passed from the boiler to the engine. An explosion having occurred at the valve close to the engine,

Held (by Lord Halsbury, L.C., and Lord Esher, M.R.; Fry, L.J., doubting), that the place where the explosion occurred was a part of the "boiler" within the meaning of that word as defined by section 3 of the Boiler Explosions Act, 1882—"a closed vessel used for generating steam."

Decision of the Queen' Bench Division affirmed.

This was the argument of a rule nisi obtained on behalf of the Tyne Coal Co. (Limited), calling upon the commissioners appointed by the Board of Trade under the Boiler Explosions Act, 1882, to show cause why a writ of prohibition should not issue, prohibiting them from further proceeding with any inquiry or formal investigation into the causes or circumstances attending an explosion of a stop valve in a coal mine of the Tyne Coal Co. (Limited.)

The facts were as follows:—

On the 13th of September, 1890, an explosion took place in a pit of the Tyne Coal Co.'s Collieries at Hebburn-on-Tyne. In this pit there was an engine which was used for the purpose of pumping water from the pit to the surface. The engine was driven by means of steam conveyed to it in the following manner:—On the bank or surface of the mine was a boiler to which a metal pipe was attached leading to the top of the shaft, a distance of 122 feet. The pipe then descended the shaft 1,056 feet, and was laid along the workings for a distance of 140 feet to a receiver. A pipe then led from the receiver, a distance of 45 feet to the engine. Stop valves were placed on the pipe near the boiler, and at the bottom of the shaft, and also upon the pipe leading from the receiver to the engine, and another stop valve was placed near the engine. When any one of the valves above mentioned was closed the passage of steam from the boiler to the engine was stopped, and when all the valves were open steam passed from the boiler to the engine.

On the 13th of September all the valves were open with the exception of the valve near the engine. That one was closed so that repairs might be effected to the engine. There was at this time a high pressure of steam in the boiler and in the pipe, and the valve which was closed was blown out. Steam consequently escaped and two workmen were scalded to death.

Upon receiving notice of this explosion the Board of Trade directed one of their engineers to make a preliminary inquiry into the matter under section 6 of the Boiler Explosions Act, 1882, and he held an inquiry, though objection was taken by the Tyne Coal Co. on the ground that the occurrence did not come within the Boiler Explosions Acts, 1882 and 1890.

Upon receiving the report of the preliminary inquiry the Board of Trade ordered a formal investigation to be held.

By section 3 of the Boiler Explosions Act, 1882, "In this Act the term 'boiler' means any closed vessel used for generating steam, or for heating water, or for heating other liquids, or into which steam is admitted for heating, steaming, boiling, or other similar purposes."

By section 4, the Act "shall not apply to any boiler used exclusively for domestic purposes, or to any boiler used in the service of her Majesty, or to any boiler on board a steamship having a certificate from the Board of Trade, or to any boiler explosion into which an inquiry may be held under the provisions of the Coal Mines Regulation Act, 1872, and the Metalliferous Mines Regulation Act, 1872, or either of them."

Section 2 of the Boiler Explosion Act, 1890, provides as follows:—"So much of section 4 of the Boiler Explosions Act, 1882, as relates to any boiler other than a boiler used in the service of her Majesty, or used exclusively for domestic purposes, is hereby repealed, and the said Act shall apply in the case of any boiler explosion occurring on board a British ship."

Sir R. E. Webster, A.G., and Sir E. Clarke, S.G. (H. Sutton with them), on behalf of the commissioners, showed cause.—This was an explosion of a "boiler" within the Boiler Explosions Act, 1882. This pipe is one continuous vessel with the boiler and receiver which it connects; it is a "closed vessel used for generating steam" within the definition of "boiler" in section 3 of the Act of 1882. Secondly, section 2 of the Boiler Explosions Act, 1890, has repealed the exception contained in section 4 of the Act of 1882 as to boiler explosions to which the Coal Mines Regulation Act, 1872, applies, and the Board of Trade now has power to order an inquiry in these cases also. Between the passing of the Coal Mines Regulation Act, 1887, and the Act of 1890 inquiries into boiler explosions in coal mines were regulated by the Act of 1887, which by section 83 was to be read into the Act of 1882, but now by the Act of 1890 the Board of Trade has also power to order an inquiry.

Moulton, Q.C., and Danckwerts, in support of the rule.—This is not a "boiler"; it is a pipe, a mere conduit for the passage of steam, not a vessel for generating it. It is a mere steam pipe. The place where the explosion occurred is at a great distance from the boiler itself. Secondly, the Home Office has ample power to direct an inquiry under the Coal Mines Regulation Act, 1887, and it was not intended that separate powers to direct an inquiry should be vested in two different authorities, so as to make two independent inquiries into the same explosion possible. The expression in section 4 of the Act of 1882 is "boiler explosion" not "boiler," and the words used in section 2 of the Act of 1890 are not sufficient to repeal the earlier section.

CAVE, J.—I am of opinion that this rule should be discharged. It was said that section 2 of the Boiler Explosions Act, 1890, does not repeal the last two exceptions in section 4 of the Act of 1882. The section is somewhat difficult of construction and might have been more clearly expressed, but I think that it is impossible to restrict the repeal in the manner suggested. Section 4 relates to any boiler, and it cannot be said that so much of it as refers to boiler explosions does not also refer to boilers. In the same way, if the Act had contained a number of provisions as to cleaning or repairing boilers they would all relate to boilers. It is absurd to say that, because the word "boiler" is used in the earlier part of the section and "boiler explosion" in the later part, the later part does not relate to boilers. Giving the natural construction to the words—although the section is somewhat difficult to construe—I have come to the conclusion that the latter part of section 4 has been repealed by section 2 of the Act of 1890.

As to the second point, it seems to me that the whole of this vessel down to the part where the explosion took place was a "closed vessel used for generating steam." A closed vessel into which steam is received for boiling purposes is clearly a boiler within the Act, and so is that part of the boiler which is close to the fire; but it is said that an explosion in the pipe which leads from the one to the other is not within the Act, although it is certainly as much within the mischief of the Act as an explosion in one of the other places. I think that the proper view is that the whole thing is one closed vessel for generating steam, and is, therefore, a boiler within the Act. The rule must, therefore, be discharged.

CHARLES, J.—I agree. I think that the pipe where this explosion took place was part of a boiler within the Act. As to the other question I had some doubt; but I have come to the conclusion that it would be too narrow a construction of section 2 of the Act of 1890 to limit the repeal thereby effected to a little more than a line of section 4 of the earlier Act. I think it repeals section 4 altogether, except the part which relates to any boiler used exclusively for domestic purposes, or to any boiler used in the service of her Majesty.

Rule discharged.

The Tyne Coal Co. appealed.

Sir H. James, Q.C., Moulton, Q.C., and Danckwerts, for the appellants, and Sir R. E. Webster, A.G., Sir E. Clarke, S.G., and H. Sutton, for the respondents, argued as in the court below.

Lord HALSBURY, L.C.—I am of opinion that this appeal must be dismissed. The first question is as to the true construction of section 2 of the Boiler Explosions Act, 1890. Section 4 of the Boiler Explosions Act, 1882, provides that the Act "shall not apply to any boiler used exclusively for domestic purposes, or to any boiler used in the service of her Majesty, or to any boiler on board a steamship having a certificate from the Board of Trade, or to any boiler explosion into which an inquiry may be held under the provisions of the Coal Mines Regulation Act, 1872, and the Metalliferous Mines Regulation Act, 1872, or either of them." Section 2 of the Boiler Explosions Act, 1890, provides that "so much of section 4 of the Boiler Explosions Act, 1882, as relates to any boiler other than a boiler used in the service of her Majesty, or used exclusively for domestic purposes, is hereby repealed, and the said Act shall apply in the case of any boiler explosion occurring on board a British ship." It was contended that an inquiry into a boiler and an inquiry into a boiler explosion were two distinct things. The Act of 1882, however, has no operation, and no inquiry can take place, except in the case of a boiler which has exploded. The contention is that the Act of 1890 has struck out of section 4 of the Act of 1882 the exception of a boiler on board a steamship, and has left in the exception of a boiler explosion capable of being inquired into under the Coal Mines and the Metalliferous Mines Acts. It was urged that a double inquiry into the same explosion would be not only unnecessary, but also the cause of friction. I myself cannot see that it would. The Legislature has, under the Mines Acts, provided for an inquiry into all accidents in mines. As a distinct head of inquiry, the Legislature has thought it right, under the Boiler Explosions Act, 1882, to provide for an inquiry into a boiler explosion. The Legislature has intrusted those two distinct inquiries to two different departments of the Government. I think one may safely conclude that where the Government itself, by two of its departments, is the authority to conduct the two inquiries, there will be no fear of any friction. But even if I thought that it was inconvenient or likely to cause friction that there should be two inquiries into one subject-matter, I should still be unable to escape from the plain language of the Act. In my opinion section 2 of the Act of 1890 has repealed the particular exception which is now insisted on as still in existence.

What I have said upon the first point assumes that this was an explosion of a boiler within the meaning of the Act of 1882. It remains now to consider whether this was a "boiler explosion" within the meaning of the Act. The word "boiler" is not a scientific, but a popular term. For my own part, I should be disposed to take the popular view of a boiler, that it is something to boil water whereby steam is generated. I think the spout of a kettle, however long the spout may be, is part of the kettle in which the steam is generated. If, instead of having a long pipe leading down the mine, as in this case, there had been a large pipe immediately over the place where the water was boiled, would that pipe be the less a part of the boiler, it being part of the instrument in which the stream was generated, which, if the pressure of the steam were too great, might explode. We must not forget that the whole policy of the Act is to have an inquiry into accidents producing loss of life or injury to person by reason of imperfect and insufficient instruments for the purpose of containing steam where steam is generated. I am by no means prepared to say that, if the word "boiler" were the only word in the Act, I should not come to the conclusion that this pipe was part of the boiler, inasmuch as, if I understand the facts rightly, this vessel has a continuous flow of steam from the place where the steam rises from the water to the place where the explosion occurred. If that were not so, there would be this strange result, that if an explosion occurred close to the place where the steam rose from the water it would be an explosion of a boiler, whereas if it occurred some yards away, where the shape of the vessel containing the steam had altered into a pipe, it would not be an explosion in any part of the boiler, though equally within the mischief aimed at by the Act. But it is not necessary to construe the Act in that way, because the interpretation clause (section 3) provides that the term "boiler" means "any closed vessel used for generating steam, or for heating water, or for heating other liquids, or into which steam is admitted for heating, steaming, boiling, or other similar purposes." In my opinion the facts of this case bring this instrument within that description. In my opinion this pipe was a closed vessel—not, indeed, absolutely closed, for no boiler is ever absolutely closed, but closed in the sense in which any engineer would use the word—so confined as to keep the steam within it and to give rise to danger of explosion. In the case of the particular instrument with which we are dealing, the steam generated by the boiling of the water is conducted from the surface of the water at first by a larger vessel and then by a smaller one until it gets below into the mine for the purpose of being admitted into the piston which drives the engine. I am therefore of opinion that it is a boiler in that enlarged sense, "a closed vessel used for generating steam." I also think that it is a vessel "into which steam is admitted for heating, steaming, boiling, or other similar purposes." Although the words may not be happily chosen, it seems to me that they mean any instrument into which the steam itself, which may give rise to an explosion, is admitted for the purpose of being further used for either of the purposes there indicated. What was intended by the word "steaming" seems to be the use of steam for such purposes as a boiler is used for. It seems to me, therefore, that both branches of the definition hit this particular instrument, and that this instrument is a "boiler" within the meaning of the Act.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—This is an application to prohibit the Board of Trade from ordering an inquiry into the cause of an explosion, on the ground that the jurisdiction to make an inquiry is vested in the Home Secretary, and not in the Board of Trade. I cannot help thinking that the Boiler Explosions Act, 1890, is drafted in very indifferent form. The Boiler Explosions Act, 1882, applies to explosions of boilers, and, if there were no exceptions in the Act, it would obviously have included boiler explosions in mines. There is, however, in section 4, an exception of boiler explosions in mines, because the Legislature was aware that they could be inquired into by the Home Secretary under the Mines Regulation Acts. There being this exception in the Act of 1882, section 2 of the Act of 1890 does away with that exception. I read the section thus, because to my mind the difference in the wording between a "boiler explosion" and a "boiler" in that Act cannot have any weight attached to it. The effect of that is to take the exception as to a boiler explosion in a mine out of the Act of 1882, and to make the Act of 1882 include such an explosion. Thus the Board of Trade has, by the Act of 1890, given to it the jurisdiction which it would have had but for the exception in the Act of 1882. It is said that it is inconvenient that the Board of Trade should have jurisdiction, inasmuch as the Home Secretary also has jurisdiction under the Mines Regulation Acts. To my mind it is inconvenient, and if I had been able to do so I should willingly have held that the sole jurisdiction was in the Home Secretary. The province of the court, however, is only to construe the Act, and as, in my opinion, the case clearly comes within the Act of 1882, as amended by the Act of 1890, we must hold that the Board of Trade has jurisdiction.

The next question is whether this was an explosion of a "boiler" within the meaning of the Act of 1882. The draftsman here has inserted a definition clause which says that a boiler shall mean something which in reality is not a boiler. That to my mind is always a dangerous method of drafting. Section 3 says that "in this Act the term 'boiler' means any closed vessel used for generating steam." If the Legislature had used the term "steam boiler," or any other simple term, we should have understood it better. The section goes on: "or for heating water, or for heating other liquids, or into which steam is admitted for heating, steaming, boiling, or other similar purposes." Is this pipe where the explosion occurred within that definition? The purpose of this Act is to deal with explosions of steam. Are we to leave out, unless we are obliged to do so, one of the most common closed vessels in which an explosion of steam may occur? I think not. The words are not used in a scientific sense, and it was not intended to draw scientific distinctions between the different parts of the machine. The Legislature in using the words, "closed vessel used for generating steam," meant the whole machine in which the steam is produced, and where it is under pressure until it is allowed to go out from that machine into something else for other purposes. It therefore includes in this case the place in which the steam is generated, and the pipe through which the steam goes, and the vessel into which it is received—in fact the whole machine in which the steam is held until it goes out from that machine for other purposes. If that be so the place where the explosion occurred was in that machine, and therefore I agree with the judgment of the Divisional Court and the grounds upon which it is based. Taking this view it becomes immaterial to consider what is meant by the remaining words of section 3.

FRY, L.J.—Upon the first point I entirely concur. The point, indeed, seems to be a very plain one. Upon the second point I have great doubt whether the place in the pipe where the explosion occurred was in popular language a part of the boiler, or a part of the boiler within the meaning of that word as defined by section 3 of the Act of 1882. I feel, however, that the construction which the court below, and the Lord Chancellor and Master of the Rolls in this court, have placed upon it is more beneficial than the construction which I should be disposed to place upon it. I therefore confine myself with regard to this point to expressing the doubt which I have entertained.

ALLCOCK v. HALL. (a.)

Practice — Trial — New trial — Court of Appeal — Jurisdiction—Power to enter judgment for party moving, instead of granting new trial—Supreme Court of Judicature Act, 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 44), s. 1—R. S. C., 1883, ord. 58, r. 4.

On motion for a new trial under 53 & 54 Vict. c. 44, the Court of Appeal has jurisdiction, instead of granting a new trial, to direct judgment to be entered for the party moving, or to make any order which ought to have been made by the court below, in the same way as it could do upon an ordinary appeal.

Motion for new trial.

This was a motion by the defendants to set aside part of the finding of the jury at the trial, and for a new trial, on the ground that part of the finding of the jury was perverse and against the evidence.

The motion was made under the Supreme Court of Judicature Act, 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 44).

It appeared that the action was brought against the defendants, who were timber merchants, by the trustees of a chapel which adjoined the defendants' timber yard. The plaintiffs claimed an injunction to restrain the defendants from continuing a trespass on the property of the plaintiffs. The trespass complained of consisted of the insertion of pieces of wood known as "putlogs" into the chapel wall, and the placing of pieces of timber so as to lean against such "putlogs." Damages were also claimed. The defence was that a right to do the acts in question had been acquired under the Prescription Act (2 & 3 Will. 4, c. 71) by continuous user for more than thirty years.

The action was tried before Hawkins, J., with a special jury at Nottingham. The jury found that the wall had been used for more than thirty years for the purpose of supporting the planks in the position described, but that no "putlogs" were inserted prior to 1878. It was the latter part of the finding that the defendants desired to have set aside. Judgment had been reserved by Hawkins, J.

Dugdale, Q.C., and H. Y. Stanger, for the defendants.—The finding complained of was against the weight of evidence. We ask to have judgment at once entered for us by this court, so that we may not be needlessly put to the expense and delay of a fresh trial.

Cur. adv. vult.

Feb. 4.—LINDLEY, L.J.—This is a motion nominally to set aside part of the finding of a special jury, and for a new trial, but the defendants seek, in fact, to have judgment entered for them at once. [His lordship referred to the facts of the case, and proceeded:—] The impression on the minds of my colleagues and myself is that the finding of the jury was unquestionably wrong. They seem to have misapprehended the nature of the evidence. I have also consulted Hawkins, J., because it is extremely difficult for the Court of Appeal to deal with evidence which comes before them only in writing. The demeanour of the witnesses and other matters are very material in estimating the value of the evidence. The learned judge says that in his opinion the verdict was utterly wrong. Under these circumstances the question is, What ought the Court of Appeal to do? The court is always very cautious about setting aside the verdict of a jury.

The principle on which it acts is laid down in various cases, the most recent of which is the Metropolitan Railway Co. v. Wright, 34 W. R. 746, 11 App. Cas. 152. In giving judgment in the Court of Appeal Lord Selborne, L.C., said: "I have always understood that it is not enough that the judge who tried the case might have come to a different conclusion on the evidence than the jury, or that the judges in the court where the trial is moved for, might have come to a different conclusion; but there must be such a preponderance of evidence, assuming there is evidence on both sides to go to a jury, as to make it unreasonable and almost perverse that the jury, when instructed and assisted properly by the judge, should return such a verdict." And in the same case, when before the House of Lords, Lord Herschell states the principle thus: "The case was one unquestionably within the province of a jury; and, in my opinion, the verdict ought not to be disturbed unless it is one which a jury, viewing the whole of the evidence reasonably, could not properly find." The same principle was recognized by the Privy Council in Brown v. New South Wales Commissioner for Railways, 15 App. Cas. 240, 38 W. R. Dig. 62. Can we say that the present case falls within the rule thus laid down—viz., that though the question was unquestionably within the province of the jury, yet the jury, if they had viewed the whole of the evidence reasonably, could not possibly have found such a verdict? In my opinion, this case has been brought within that rule. It appears to me that the verdict was so utterly irreconcileable with the evidence, when reasonably considered, that it ought to be set aside.

(a.) Reported by R. H. DEANE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

That, however, does not quite dispose of the case. The question now arises whether the court should simply order a new trial, or whether it should exercise the power of entering judgment for the defendants. That is a more difficult matter. Before the passing of Mr. Finlay's Act (53 & 54 Vict. c. 44) this court decided, in Millar v. Toulmin, 34 W. R. 695, 17 Q. B. D. 603, that, on an appeal from an order of a divisional court upon an application for a new trial, the court had power, under ord. 58, r. 4, of the Rules of the Supreme Court, 1883, if all the facts were before the court, to give judgment for the party in whose favour the verdict ought to have been given, instead of directing a new trial. That rule provides that "The Court of Appeal shall have all the powers and duties as to amendment and otherwise of the High Court," and it goes on to say, "The Court of Appeal shall have power to draw inferences of fact, and to give any judgment and make any order which ought to have been made, and to make such further or other order as the case may require." This rule gives the Court of Appeal a much larger power than the Divisional Court have under ord. 40, r. 10, which provides that "upon a motion for judgment, or upon an application for a new trial, the court may draw all inferences of fact not inconsistent with the finding of the jury, and if satisfied that it has before it all the materials necessary for finally determining the questions in dispute, or any of them, or for awarding any relief sought, give judgment accordingly." Upon the latter words of ord. 58, r. 4, the Court of Appeal, in Millar v. Toulmin, decided that it was competent for this court, upon an appeal from an order of a divisional court on a motion for a new trial, if it thought the verdict ought to be set aside, and was satisfied that it had before it all the evidence that could be reasonably expected to be obtained, not only to set aside the verdict for one party, but also to enter judgment for the other party. In my opinion Mr. Finlay's Act has not deprived the Court of Appeal of this power. Section 1 in that Act enacts that "from and after the commencement of this Act every motion for a new trial or to set aside a verdict, finding, or judgment in any cause or matter in the High Court in which there has been a trial thereof, or of any issue therein with a jury, shall be heard and determined by the Court of Appeal, and not by a divisional court of the High Court." That section does not make a motion to set aside the verdict of a jury technically an appeal; but when the motion comes before this court it can, in my opinion, exercise, with regard to the motion, all the powers which it possesses as the Court of Appeal. I think, therefore, that, though the present application is not technically an appeal, we can and ought to exercise the power conferred on us by rule 4 of order 58, as we are satisfied that nothing will be gained by ordering a new trial. Judgment must, therefore, be entered for the defendants, with costs, in both courts.

LOPES, L.J.—As to the principal question on this appeal, I am satisfied that the verdict was wrong. It was one which twelve men, looking at the evidence reasonably, could not have given. It was a perverse verdict, and in this view I am confirmed by the opinion of Hawkins, J. What, then, ought this court to do? Beyond doubt it ought, at least, to grant a new trial. But it was contended, and rightly as I think, that the court ought to enter judgment for the defendants. I am clearly of opinion that the court has the power to do this, and I am satisfied that if the case were sent to a new trial no fresh evidence could be usefully given on behalf of the plaintiffs. All the materials are before the court to enable it to deal with the case if it has power to do so.

The 1st section of Mr. Finlay's Act has been already referred to; but I would also notice the rule which was made in August last under that Act, and which provides that "every motion for a new trial or to set aside a verdict, finding, or judgment where there has been a trial thereof, or of any issue therein with a jury, shall be entered in the Court of Appeal in the same way as motions by way of appeal to the Court of Appeal are now entered where there has been a trial without a jury. Such first-mentioned motions shall be subject to ord. 39, r. 4, and shall be brought before the Court of Appeal in like manner as an appeal."

I think that the effect of that rule is to put a motion for a new trial in the same position as an appeal, and, if that be so, a motion for a new trial will be governed by ord. 58, r. 4. When we contrast that rule with the corresponding rule which applied to motions for a new trial in a divisional court, ord. 40, r. 10, the difference in the language is very marked. Rule 10 of order 40 contained the words "not inconsistent with the finding of the jury"; but there are no similar words in rule 4 of order 58. This is a most important difference. Therefore, in my opinion, under the circumstances of the present case, the Court of Appeal has power to enter judgment for the defendants. Millar v. Toulmin is a direct authority upon the construction of ord. 58, r. 4, so far as it related to an appeal to the Court of Appeal before Mr. Finlay's Act; and if I am right in saying that motions for a new trial are now governed by the same rules, that authority is applicable to the present case. I ought to add that when Millar v. Toulmin came before the House of Lords (12 App. Cas. 746, 36 W. R. Dig. 152) Lord Halsbury, L.C., expressed some doubt whether the Court of Appeal had the jurisdiction which they had assumed under ord. 58, r. 4; but this was but a dictum, and the other lords (Lord Watson and Lord Fitzgerald) expressed no opinion on this point. Therefore the decision of the Court of Appeal is still binding on this court.

KAY, L.J.—I feel no doubt that the verdict was unreasonable and cannot stand. The other question is one of great importance and of some difficulty. The case comes before the court, not by way of an appeal proper, but on a motion for a new trial. The other branch of the Court of Appeal, in a recent case of Heckscher v. Crosley, ante, p. 211, [1891] 1 Q. B. 224, held that as it was not the practice in the Queen's Bench Division to order security for costs of a motion for a new trial before Mr. Finlay's Act, the Court of Appeal would not make such an order now. Although I was a party to that decision I felt some doubt about it. That decision certainly went some way to show that motions for a new trial are not to be treated as appeals for all purposes, but now the question is whether the Court of Appeal has the same powers in dealing with applications in the nature of appeals as it would have if they were appeals. The 10th rule of order 40 did not treat a motion for a new trial as an appeal, but the language is changed in rule 4 of order 58. That rule gives certain powers to the Court of Appeal which are not confined to appeals properly so called. The present application, though not strictly an appeal, is very much in the nature of an appeal, and has some of the same incidents. Such a motion may, for instance, ask to have a judgment set aside for misdirection by the judge. The object of Mr. Finlay's Act was to prevent the necessity of going first to the Divisional Court and then to the Court of Appeal—to eliminate, in fact, the Divisional Court. It seems to me to follow logically, according to the true intent and meaning of the Act and the rule, that the Court of Appeal, when such an application comes before it, may exercise all the powers which it has as the Court of Appeal, and that in such a case as the present it should, in order to save the parties the trouble and expense of a new trial, where no further evidence can be adduced, make the order which ought to have been made by the court below.

LINDLEY, L.J.—I wish to add that we have consulted our colleagues in the other branch of the court, who have carefully considered the point, and agree in our decision.

In re DRUMMOND AND DAVIES' CONTRACT. (a.)

Married woman—Acknowledgment by—Tenant in tail—Base fee—Concurrence of husband—Fines and Recoveries Act (3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 74), ss. 1, 15, 19, 40, 77—Married Women's Property Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 75), s. 1, sub-section 1; s. 2.

By an indenture dated in 1884, duly enrolled, two ladies, then spinsters and tenants in tail in remainder, barred their estates tail and conveyed certain lands to S. for the base fee thereby created. The two ladies afterwards married after the commencement of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882. Subsequently to their marriages the protector of the settlement died, and the base fee fell into possession. The two ladies then executed a deed, unacknowledged and without the concurrence of their husbands, for the purpose of enlarging the base fee into a fee simple absolute.

Held, that the deed was effectual to pass the fee simple absolute.

By an indenture dated the 21st of August, 1884, and made between Evelina Harriet Fane of the first part, and Christine Louisa Fane of the second part, Constance Edwina Adelaide Fane of the third part, and Marion Elizabeth Stucley of the fourth part, and duly enrolled, every of them, the said E. H. Fane, C. L. Fane, and C. E. A. Fane, as and according to the several parts or shares, estates, and interests to which she was entitled as tenant in tail, whether originally or by way of cross-remainders expectant on the estate tail of any sister of hers, granted to the said M. E. Stucley, her heirs and assigns, the Fane moiety of and in a certain farm and hereditaments, to hold the same unto and to the use of the said M. E. Stucley, her heirs and assigns, subject and without prejudice to the estates, charges, and incumbrances limited by the will of Sir James Williams, or by reference thereto, which were, prior to the estates thereby limited to the daughters of Susan Hester Fane in tail originally, or to the estates thereby limited by way of cross-remainders between such daughters respectively, and to the powers annexed to such preceding estates, and any estates or interests limited in exercise of such powers, or such of them as were then subsisting and capable of taking effect, but freed and discharged from all estates in tail whatsoever of the said E. H. Fane, C. L. Fane, and C. E. A. Fane, and every of them, and all remainders, reversions, estates, rights, titles, interests, powers, to take effect after the determination or in defeasance of such estates tail, or each and every of them.

At the date of the indenture of August 21, 1884, the parties thereto, daughters of Sarah Hester Fane, were tenants in tail in remainder under the will of Sir James Williams.

Two of them—namely, C. E. A. Fane and C. L. Fane—married in the years 1885 and 1889 respectively.

The tenant for life protector of the settlement died on the 15th of August, 1889.

By an indenture dated the 7th of December, 1889, and made between E. H. Fane of the first part, C. L. Hamlyn of the second part, C. E. A. Lady Manners of the third part, and M. E. Stucley of the fourth part, and duly enrolled in order to defeat all remainders, reversions, estates, rights, titles, interests, and powers to take effect after the determination or in defeasance of the base fees into which the estates tail of the said E. H. Fane, C. L. Hamlyn, and C. E. A. Lady Manners were respectively converted by the operation of the indenture of the 21st of August, 1884, and in order to enlarge the base fee of the said M. E. Stucley in the several parts or shares by the same indenture expressed to be granted of the moiety of the hereditaments therein described into a fee simple absolute, and to perfect the title of the said M. E. Stucley to the same shares, the said E. H. Fane, C. L. Hamlyn, and C. E. A. Lady Manners respectively, as and according to the several parts or shares, estates, and interests to which she respectively became entitled as tenant in tail, whether originally or by way of cross-remainders expectant on the estate in tail of any sisters of her, granted, disposed of, and confined to the said M. E. Stucley, her heirs and assigns, the Fane moiety of the said farm and hereditaments, to hold the same to the use of the said M. E. Stucley, her heirs and assigns for ever, subject and without prejudice to the estates, charges, and incumbrances limited by the said will of the said Sir James Williams, or by reference thereto, which were prior to the estates thereby limited to the daughters of the said Susan Hester Fane in tail general originally or to the estates thereby limited by way of cross-remainders between such daughters respectively, and to the powers annexed to such preceding estates and any estates or interest limited in exercise, or such of them subsisting and capable of taking effect, but freed and discharged from all remainders, reversions, estates, rights, titles, interests, and powers to take effect after the determination or in defeasance of the base fees into which such estates tail respectively were converted by the operation of the said indenture of the 21st of August, 1884, and every of them.

This was a summons taken out by a purchaser of part of the lands to determine the question whether the indenture of the 7th of December, 1889, ought to have been acknowledged by Lady Manners and C. L. Hamlyn, the two tenants in tail, who were married women, under section 40 of the Fines and Recoveries Act.

Byrne, Q.C, and Cruickshank, for the summons, in support of the contention that the deed ought to have been acknowledged cited section 1, sub-section 1, and section 2 of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, and In re Smith's Estate, 35 W. Byrne, Q.C., replied.

CHITTY, J., after stating the facts, continued as follows:—The question turns upon the effect which the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, has as to women married after its commencement upon the provisions as to married women contained in the Fines and Recoveries Act. The principal sections of these statutes are the 1st (sub-section 1) and the 2nd of the former Act, and the 1st, 15th, 19th, 40th, and 77th of the latter Act. The object of the latter Act, as appears from its title and provisions, was to abolish the cumbrous and expensive proceedings of fines and recoveries and to substitute more simple modes of assurance. In the case of married women, acknowledgment of the deed was substituted for the separate examination in court, and the concurrence of the husband was retained because his consent was required where his wife was a party to the fine or recovery, on the ground of his interest and of the necessity that he should be a party to proceedings in which his wife was concerned. Neither the concurrence of the husband nor the acknowledgment by the married woman was required for the purpose of protecting the settlement; special provisions for that purpose are separately made by the Act. Speaking generally, it was an object of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, to remove the disability of coverture and to enable a married woman to hold and dispose of property as if she were a feme sole.

Now in order to arrive at the right conclusion in this case it appears to be convenient to consider the position of a married woman under the two statutes in reference to real property, first, where she is tenant in fee simple; secondly, where she is tenant in tail in possession or remainder; and, thirdly, where she has barred her estate tail, and the base fee has fallen into possession. As I have to deal only with the case of women married since the commencement of the Act of 1882, I must be understood, when speaking of a married woman, as meaning generally a woman married after the commencement of the Act of 1882.

First, as to the lands of which a married woman is tenant in fee simple in possession or remainder. The 77th section of the Fines and Recoveries Act, in substitution for the old fine, enables her by deed to dispose of such lands as effectually as she could do if she were a feme sole, save that no such disposition shall be valid unless the husband concurs in the deed and it is acknowledged. Section 1, sub-section 1, of the Act of 1882, read in connection with the 2nd section of the same Act, enables her to acquire and "dispose of" all real property belonging to her at the marriage, or acquired by or devolving upon her subsequently, as if she were a feme sole. It cannot be doubted that the effect of the Act of 1882 is to abolish in such cases the necessity of the concurrence of the husband and of the acknowledgment of the deed, and thus to enable the married woman to make a valid disposition of her fee simple lands, whether in possession or in remainder. If any support could be required for this opinion, it would be found in the decision of Lord Westbury in Taylor v. Meads, where, overruling the court below, he held that, notwithstanding the 77th section of the Fines and Recoveries Act, a married woman could, without acknowledged deed or the concurrence of her husband, dispose of an equitable estate in fee of lands limited to her in fee simple for her separate use

Secondly, where the married woman is tenant in tail in possession or remainder. By the 40th section of the Fines and Recoveries Act the disposition of the land by tenant in tail must be by deed, but if the tenant in tail is a married woman the same restrictions as to the concurrence of the husband and the acknowledgment as are found in the 77th section are imposed on her disposition to render it effectual. These restrictions, imposed simply in reference to the disability of coverture and the interest of the husband, appear to me to be also removed by section 1, sub-section 1, and section 2 of the Act of 1882. The restrictions being thus removed, her disposition takes effect under and subject to section 15 and the other provisions of the Fines and Recoveries Act just as if she were a feme sole. Consequently, where she is tenant in tail in possession her disposition bars the remainders over and passes a fee simple absolute; where she is tenant in tail in remainder her disposition without the consent of the protector bars the estate tail and creates a base fee.

I should not have entered upon the examination of these two questions had I not thought the discussion would assist in arriving at the right answer to the actual question which arises in this case. The precise question turns upon the 19th section of the Fines and Recoveries Act read in connection with the 1st, 15th, and 40th and the other sections of that Act, and the 1st section, sub-section 1, and the 2nd section of the Act of 1882. The 19th section applies where an estate tail has been barred and converted into a base fee, and in such case it empowers the person who, if such estate had not been barred, would have been actual tenant in tail "to dispose" of the lands as against all persons whose estates are to take effect after the determination or in defeasance of the base fee into which the estate tail has been converted, "so as to enlarge the base fee into a fee simple absolute." For the definition of the terms "base fee," "actual tenant in tail," and "tenant in tail," reference should be made to section 1 of the Act. According to that section "actual tenant in tail" means exclusively the tenant of an estate tail which shall not have been barred, and such shall be deemed an actual tenant in tail although the estate tail may have been divested or turned to a right; and "tenant in tail" means not only actual tenant in tail, but also a person who, where an estate tail has been barred and converted into a base fee, would have been tenant of such estate tail if the same had not been barred.

The power or right of enlarging the base fee is, by the 19th section, conferred, not on the person in whom the base fee is vested, but on the person who would have been actual tenant in tail had the estate not been barred. Where such person is a married woman the restrictions imposed by the 40th section apply to her disposition under the 19th section. The 19th section did not create a new right, but merely substituted a new and simpler mode of disposing of the lands for a fee simple absolute than that which previously existed. It was clear when the Act was passed that the tenant in tail, after he had barred the estate tail by fine, could afterwards, by suffering a recovery, bar the remainder over. There was, indeed, a question at one time whether the issue in tail could, after the estate tail had been barred by the ancestor's fine, bar the remainder over, but the better opinion was that the issue could do so. For authority on these points it will be sufficient to refer to the elaborate opinions of Mr. Fearne in his posthumous works and the decision there cited, and to Preston on Conveyancing and Burton's Compendium.

It is not surprising to find that the older lawyers were not agreed as to the reason why the recovery had this effect; perhaps the least fictitious and the most intelligible to modern lawyers among the many reasons given is that a recovery was, in substance, regarded merely as a conveyance, and that a tenant in tail who, by levying a fine, and thus defeating or divesting the estate tail and turning it into a right had made the less operative conveyance, had not thereby destroyed his right to make the more sweeping conveyance by a recovery. Whether after the conveyance by fine to a third person there remained in the tenant in tail a scintilla juris or the estate tail was still deemed to subsist in him so as to make a subsequent recovery suffered by him effectual, by whatever name, more or less artificial, his right was called, and on whatever reason, however fictitious, his right was founded, it is clear that by a subsequent recovery he could convert the base fee created by a fine into a fee simple absolute. This right of completely unfettering the estate and conveying the whole fee may, if not with perfect precision, at all events with sufficient accuracy, be described "as real property belonging to" him.

Now it would be a strange and anomalous result of the two Acts of Parliament under consideration if a married woman can by deed not acknowledged and without the concurrence of her husband dispose of the lands for a fee simple absolute when she is tenant in tail in possession, but cannot dispose of the lands so as to enlarge the base fee into a fee simple absolute when the base fee has fallen into possession merely because she has, either when sole or covert, disposed of the lands for a base fee while her estate tail was in remainder. The argument for the purchaser was that the 19th section of the Fines and Recoveries Act conferred a mere power, and that this statutory power must be exercised strictly according to the statute by a married woman—that is, acknowledged deed and with the concurrence of her husband. This argument, if pressed to its extreme length, would, as it seems to me, result in denying to the married woman (married after the Act of 1882) the right of disposing of the lands of which she is tenant in fee simple or in fee tail. The contention of the purchaser was that the ladies, having disposed of the lands for a base fee to Lady Stucley by the deed of 1884, there remained in them no estate or interest or property at the time of their marriage, and consequently that it cannot be said as to these lands that there was any real property which belonged to them at their marriage or which was acquired by or devolved upon them afterwards within the meaning of the 2nd section of the Act of 1882.

It was urged that these words cut down the meaning of the words in the general enabling section (section 1, sub-section 1, which confers on married women the capacity of "disposing of any real property as her separate estate as if she were feme sole." In support of the argument reliance was placed upon the decision of the Court of Appeal in In re Cuno, 43 Ch. D. 12, where it was held that the force of the general enabling section was restricted by the 5th section in the case of a woman married before the commencement of the Act, a case with which I am not dealing. Marriage before and marriage after the commencement of the Act stand obviously on different footings. When the marriage had taken place before the Act an interest had already vested in the husband, of which it would be unjust to deprive him by a retrospective enactment.

But I do not question the proposition that in the case of a woman married after the commencement of the Act reference may properly be made to the 2nd section. Taking the two sections together I see no reason for adopting the narrow construction for which the purchaser contends. When Acts of Parliament are open to two interpretations the court is at liberty to adopt that which is the more reasonable and which makes the enactment as a whole consistent. The phrase in the 19th section of the Fines and Recoveries Act is "dispose of the lands," a phrase which constantly occurs in other parts of the Act. It tallies with the phrase "dispose of any real property" in section 1, sub-section 1, of the Act of 1882. The terms "any real property which shall belong to her" in the 2nd section (although terms not unusual among lawyers) are not highly technical terms requiring a perfectly strict construction, such, for instance, as the word "seised." The case of In re Smith is distinguishable. There it was held that where a restricted power was conferred on a married woman for a special object by a particular statute (43 Geo. 3, c. 108), which itself created an exception out of a former general prohibitory statute, the restrictions on the power were not removed by a general enabling Act (the Act of 1882). In the case before me I am dealing with two general Acts.

In the result, for the reasons above stated, I hold the deed of December, 1889, was effectual to pass the fee simple absolute. The order should be drawn stating my opinion to that effect. The purchaser must pay the costs.

In re QUEENSLAND MERCANTILE AND AGENCY CO. (LIMITED).

Ex parte AUSTRALASIAN INVESTMENT CO. (LIMITED).

Ex parte UNION BANK OF AUSTRALIA (LIMITED). (a.)

Conflict of law—Company—Uncalled capital—Debenture—Scotch arrestment—Priority—Notice.

The Queensland Mercantile and Agency Co. issued debentures to the Union Bank of Australia charging the uncalled capital in respect of some of its shares. After call, but prior to payment, the Australasian Investment Co. obtained in Scotland an arrestment on the unpaid calls of shareholders resident in Scotland. Such shareholders had no notice of the debentures.

Evidence was given that a Scotch arrestment was equivalent to an assignment with notice, and had priority to an assignment without notice.

The Queensland Co. was being wound up in Queensland and England, the law in both countries being the same.

Held, that the Australasian Investment Co. had priority, as Scotch law regulated priority on the proceeds of Scotchshares.

Summons.

A summons was issued by the Union Bank of Australia, which was an English company, asking that the English liquidator in the winding up of the Queensland Mercantile and Agency Co. might be ordered to transfer to the bank the sums of New Consols and cash standing in his name which represented the proceeds of calls in respect of the Queensland Co.'s shares numbered 1 to 2500.

Another summons, by the Investment Co., was heard at the same time, asking that, out of the money received from the Scotch shareholders in the Queensland Co. the sum of £12,666 4s. 5d. might be paid to the Investment Co. in priority to all other payments.

The Queensland Co. was registered, and carried on besiness in Queensland, and issued, in 1866, debentures to the Union Bank, by which the sums secured were made a first charge on the uncalled capital of the shares numbered 1 to 2500, upon each of which £50 was then uncalled.

In 1886 the £50 per share was called up, of which the first instalment was payable in February, 1887.

Notice of the call, but no notice of the debentures was given to the shareholders.

In February, 1887, the Investment Co., which was a Scotch company, obtained in Scotland an arrestment against holders of the Queensland Co.'s shares in Scotland, which made them secured creditors.

Various actions were commenced in England against the Queensland Co., and a receiver appointed to get in the calls.

Winding up proceedings were commenced, and orders made both in Queensland and England.

The official liquidator received from Scotch shareholders about £25,000.

The amount claimed by the bank was ascertained in the Queensland winding up, and, after allowing for securities, amounted to £31,000.

The Investment Co. and the English judgment creditors both claimed priority to the bank.

Sir Horace Davey, Q.C., Buckley, Q.C., and S. Dickinson, for the bank. — Priority between claimants to a debt is determined by the law of the domicil of the creditor who owns it: Hunter v. Potts, 4 T. R. 182; Sill v. Worswick, 1 H. Bl. 665; Story's Conflict of Laws, ch. 9, s. 374; Colonial Bank v. Cady, ante, p. 17, 15 App. Cas. 267; and Simpson v. Fogo, 1 H. & M. 195. The law of Scotland does not apply. The arrestment is only a judgment, and does not affect the interest of the debenture-holders. Claimants under judicial process against the assignors can only take subject to the prior debenture charge: Badeley v. Consolidated Bank, 36 W. R. 745, 38 Ch. D. 238; Ex parte Whitehouse, 34 W. R. 681, 32 Ch. D. 512; and Eyre v. McDowell, 9 H. L. Cas. 619. The doctrine of notice has no application in favour of a judgment creditor.

Crackanthorpe, Q.C., and Rawlins, for the Investment Co.—The evidence of Scotch law is clear that the assignment of the calls by the debentures was ineffectual for want of notice at time of arrestment. It is undisputed that the effect of the arrestment and notice was the same as an actual assignment, and the shareholders in Scotland had no notice of the prior assignment, so that even by English law the Investment Co. has priority as assignees by virtue of the arrestment: Arden v. Arden, 33 W. R. 593, 29 Ch. D. 702.

Everitt, Q.C., and Swinfen Eady, for the English judgment creditors.

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., and Kenyon Parker, for the English liquidator.

Buckley, Q.C., replied.

NORTH, J., held that the debentures created a valid charge on the uncalled capital, and had priority to the English judgment creditors, and reserved judgment on the question of priority as between the Investment Co. and the bank.

Jan. 14.—NORTH, J.—The only evidence in this case of the Scotch law is contained in the affidavit of the Scotch solicitor of the Australian Investment Co. I do not think this satisfactory, but as the Union Bank of Australia have not asked me for an opportunity to go into additional evidence, the evidence as to Scotch law, which is here a question of fact, is all one way. By such evidence it appears that an arrestment is equivalent to an actual assignment of the calls in dispute duly intimated, and that this has by the law of Scotland priority over the assignment of the bank, intimation of which had not been given at the date when the assignment by arrestment became complete, and I am compelled to decide accordingly.

On behalf of the bank it was contended that the claim of the Investment Co. could only be valid as against "the sums attached," which was alleged to be what might remain of the calls after satisfying the bank's claims, but this is inconsistent with the language of the arrestment, which applies specifically to the whole sum due for calls from each shareholder on whom the arrestment was served. Further, that after the assignment to the bank all that the Queensland Co. had left was the surplus remaining over after paying the bank; that the rest of the calls belonged to the bank; and that it was contrary to principle and authority to hold that a process of law against the debtor could affect what was the property of the bank. In this case, however, I have not to deal with a mere process of law, but with what is established as a fact to be equivalent to an actual assignment, and which, on the evidence, I must regard as if an actual assignment had been executed and intimated.

The bank also claim priority in another way. They say that whatever the position of matters might be if all the parties had been domiciled in Scotland, they in fact are not so; that the Queensland Co. were creditors in respect of the debt due from the shareholders for calls; that this company was domiciled in Queensland, and therefore the validity of their assignment to the bank depends upon the law of Queensland, and not on that of the debtor's residence; that by the law of Queensland no notice was necessary, and that a transfer of personal or movable property valid by the law of the owner's domicil is valid wherever the property is situated. They rely on the principle mobilia sequuntur personam, or as Lord Loughborough states in Sill v. Worswick, 1 H. Bl. 690: "It is a clear proposition, not only of the law of England, but of every country in the world, where law has the semblance of science, that personal property has no locality. The meaning of that is, not that personal property has no visible locality, but that it is subject to that law which governs the person of the owner. With respect to the disposition of it, with respect to the transmission of it, either by succession or the act of the party, it follows the law of the person. The owner in any country may dispose of his personal property. If he dies, it is not the law of the country in which the property is, but the law of the country of which he was a subject, that will regulate the succession." There is, however, another rule, that a transfer of movable property duly carried out according to the law of the place where it is situated is not rendered nugatory by showing that such transfer as carried out is not in accordance with what would be required by law in the country where its owner is domiciled. Now, the Queensland Co. did certain acts by virtue of which certain legal rights arose in Scotland having identically the same effect in all respects as if the Queensland Co. had on the date of the arrestment executed an assignment of the calls in question to the Investment Co. and such assignment had been forthwith intimated to the persons in whose hands the calls were arrested. Such an assignment would, according to the evidence, clearly have been preferred to another assignment of an earlier date not completed by notice, and in my opinion the right of those who have acquired an unexceptionable title and have recovered the property according to the law of the country where it is found and arrested cannot be defeated by showing that if the property had been elsewhere the bank's title might have been the better. I speak of the Investment Co. having recovered the calls, though as a matter of convenience they have been received by the official liquidator, because they would have actually received them if the action had not been stayed, and the rights of the parties cannot be affected by the court having stayed the action, as by the order staying the action their right or security was expressly left unprejudiced.

I accede to the summons of the Investment Co., and direct payment of the balance of the Scotch calls to the bank.

From Chan. Div. Nov. 18—21; Dec. 16.

SIMMONS v. LONDON JOINT-STOCK BANK.
LITTLE v. LONDON JOINT-STOCK BANK. (a.)

Banker—Broker—Pledge of securities en bloc*—Negotiable instrument—*Bonâ fide holder for value—Foreign bonds—Share warrants in English company—Companies Act, 1867, s. 27.

Authority given to a stockbroker by his client to pledge the client's securities does not carry with it in law an implied authority to pledge the client's securities en bloc with those of others for a lump sum.

S. had deposited for custody with a stockbroker bonds of a foreign corporation, transferable by delivery from hand to hand. The stockbroker, to raise money for his own purposes, and without the knowledge of S., sold the bonds, but on the same day repurchased similar bonds of equal value, and immediately on their delivery made an entry in his books substituting the numbers of the newly-purchased bonds for the numbers of the original bonds belonging to S. The bonds so purchased were paid for by the stockbroker by means of a crossed cheque (dated the 28th of October, 1887) drawn by him on his own bank. In order to put himself in funds at the bank to meet the whole of the cheques drawn by him on that day, the stockbroker, on the same day, but after the said alteration of the numbers in his book, pledged the bonds so purchased, together with other securities, en bloc to the bank; and the bank thereupon credited his account with a large advance, out of which the whole of the cheques drawn by him on the 28th of October were cashed. The stockbroker subsequently absconded, and S. brought an action against the bank to recover the price of the bonds in question, which had been sold by the bank at a price admittedly fair, together with interest thereon at four per cent.

The inferences of fact drawn from the evidence by the Court of Appeal were—(a) that the bank knew that the bonds in question might probably belong to a client of the stockbroker; (b) that the bank did not believe that the stockbroker had been expressly authorized by his client to pledge the bonds en bloc with the securities of other persons; but (c) that the bank, relying on the honesty of the stockbroker, believed that he had been authorized by his client to raise some money on the bonds, and honestly believed that such authority carried with it as a matter of law authority to pledge the bonds en bloc.

(a.) Reported by M. J. BLAKE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Held, on these facts, that the stockbroker had appropriated the newly-purchased bonds to S. before pledging them to the bank, and, even assuming that the bonds in question were negotiable instruments in the full sense of the term "negotiable," yet that the bank never became bonâ fide holders of the bonds for value without notice, and accordingly that S. was entitled to the relief claimed.

The same stockbroker, acting on instructions from L., and having received money from him for that purpose, purchased for L. shares in a foreign company, shares in an English company, and bonds of a foreign Government. The share certificates of the foreign company were transferable by delivery from hand to hand, as were also the share warrants of the English company, and the bonds of the foreign Government were payable to bearer.

With respect to the foreign company's shares, those purchased for L. were delivered to the stockbroker, who entered them by their numbers in his book as belonging to L. With respect to the English company's shares, those contracted to be purchased for L. were not delivered to the stockbroker, but he purchased and took delivery of a number of similar shares, and entered them as L.'s in the number book. With respect to the bonds of the foreign Government, they were contracted to be purchased for L. in two lots, and one lot so purchased was actually delivered to the stockbroker, and their numbers entered as L.'s in the number book. The other lot was not delivered to the stockbroker, but he purchased and took delivery of an equal number of similar bonds, and entered them as L.'s in his number book. The stockbroker, without the knowledge of L., pledged these shares and bonds en bloc with securities belonging to others, to his bank for objects and under circumstances similar to those mentioned with regard to the bonds of S.

The same inferences of fact were drawn by the Court of Appeal from the evidence in L.'s case as in the case of S.

Held, on these facts, that the shares and bonds taken by the stockbroker in substitution of those contracted to be purchased for L. had been appropriated by the stockbroker to L. before they were pledged to the bank, and, assuming that the bonds and shares in question were negotiable instruments in the full sense of the term, that the bank were not bonâ fide holders for value without notice, and, accordingly, that the bank should restore them to L.

Quære, whether the shares in question were negotiable instruments.

Decision of Kekewich, J., affirmed.

Appeals from Kekewich, J.

SIMMONS v. LONDON JOINT-STOCK BANK.

In 1887 the plaintiff Simmons was a customer of the firm of Herapath, Delmar, & Co., who carried on business as stockbrokers on the London Stock Exchange.

On October 12, 1887, the said firm held for safe custody on behalf of the plaintiff, bonds belonging to him of the Buenos Ayres Land Mortgage Bank of the "J" series (generally known on the London Stock Exchange as "Cedulas") for the amount of 15,000dols.

On that day the said firm, desiring to obtain a temporary advance, and without any authority or knowledge of the plaintiff, entered into a contract with Messrs. Prior & Williams (a firm of stock jobbers) for the sale of the said bonds for the next settling day (October 14), and also on the same day (October 12) contracted with Messrs. Prior & Williams to repurchase for October 28 like bonds of the same amount (15,000dols.).

In pursuance of this contract the said firm on October 14 delivered the plaintiff's bonds to Messrs. Prior & Williams, and on October 28 in pursuance of the contract for repurchase the said firm received from a firm of brokers named Greenwell & Co.,

"Cedula" bonds of the "J" series for the same amount but with different denoting numbers.

The defendant bank was the bank with which the said firm dealt; and the said firm paid Messrs. Greenwell & Co. for the bonds delivered by Messrs. Greenwell & Co. to them by a crossed cheque for £1,845 drawn on the defendant bank.

The said firm on receipt of the bonds so purchased from Messrs. Greenwell & Co. immediately entered the same (in the usual course of business) in their number book as belonging to the plaintiff.

On the morning of October 28 the said firm had a balance to their credit at the defendant bank which exceeded the sum of £1,845, but they required to draw other cheques for large amounts on the defendant bank on that day, and accordingly, in order to provide money to meet the various cheques drawn by them on the defendant bank on that day, they, on the same day (October 28), deposited with the defendant bank the bonds delivered to them by Messrs. Greenwell & Co., together with other securities, and the defendant bank thereupon placed the sum of £6,000 to their credit, and the various cheques drawn by the said firm on the defendant bank on October 28 (including the cheque for £1,845) were duly paid.

The bonds so deposited with the defendant bank remained in their custody (Delmar meanwhile paying the plaintiff Simmons the interest thereon) till June, 1888, when Delmar failed and left the country. The defendant bank then sold the bonds, together with the other securities so deposited, for a price admittedly fair. On June 14, 1888, the plaintiff Simmons, having then first discovered what had been done by Delmar, brought this action against the defendant bank to recover the amount of the bonds. Kekewich, J., held that the plaintiff Simmons was entitled to succeed, and that the measure of the liability of the defendant bank was the price which the securities had realized, with four per cent. interest from the date of realization.

The defendant bank appealed.

Sir Horace Davey, Q.C., Finlay, Q.C., and W. D. Rawlins, for the appellants.—Two questions arise—First, assuming that the bonds deposited with the bank were the plaintiff Simmons's bonds, can the plaintiff recover them or their proceeds from the bank under the circumstances of the case—i.e., Have not the bank a good title to the bonds as against the true owners? Secondly, were the bonds so deposited in fact ever Simmons's bonds at all? The judge below held as an inference from the course of dealing between the bank and the brokers that the bank were put on inquiry to see whether the bonds did or did not belong to the brokers, and that the bank, not having inquired, did not take the bonds with due care, and he accordingly held that the case was governed by Sheffield v. London Joint-Stock Bank, 37 W. R. 33, 13 App. Cas. 333. The judgment of the House of Lords in that case, however, depended on the inference of facts drawn from the course of business in that particular case—viz., that Mozley's business consisted in lending his clients' securities to banks at a higher rate of interest than that at which he got them from his clients, and that the bank there knew that was Mozley's business. The essential facts in that case are not to be found here. The evidence only shows that the course of dealing between the bank and the brokers was that the brokers were allowed to withdraw securities they had deposited with the bank and to sell or replace them, provided they kept their securities up to a certain proportion with the advances received from the bank. The bank were entitled to take the securities without presuming fraud or dishonesty on the part of the brokers. These bonds passed by delivery on the Stock Exchange, and they were treated as negotiable instruments according to the admissions made in the court below. [LINDLEY, L.J.—Negotiable in what sense? as instruments passing by delivery, or as negotiable in the sense in which a bill of exchange is negotiable? Crouch v. Credit Foncier, 21 W. R. 946, L. R. 8 Q. B. 374.] Negotiable in the sense that the title to the property in them passes by delivery: Goodwin v. Robarts, 24 W. R. 987, 1 App. Cas. 476; Lorymer v. Smith, 1 B. & C. 1; Gorgier v. Mieville, 3 B. & C. 45; Wookey v. Pole, 4 B. & Ald. 1. The course of dealing between brokers and their clients depends on what is called the custom of "continuations": Bongiovanni v. Société Générale, 54 L. T. N. S. 320, 24 W. R. Dig. 154. But in fact the bonds deposited with the bank were not Simmons's bonds, nor had they been appropriated as Simmons's by Delmar. Delmar had no power to appropriate them to Simmons absolutely, for he had not then paid for them, the cheque which he gave in payment for them not having been then cashed, and it was not cashed until after Delmar had deposited the bonds with the defendant bank; payment by cheque is only conditional payment, and until the cheque is cashed the property does not pass to the purchaser: Loughnan v. Barry, Ir. Rep. 6 C. L. 457; Bishop v. Shillito, 2 B. & Ald. 329; Benjamin on Sales, 4th ed., pp. 282, 304; the utmost interest in the bonds that Delmar had power to appropriate to Simmons was the equity of redemption after the lien of the bank had been discharged.

Rigby, Q.C., Warmington, Q.C., and Grosvenor Woods, for the plaintiff Simmons.—We have never admitted that these "Cedulas" are negotiable instruments in the legal sense of that term, although we do admit that they pass by delivery from hand to hand on the Stock Exchange. The bank took them subject to the equitable rights of Simmons: Crouch v. Credit Foncier. The case of Goodwin v. Robarts was commented on in Colonial Bank v. Cady, ante, p. 17, 15 App. Cas. 267, per Lord Bramwell, at p. 282. The present case is governed by Sheffield v. London Joint-Stock Bank. In the present case the evidence and the admissions together show that it is a well-known course of business for stockbrokers, in addition to buying stocks for their clients, to advance money to their clients, and in order to get the money to pledge their clients' securities en bloc to bankers, the bankers, on the other hand, allowing the securities so pledged to be from time to time withdrawn. The bank in the present case knew that this was the practice of the firm of Herepath, Delmar, & Co., and the bank must, from the course of business they had with that firm, be taken to have known that the firm dealt with securities of their clients, and not their own securities, when they pledged the securities en bloc. The bank, therefore, were bound to inquire whether the firm had authority from the clients whose securities they pledged to act in that way: Cooke v. Eshelby, 35 W. R. 629, 12 App. Cas. 271. On the point as to appropriation, the appropriation to Simmons was really complete on the 12th of October, because the direction or destination of the bonds to be repurchased was fixed on that day, and the bonds, when delivered to Delmar & Co. on the 28th of October, were delivered in accordance with the antecedent direction of the 12th of October. [BOWEN, L.J.—The other side say that these bonds could not be appropriated by Delmar to Simmons until they came into Delmar's possession, and that they only did so subject to the lien of the bank.] There is no evidence to show that the cheque given for these bonds was cashed out of the £6,000 advanced by the bank when these bonds and other securities were deposited with them. On the morning of the 28th of October Delmar had a balance to his credit at the bank, and there is no evidence to show that payment of the cheque he gave for these bonds would or could have been refused by the bank if these bonds had not been deposited with them.

Finlay, Q.C., in reply.—The cheques drawn by Delmar & Co. on the 28th of October were all Clearing House cheques, which came in at the same time, and were all honoured in respect of the £6,000 advanced by the bank. The bank were bonâ fide holders for value of the bonds. The bank believed that Delmar & Co. had authority from their clients to pledge the bonds, and that gives them a good title: Foster v. Pearson, 1 Cr. M. & R. 849; Haynes v. Foster, 2 Cr. & M. 237.

LITTLE v. LONDON JOINT-STOCK BANK.

The securities which formed the subject-matter of this appeal were as follows:—

(1) Certificates for fifty shares in the Imperial Ottoman Bank. These shares passed by delivery of the certificates from hand to hand. They had been bought for the plaintiff Little with Little's money by Herapath, Delmar, & Co., and it was admitted that they had been appropriated to Little by being entered in the books of the firm as Little's before they had been deposited by the firm with the defendant bank.

(2) Share warrants for seventy-five shares in the Rio Tinto Co. This was an English company, and share warrants had been issued with respect to these shares under section 27 of the Companies Act, 1867, stating that the bearer was entitled to the shares therein specified. In April, 1887, Little had instructed Delmar & Co. to purchase for him 100 Rio Tinto shares. The said firm accordingly, on the 9th of April, contracted to buy 100 such shares from Messrs. Prior & Williams. When the time for delivery came it was found that, in the state of the transactions between the said firm and Messrs. Prior & Williams, that the former were bound to deliver to the latter 110 Rio Tinto shares, and accordingly the said firm received no Rio Tinto shares from Messrs. Prior & Williams, but they obtained, on 26th of April, the seventy-five Rio Tinto shares in question from another firm, Messrs. Gregg & Argenti. Little paid the said firm the price of the shares by two cheques given on the 26th and 27th of April respectively. The said firm, without Little's authority or knowledge, on the 26th of April deposited the share warrants for the seventy-five shares, along with other securities, with the defendant bank in order to cover their account there. The shares had been appropriated to Little by being entered in the books of the said firm as belonging to Little, but whether such appropriation took place before or after the advance was made by the bank was a matter of dispute.

(3) Bonds of the Republic of Uruguay Five per Cent. Unified Loan of 1883. Each bond was in the following form:—"The bearer of this bond is entitled to the principal sum of £—, part of the above-mentioned loan, and will be entitled to receive payment of the said principal sum on presentation, and against remainder hereof and of all unmatured coupons, at the counting house of —— in London."

These bonds had been bought by the said firm for Little in two lots. The first lot (of the nominal value of £1,500) was contracted to be bought on the 9th of March, 1888, for the next account day (March 14), and were received by the said firm on that day, and deposited on the next day with the defendant bank as security for advances. They were appropriated to Little by the said firm in their books on the 14th of March. The second lot (of the nominal value of £2,000) was purchased under circumstances similar to those already stated with regard to the Rio Tinto shares. The contract for purchase was made on the 4th of April, 1888, but Delmar & Co. did not receive them till the 26th of April, on which day the said firm deposited them with the defendant bank. They were entered in the books of the said firm, under the date of the 26th of April, as purchased for Little. The said firm paid for these bonds and other securities by cheques drawn on the defendant bank, and but for the advances obtained from the bank on the 26th of April, by means of the securities deposited with the bank on that day, the said firm would not have had sufficient funds at the bank to meet all the cheques drawn by the said firm on that day.

When Delmar absconded in June, 1888, the plaintiff Little for the first time discovered what had been done by Delmar, and then brought this action against the defendant bank.

Kekewich, J., decided in favour of the plaintiff Little, and held that the defendant bank should hand over to the plaintiff Little the various securities in question (which had not been realized), and should account to the plaintiff for any difference in the value of the securities on the 14th of June, 1887 (the date of the issue of the plaintiffs' writ in the action), and the date of trial.

The defendant bank appealed.

Finlay, Q.C., and W. D. Rawlins, for the appellants.—First, as to the Uruguayan bonds. According to the law of Uruguay these bonds pass by mere delivery, and therefore they are negotiable instruments in the full sense of that term—e.g., so that a person taking them honestly and for value, even from a thief, acquires a good title to them: Miller v. Race, 1 Smith's L. C., 9th ed., p. 491; Glyn v. Baker, 13 East, 509; Gorgier v. Mieville, 3 B. & C. 45; Lang v. Smyth, 7 Bing. 284; Crouch v. Credit Foncier, 21 W. R. 946, L. R. 8 Q. B. 374. Goodwin v. Robarts, 24 W. R. 987, 1 App. Cas. 476, is in our favour, the terms of the special case there stated are given in the report in the Law Journal: 44 L. J. Ex. 57. [BOWEN, L.J., referred to the observations made by Lord Selborne, L.C., in France v. Clark, 32 W. R., at p. 468, 26 Ch. D., at p. 264, as to Goodwin v. Robarts. LINDLEY, L.J., referred to Rumball v. Metropolitan Bank, 25 W. R. 366, 2 Q. B. D. 194.] It is a matter of law whether the transferee has a better title than the transferor. Secondly, the Rio Tinto shares are negotiable instruments by virtue of section 27 of the Companies Act, 1867; and the other documents are negotiable instruments by virtue of the usage showing that, according to the law of the foreign countries in which they issued, they are so treated.

They also referred to Ware v. Lord Egmont, 3 W. R. 48, 4 De G. M. & G. 460, and Jones v. Smith, 1 Ha. 43.

Rigby, Q.C., Warmington, Q.C., and Grosvenor Woods, for the respondent, the plaintiff Little.—There is no evidence to show that the bank would or could have refused to cash the cheque drawn by the brokers on the 26th of April to pay for these securities, unless these securities were deposited with them to cover the advance of £6,000. As to the documents being negotiable instruments, in no case except Rumball v. Metropolitan Bank has it ever been held that any document other than a security for money could be a negotiable instrument. In Goodwin v. Robarts the documents were treated as giving the holder a right to the money. Section 27 of the Companies Act, 1867, was never intended to make share warrants and scrip negotiable. There is no evidence of custom amounting to a growth of the law merchant to show that these securities are negotiable in the full sense of that term.

Finlay, Q.C., in reply, mentioned Dixon v. Bovill, 4 W. R. 813, 3 Macq. 1.

Dec. 16.—BOWEN, L.J., read the following judgment of the COURT (LINDLEY, BOWEN, and FRY, L.JJ.):—The plaintiff was a customer of Herapath, Delmar, & Co., stockbrokers, and the action is brought against the defendants, who were Herapath, Delmar, & Co.'s bankers, to recover the value of certain Argentine bonds of the Bank of Buenos Ayres, to the value of 15,000dols. The bonds were securities to bearer, issued with a Government guarantee, and circulated on the European markets. The plaintiff had left in the hands of Delmar, one of the members of Herapath, Delmar, & Co., for custody Argentine bonds to the above amount, but on October 12, 1887, Delmar, desiring to raise money for purposes of his own, and without any authority from the plaintiff, contracted to sell the plaintiff's said bonds to Messrs. Prior & Co. for the sum of £1,820, and on the same day made a further contract to repurchase similar bonds to the value of 15,000dols. for the 28th. On the 28th of October Delmar gave delivery of the bonds he had contracted to sell in three separate lots, and on the same day took delivery from a firm named Greenwell & Co. of the similar but different bonds which he had contracted to buy. Delmar's account with the defendants was overdrawn. For the bonds so delivered to him he paid by a crossed cheque, and in order to put himself in funds to meet it he sent the bonds of which he had taken delivery, with other securities, to the defendant bank, on receipt of which the defendants placed £6,000 to his credit. Out of this sum Delmar's cheque was cashed when it arrived through the Clearing House at the defendant bank. The bonds so deposited remained in the custody of the bank till Delmar failed and left the country in June, 1888. Thereupon the plaintiff, on the 14th of June, applied to the bank for the bonds, which, however, had been sold with the rest of Delmar's securities for a price that is admitted to have been fair.

The counsel for the defendants, who are the appellants, contended, in the first place, before us that the bonds deposited on the 28th with the defendants were Delmar's bonds, and not the plaintiff's, and that the plaintiff was not entitled to complain of their being sold by the defendants against Delmar's debt. It is true that they were not the original bonds left by the plaintiff in Delmar's hands. It becomes necessary, therefore, to consider whether they had become the plaintiff's by substitution and appropriation before being pledged by Delmar to the bank. The contention on the part of the appellants was that the property in the newly-purchased bonds did not vest in Delmar till his cheque was cashed, and that even if it did there was no complete appropriation of the bonds by Delmar to the plaintiff until he had raised the money to pay for them by pledging them to the bank. We are of opinion that the property in the bonds passed to Delmar on the delivery of the bonds in exchange for Delmar's cheque. It is, of course, conceivable in law that by the terms of any particular contract the property in goods delivered may be reserved by the vendor until he sees whether the cheque received by him is honoured, but this is not the ordinary effect of a transaction in which goods are paid for by cheque, and we entertain no doubt that the property in the bonds passed to Delmar on their delivery.

Then comes the inquiry whether there was any appropriation by Delmar of the bonds to the plaintiff, and when such appropriation, if any, took place. When Delmar parted in the first instance with the plaintiff's original bonds his real object was to raise money. The transaction was, indeed, effected by a sale of the plaintiff's bonds and a repurchase of others, which he intended to substitute in their place; but Delmar only parted with the plaintiff's bonds because he could not effect his object in any other way, and would be anxious to replace them by others as soon as possible. Before sending the newly-purchased bonds to the bank a correction was, in fact, made in Herapath, Delmar, & Co.'s number book, which earmarked the new bonds as the plaintiff's; and, although it was attempted to be shown that such entry was made without express authority on Delmar's part, we are of opinion that it was made in the course of his business by an agent who had implied authority to make it, and with a view to complete the transaction. We entertain no doubt, accordingly, that before the bonds were deposited with the bank, and before any lien of the bank could attach, the bonds had become, by substitution and appropriation, the property of the plaintiff.

This leads us to the next contention on the part of the appellants—viz., that the bonds were negotiable securities, and that, the bank having taken them for value and in good faith, without notice that they belonged to Delmar's principal, are entitled to hold them against all the world. Whether the bonds in question were negotiable securities in any sense in which such a commercial doctrine could apply was a matter left unproved. A negotiable instrument payable to bearer is one which by the custom of trade passes from hand to hand by delivery, and the holder of which for the time being, if he is a bonâ fide holder for value without notice, has a good title notwithstanding any defect of title in the person from whom he took it. A contractual document, in other words, may be such that, by virtue of its delivery, all the rights of the transferor are transferred to and can be enforced by the transferee against the original contracting party, but it may yet fall short of being a completely negotiable instrument, because the transferee acquires by mere delivery no better title than his transferor. An admission was made at the trial to the effect that these bonds were commonly transferred from hand to hand by delivery, and this must be taken to be true. But the admission was carefully limited, and still left uncovered the question whether they are negotiable instruments in the sense in which bills of exchange and promissory notes are negotiable, so that delivery by a person who has no title confers, nevertheless, a title on a bonâ fide holder for value without notice. We should require either a more unqualified admission or else more conclusive evidence before we could accept the view that bonds like these had become part of the currency of this country so as to have acquired the peculiar characteristics of a completely negotiable instrument. The appellant's counsel alleged that they had been misled at the trial by the form of the admission, and asked that, before we decided the case on the hypothesis that these bonds were not completely negotiable, an issue might be directed to try that question. For fear of a miscarriage of justice we will, therefore, assume in the appellant's favour, and for the purpose of this case only, that the documents in question had been proved to be completely negotiable instruments, and we proceed to inquire, on that assumption, whether the bank, even if this were so, ever became bonâ fide holders of them for value, without notice of the infirmity of the title of Delmar.

The inferences of fact which we draw, partly from the admissions of the bank's officers and partly from the absence of testimony on their part which might have been given if the fact had been otherwise, are as follows. The bank, we think, were aware that the bonds might very probably belong not to Delmar at all, but to one or more of his clients. The bank took it for granted that, if the bonds did not in fact belong to Delmar, he had been authorized by the real owner to raise money on the bonds, within the limit of their market value. This assumption and belief were based, not on inquiry or investigation, but on the bank's faith in the honesty of Delmar, and was, in fact, erroneous. But the bank did not believe that Delmar had been authorized by the real owner to deposit the bonds en bloc, together with other securities, which belonged to other persons, and to raise a lump sum upon the whole. The bank were, indeed, honestly of opinion that Delmar might lawfully do so, but we think that they based this view upon a mistaken assumption that such deposit en bloc, without authority from the client, was recognized by the law. In other words, they knew that the bonds in question might probably belong to a third person; they did not know and did not believe that the owner had authorized their being deposited and pledged en bloc, but they honestly believed that such an authority from the owner was not necessary in law, if he had sanctioned (as the bank assumed from their faith in Delmar's honesty to be the case) the pledging of the documents for any sum of money whatsoever. If this be the true view of the transaction, the bank never became bonâ fide holders for value without notice, since they never believed that Delmar was the true owner, and never, indeed, believed that any authority had been given by the true owner, which alone in law could justify what was being done. On the contrary, they chose to shut their eyes to this necessary part of the inquiry, under a misconception of the law. The case of Earl of Sheffield v. London Joint-Stock Bank seems to show that, under such circumstances, the bank acquired no title to the bonds as against the true owner. The appeal, therefore, in the case of Simmons v. London Joint-Stock Bank, must be dismissed with costs.

We come next to the case of Little v. London Joint-Stock Bank. In this action the plaintiff Little claims to be entitled to relief against the bank in respect of various securities, which may be classified as follows:—Certificates for shares of £20 each, with £10 paid thereon, in the Imperial Ottoman Bank; share warrants for shares in the Rio Tinto Mining Co. (Limited); bonds in the Uruguay Five per Cent. Unified Loan of 1883. We are ready, as in the previous appeal, to assume, for the purposes of the argument, and in the defendants' favour, that all these securities were impliedly negotiable, although it is difficult to see how shares, share warrants, or certificates of shares in a company, which are not securities for money, can be entitled to that description, and although without further evidence or further admission than was given at the trial, we should question much whether any of the securities in question, at all events other than the Uruguay Government bonds, were completely negotiable instruments within the known commercial and legal definition of that term. We assume, however, for the purposes of the case that they all were negotiable instruments. All of these securities were deposited by Delmar with the defendants for objects and under circumstances similar to those under which the bonds of Mr. Simmons in the previous action were deposited.

It follows, therefore, that the rights of the parties in respect of them will be governed by our previous decision in Simmons v. London Joint-Stock Bank, unless, on examination of the facts in the present action, it should appear that in the case of any of the securities there was no appropriation by Delmar to the plaintiff prior to the deposit with the bank. We proceed, therefore, to examine the question whether there was in fact such an appropriation in respect of all or any of these securities. 1. As to the certificates for shares in the Ottoman Imperial Bank, it was not disputed before us that there had been the necessary appropriation. 2. As to the share warrants for the Rio Tinto shares, on the 9th of April, 1888, Delmar, on the plaintiff's instructions, bought for him from Messrs. Prior & Williams 100 Rio Tinto shares, of which the seventy-five claimed in this action formed a portion. When the time for delivery arrived Delmar received, through the Stock Exchange Clearing House, not the identical shares which he had purchased from Prior & Williams, but an equal number of similar shares from Messrs. Gregg & Argenti. These were received, however, by Delmar in substitution for the actual shares which were the subject of the contract with Prior & Williams, and were appropriated to the plaintiff by number in Herapath, Delmar, & Co.'s number book. They became, thereupon, in our opinion, to all intents and purposes the plaintiff's shares. 3. The Uruguay Five per Cent. Unified Loan bonds. These bonds were divided in the argument before us into two lots, the first consisting of bonds to the value of £1,500; the second of bonds to the value of £2,000. As to lot one, no dispute as to the appropriation was raised before us by the defendants. As to lot two, the circumstances of their purchase were in substance similar to those narrated already in reference to the Rio Tinto shares, and the appropriation to the plaintiff was effected in the same manner. The result is that, with regard to all the securities in respect of which the plaintiff Little claims, the appropriation to him was complete before deposit with the bank, and Little's action comes accordingly within our decision in the case of Simmons. The appeal in Little's case must also, therefore, be dismissed with costs.

In re WALLIS (a.)

Bankruptcy—Application by bankrupt for discharge—Leave to withdraw application—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), s. 28, sub-section 2.

The Bankruptcy Court has the same inherent jurisdiction as other courts to give leave for the withdrawal of any application previously made to it, and there is no exception in the case of an application by a bankrupt to withdraw a previously-made application for a discharge under section 28 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883.

Appeal from an order of Mr. Registrar Brougham allowing a bankrupt to withdraw an application for his discharge.

The bankrupt, Wallis, had applied under the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, s. 28, for an order for his discharge. The official receiver made the necessary report under section 28, sub-section 2. Upon the case being called on the bankrupt asked for leave to withdraw his application. This the official receiver and a creditor opposed, but the registrar gave his leave.

The Board of Trade appealed.

(a.) Reported by SPENCER L. HOLLAND, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Muir Mackenzie (Sir E. Clarke, S.G., with him), for the appellants.—The registrar had no power to grant a withdrawal of such an application. The report of the official receiver gave reasons against a discharge of the bankrupt.

Sidney Woolf, Q.C., and F. Mellor, for the respondent, were not called upon.

Lord COLERIDGE, C.J.—In this case a bankrupt who had applied for his discharge chose to reconsider his decision, and on the hearing before the registrar applied for leave to withdraw his application. The registrar gave him leave so to do, but upon the condition that the bankrupt should not renew his application without paying the costs of the first application. It was admitted that the court could hear such an application. If so, it follows that, as a matter of course, the court will grant or refuse the application. Here the court allowed the applicant to withdraw his application upon certain conditions. We have nothing to do with these conditions, and can only say that the court exercised its inherent jurisdiction in allowing an applicant under, so far as we can see, proper circumstances to withdraw his application.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—I agree. Certain steps were necessarily to be taken before this application could be heard. Notices had to be served by the applicant and a report to be made by the official receiver. Upon the case coming on for hearing the applicant applied for leave to withdraw his application. There is nothing whatever in the Bankruptcy Act depriving the court of its ordinary power of giving leave for a withdrawal.

FRY, L.J.—Primâ facie it is clear that every court has the power to allow any application made to be withdrawn, and so far as I can see there is nothing in sub-section 2 of section 28 of this Act to deprive the Bankruptcy Court of that inherent jurisdiction of a court.

Appeal dismissed.

Local government — County council — Qualification of member—Election of women—Municipal Corporations Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 50), ss. 41, 73—Local Government Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 41).

By section 73 of the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882 (which is made applicable to the elections of county councillors by the Local Government Act, 1888), every election not called in question within twelve months after the election shall be deemed to have been to all intents a good and valid election. By section 41 penalties are imposed on any person acting in a corporate office without due qualification.

The defendant, a woman, was elected a member of a county council, and, twelve months after her election, which had not in the meanwhile been called in question, she took part in the proceedings of the council.

Held, that, even if the effect of section 73 were to render her election valid, she was nevertheless disqualified as a woman from acting, and was therefore liable to the penalties imposed by section 41.

(a.) Reported by A. P. PERCEVAL KEEP, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Appeal from the decision of Day, J.

The action was brought by a member of the London County Council to recover five penalties under section 41 of the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882, from the defendant for having acted as a county councillor without being duly qualified on five occasions on February 18 and 25, 1890.

The defendant, Miss Jane Cobden, was, on January 17, 1889, elected a member of the London County Council for Bow and Bromley, and on January 23 made the declaration required by the statute. In May, 1889, the case of Beresford Hope v. Lady Sandhurst, 37 W. R. 548, 23 Q. B. D. 79, was decided in the Court of Appeal, and it was held that a woman was incapable of being elected as a county councillor. After that decision Miss Cobden and another lady who had also been elected on the council took no part in the meetings of the council until February, 1890. On February 18 and February 25, however, Miss Cobden took part in five divisions, and also spoke at the meetings of the council, and on February 28 and March 4 notice of action was served upon her and this action was commenced.

Day, J., held that she was not qualified at the time of making the declaration, and that she was therefore liable to penalties under section 41, and gave judgment accordingly.

Miss Cobden appealed.

Rigby, Q.C., Bigham, Q.C., and Costelloe, for the appellant.—Miss Cobden's election is rendered valid by section 73 of the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882, which is incorporated by the Local Government Act, 1888. It provides that every election not called in question within twelve months after the election shall be deemed to have been to all intents a good and valid election. Secondly, section 41 only imposes penalties for acting in a corporate office without being duly qualified. If there was no election, and the disqualification of a woman is absolute, she cannot act in a corporate capacity, and therefore cannot be liable to any penalty. Section 41 does not apply to women at all.

Bosanquet, Q.C., and S. H. Day, for the respondent.

Lord COLERIDGE, C.J.—This appeal seems to me a perfectly bonâ fide attempt to take the opinion of the court on section 73 and section 41 of the Act of 1882. By section 73, "Every municipal election not called in question within twelve months after election, either by election petition or by information in the nature of a quo warranto, shall be deemed to have been to all intents a good and valid election." By section 41, "If any person acts in a corporate office without having made the declaration by this Act required, or without being qualified at the time of making the declaration, or after ceasing to be qualified, or after becoming disqualified, he shall, for each offence, be liable to a fine not exceeding £50, recoverable by action." As far as the seat is concerned, I am clearly of opinion that section 73 is an answer to any attempt to fill the seat after the expiration of a year. The words of the section are imperative, and I think that the election must be treated as a valid election, and Miss Cobden must, in the terms of the section, be deemed to be validly elected. She is, however, subject to the law of the country, including section 41, and she must act according to the law, and if the law is broken by her, the consequences of the breach must follow. It is impossible not to say, after the decision of this court in Beresford-Hope v. Lady Sandhurst, that, without some enabling section, Miss Cobden cannot, by law, act as a member of the county council because she is not duly qualified. She is subject to an incapacity which section 73 does nothing to remove. She was, therefore, wrong in acting, and she broke the law by so doing. She is, therefore, in my opinion, subject to the penalties imposed by the section. The appeal must be dismissed.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—I think that, as in this case I entertain a stronger view than the other members of the court, it is my duty to express that view. The county council is a new institution—the creation of an Act of Parliament. We have now to deal, not with the electorate, but with the persons who may be elected. The Act of 1888, which created the county councils, incorporates, after the modern fashion of legislation, a large part of the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882, and it is to that Act that we have to look in deciding the present case. Now, what persons may according to the Act become members of the county council? We have decided that only male persons who are duly qualified may become members. The ground of the decision in the case of Beresford-Hope v. Lady Sandhurst was that the words used in this enactment, taken together with Lord Brougham's Act (13 & 14 Vict. c. 21), s. 4, were words which would include women as well as men unless from the subject-matter or context of the Act the contrary appeared, and the whole court thought in that case that there was something in the context which prevented women from being elected. The Act contained an express mention of women wherever it was intended to include them in its provisions, and, therefore, we all thought that, since they were not expressly given the power of being elected, the election of a woman was invalid. I went further than the other members of the court. I thought that it was also apparent from the subject-matter of the Act that women could not be elected. In England up to that time women, unless specially mentioned or unless they had obtained the right by well-recognized custom, such as is mentioned in the judgment of Willes, J., in Chorlton v. Lings, 17 W. R. 284, L. R. 4 C. P. 374, at p. 389, had been considered as incapable of executing public functions. Therefore, whichever ground is taken, the decision in Beresford-Hope v. Lady Sandhurst was that women had not the power by the Act of being elected as county councillors. And since at common law there never was any such right, the election of a woman was held to be and is absolutely invalid. The judgment went so far in saying that women were disqualified from being elected as to decide that the votes given for a woman were absolutely thrown away, and were as though they had never been given at all. Therefore, applying section 73 to the present case, I am of opinion that Miss Cobden was never elected at all, and that there was no election on which section 73 can have any operation. I am confirmed in this view by a consideration of the subject-matter of the Act. It seems absurd to say that a woman is absolutely incapable of being elected, but that if she is elected, and no proceedings are taken against her for a year, she becomes qualified to sit, vote, or speak. In my opinion section 73 only applies to elections which may be good, but not to such an election as this, which cannot be an election at all.

Then, as to section 41—does that section apply to men only, or to men and women? I think that the context shows that Lord Brougham's Act may apply, and that the words of the section include both men and women. Women may break the law of the Act. They have, in fact, done so, and the breaches aimed at by the section may be committed by women as well as by men. Therefore, in the result, I agree that the appeal must be dismissed.

FRY, L.J.—This case raises two questions under the Act of 1882—the one as to section 73, the other as to section 41. Is this election one which can be rendered valid by section 73? I do not think that it can. Obviously an election of a dead man or of an inanimate thing is not an election on which section 73 can operate. Is the election of a woman such an election? I incline to think that the election of a woman is absolutely null and void and cannot be affected by the section, but I desire to express no concluded opinion on this point because the answer to the second question really decides the case. Section 41 seems to me essentially different from section 73. Everything under it depends on contingencies arising after election. Therefore I think that, even if section 73 does apply, and Miss Cobden's election is made valid by it, yet under section 41 Miss Cobden has become subject to penalties, since, after her election, and at the time of making the requisite declaration, she was not qualified, and she has acted when so disqualified.

Will—Construction—Discretionary trust—Residue—All or any portion—Maintenance or benefit of legatee—Non-exercise of discretion—Interest of legatee in fund.

A testator devised a share of his residue, subject to a life interest therein, to trustees upon trust "to pay or apply all or any portion of the income or corpus of the same in or towards the support or maintenance, or otherwise for the benefit, of their brother, R. T., in such manner and proportions in every respect, and at such times, as they shall deem most conducive to his welfare." R. T. died during the continuance of the life interest. On the fund subsequently falling into possession, the legal personal representative of R. T. claimed it as part of R. T.'s estate. The trustees had not attempted to deal with the fund while reversionary.

Held, (1) that the trustees had not waived their discretion, or been guilty of default or refusal to exercise it; (2) that no trust could be implied making it their duty to apply the whole fund for R. T.'s benefit, but that they were only bound to apply so much of it as, in their discretion, they thought fit for his personal benefit and welfare; and (3) *that, under the circumstances, no transmissible interest in the fund ever vested in R. Adjourned summons.

By will, dated 1854, the testator devised and bequeathed the residue of his real and personal estate to his executors upon trust for sale and conversion, and to invest the proceeds, in trust to permit his wife to receive the income thereof during her life, and after the determination of that trust, as to the principal and future income thereof, upon trust to pay and transfer (inter alia) one-twentieth part thereof unto W. Tate and H. Tate upon trust to continue or invest the same as therein mentioned, "and to pay and apply all or any portion of the income or corpus of the same in or towards the support or maintenance or otherwise for the benefit of their brother R. Tate, in such manner and proportions in every respect, and at such times, as they shall deem most conducive to his welfare."

The testator died in 1854, R. Tate died in 1866 intestate, and the testator's widow died in 1890. The estate being then divisible, the executors of the surviving trustee of the will took out this summons to determine, inter alia, "whether, under the terms of the above bequest, the one-twentieth part had vested in R. Tate so as to pass to his legal personal representative, or whether it had passed to the testator's next of kin."

Freeman, for the executors, stated the point.

Carson, for the person entitled to take out administration to R. Tate's estate.—There is a clear trust in favour of R. Tate. "Benefit" is the widest expression you could employ, as in In re Breed's Will, 24 W. R. 200, 1 Ch. D. 226; Lowther v. Bentinck, 23 W. R. 156, L. R. 19 Eq. 166. If the trustees have any discretion it is a limited one which might operate between two legatees, but not between the legatee and the next of kin, who would take here, as the one-twentieth is residue. The case is covered by Gough v. Bult, 16 Sim. 45, and Gude v. Worthington, 3 De G. & Sm. 389.

Vernon R. Smith and McNeill, for persons in the same interest.

Philip V. Smith, for the testator's next of kin.—There is no gift to R. Tate, but only a discretionary trust in his favour of so much as the trustees may think fit to apply for his benefit. He is entitled to nothing beyond the amount so applied: In re Sanderson's Trusts, 5 W. R. 864, 3 K. & J. 497.

CHITTY, J.—In Gough v. Bult Lord Cottenham laid it down as a well-known rule that "where a legacy is given, but the application of it is prescribed by the testator himself or left by him to the discretion of some other person, if that discretion is not exercised or an accident happens which prevents the employment of it in the way which is contemplated, the gift prevails. The mode of application may fail, but that will not interfere with the substance of the gift." It is contended that the principle there stated applies in this case in favour of the legal personal representative of R. Tate. So far as there was any discretion vested in these trustees it is plain that there has been no default or refusal to exercise it on their part, and therefore the case does not come within Gude v. Worthington. In that case there was a trust in favour of Mary Ann Seaman, with a discretionary power in the trustees to pay over the whole corpus of the fund to her, or to withhold the whole, as they might think fit, without being accountable therefor, and there was a gift over of so much of the fund as should at her death remain undisposed of. I am not concerned to see whether the Vice-Chancellor's construction of the will in that case was erroneous, nor do I suggest it was; but it is plain that the principle of his decision was that the lady took an absolute interest, subject to a discretionary power in the trustees, which they had either waived or declined to exercise. In the present case the trustees never had a chance of exercising their discretion, because Robert Tate died before the fund fell into possession. It is said they might have mortgaged the fund, though still reversionary, for Robert Tate's benefit. But even if they had the power to do this, on which I express no opinion, it is clear that the non-exercise of a power, not in terms conferred by the will, does not amount to waiver.

It is true, as urged by Mr. Carson, that the word "benefit" is a term of large import, but I must read this discretionary power as a whole, and the cardinal point of the case is that the discretionary power is not so framed as to make it the duty of the trustees to apply the whole of the income or corpus for R. Tate's benefit. Had this been so I should have been prepared to hold that he took a vested interest in the whole fund, and that the case fell within the principle laid down by Lord Cottenham in Gough v. Bult. But I think the true meaning of the gift is that the power is to be exercised for the personal benefit of R. Tate, i.e., that the term "benefit" ought to be construed with reference to the words "support or maintenance," or "for his welfare," which precede it. In Lowther v. Bentinck a power to advance a son for his preferment, advancement, or benefit, was held to include not merely setting him up in the world, but also the discharge of his debts. In this case the word "benefit" is qualified by the whole terms of the trust, which show that the whole fund is not to go for the benefit of R. Tate unless the trustees, in the exercise of their discretion, think fit so to apply it.

The authority most in point is In re Sanderson's Trusts. In that case Page-Wood, V.C., laid great stress on the words "the whole or any part" to be applied for or towards his maintenance, attendance, and comfort. He said the word "comfort" was a large word, but that he had no right to strike out the words "any part," and though he read the power as one of that class which trustees are bound to exercise, and not as a mere arbitrary power, he observed that it was not the whole income that was given, but the "whole or any part," which the court would read as equivalent to "whole or a competent part." Now, even if I were to apply here the principle of the cases where there is a power to apply a fund for somebody's benefit, and the court is asked to imply a trust in favour of the objects in default of exercise of the power, e.g., Harding v. Glyn, 1 Atk. 469, In re White's Trusts, Joh. 656, 8 W. R. Ch. Dig. 102, it seems to me that this gift does not amount to a trust to apply the whole or any part of the fund for the benefit of R. Tate, and in default a trust in his favour as to the whole of it. In the result, I think the gift conferred a discretion on the trustees liable to be controlled by the court, but that the court would not have compelled the trustees to apply any more thereof than was required for the benefit of R. Tate in the manner most conducive to his welfare, and so, following In re Sanderson's Trusts, I hold that his legal personal representative has no right to this fund.

RADCLIFFE v. BEWES. (a.)

Power of appointment—Marriage settlement—Release of power—Benefit of donee of power—Right to transfer of funds.

Under his marriage settlement the plaintiff had a power of appointment amongst children, and, in default of appointment, the children were entitled to funds as therein mentioned. Two children obtained a vested interest, one of whom died a bachelor and intestate. Letters of administration to his estate were granted to the plaintiff, who subsequently released his power of appointment over the fund, and asked for a declaration of his rights and a transfer to himself of one moiety of the trust funds as tenant for life of, and entitled in remainder to, that moiety.

Held, that, in the exercise of its discretion, the court will not assist a donee of a power to obtain a personal benefit through his having released that power.

Cunynghame v. Thurlow, 1 Russ. & My. 436n, followed.

Adjourned summons.

Under his marriage settlement, dated the 26th of July, 1852, a life interest in the funds subject to the trusts was given to the plaintiff, the Rev. John William Radcliffe, and on his decease to his wife, with a joint power of appointment amongst the children of the marriage, and on the decease of either of them as the survivor should by deed or will appoint. In default of appointment the funds were to be held on trust for such of the children as should attain the age of twenty-one years or marry in equal shares.

The plaintiff's wife died on the 9th of July, 1878, the joint power of appointment not having been exercised.

The only issue of the marriage were three sons, one of whom died without having obtained a vested interest.

The other sons attained the age of twenty-one years, and one of them, Derwentwater Radcliffe, died on the 27th of July, 1881, a bachelor and intestate.

Administration to his estate was granted to the plaintiff.

On the 9th of July, 1890, the plaintiff executed a deed-poll absolutely releasing his power of appointment under the marriage settlement, he then called on the defendant, the sole surviving trustee, to transfer to him a moiety of the trust funds. The defendant declined to do so without the direction of the court. The plaintiff issued an originating summons for an order declaring that, under the circumstances, he was entitled to a moiety of the trust funds, and to have the same transferred to him.

Sir H. Davey, Q.C., and George Lawrence, for the plaintiff.—The plaintiff is entitled to a declaration and transfer. Cunynghame v. Thurlow, 1 Russ. & My. 436n, is authority that the release of the power is good, but it has not been followed on the question of the courts refusing to transfer. Smith v. Houblon, 26 Beav. 482, 8 W. R. Dig. 53, and Shirley v. Fisher, 47 L. T. N. S. 109, 31 W. R. Dig. 144. The court has a discretion. In re Little, 37 W. R. 289, 40 Ch. D. 418. If no transfer can be ordered, the plaintiff asks for a declaration of his rights.

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., and Warrington, for the defendant.

NORTH, J.—In this case the plaintiff has absolutely released his power of appointment. He now comes and calls upon the trustee to transfer one moiety to him as being tenant for life of, and also entitled in remainder to, that moiety. If I were unfettered by authority the order would be for a declaration of his right and a transfer to him, but I cannot do this, being bound by the authority of Cunynghame v. Thurlow, which has never been doubted, and where it is laid down that, although the power of appointment was released, the court will not assist the tenant for life to obtain a transfer of the funds. It may be that Smith v. Houblon gently hit at Cunynghame v. Thurlow, inasmuch as the Master of the Rolls there made a declaration of the rights of the parties, but that case, as the circumstances differ, is not inconsistent with Cunynghame v. Thurlow. Neither is Shirley v. Fisher, the headnote of which expresses the law accurately in stating that the donee of a power may deal with it in any lawful way he pleases. In this case the donee of the power owed the advantage he obtained, not to any provision in the settlement, but to a legal accident.

Lastly, In re Little shows that it would be wrong for the court, in exercising its discretion, to help the donee of the power.

With regard to the release of the power, the Conveyancing Act, 1881, s. 52, does not help us; it merely prevents the question being raised. The power is released. I am bound by Cunynghame v. Thurlow, which is in point. I do not make any declaration or order, but the trustee must have his costs, charges, and expenses out of the trust fund.

Summons dismissed.

BOUND v. LAWRENCE. (a.)

Master and servant—Grocer's assistant—"Workman"—"Manual labour"—Employers and Workmen Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 90), s. 10.

A person was employed as an assistant in a grocer's shop, his duties being to serve customers, to make up parcels of goods, and to carry them to a cart at the shop door, and occasionally to assist in bringing up heavier goods from the cellar to the shop.

Held, by Grantham, J. (A. L. Smith, J., dissenting), that he was a workman within the definition in section 10 of the Employers and Workmen Act, 1875.

This was an appeal by way of special case from the decision of the justices of Newport, Mon., under the powers given to them as a court of summary jurisdiction by section 4 of the Employers and Workmen Act, 1875, ordering the appellant to pay to the respondent a sum of £1 as damages for having left his employment without notice.

The question was whether the appellant was a "workman" within the meaning of the Act.

The appellant had been employed by the respondent (a grocer) to assist him in his shop. When the case first came before the High Court it was remitted to the justices in order that they might state what was the precise manual labour which the appellant performed. The case now stated that he served customers in the shop from behind the counter, made up parcels of goods, carried parcels up to eighty-four lbs. in weight to the cart at the door from the shop, occasionally carried sides of bacon from the shop door, where they were hanging, into the shop; that on each Monday he brought up from the cellar bags of sugar, boxes of soap, and sides of bacon; that he occasionally assisted at the pulley in getting up goods from the cellar, and that he occasionally wheeled goods in a truck from the warehouse to the cellar.

The Employers and Workmen Act, 1875, provides (section 8):—"The expression 'workman' does not include a domestic or menial servant, but save as aforesaid means any person who, being a labourer, servant in husbandry, journeyman artificer, handicraftsman, miner, or otherwise engaged in manual labour, whether under the age of twenty-one years or above that age, has entered into or works under a contract with an employer."

C. M. Bailhache, for the appellant.—"Grocer's assistant" is a well-known term, and the findings of the justices as to the appellant's duties are superfluous, and should be disregarded. But even if those findings are to be considered, it is clear that his main duties are not manual labour, although he may incidentally do acts which come under that category; it is the main duties which are to be looked at: Morgan v. London General Omnibus Co., 32 W. R. 759, 13 Q. B. D. 832; Cook v. North Metropolitan Tramways Co., 35 W. R. 577, 18 Q. B. D. 684; Yarmouth v. France, 36 W. R. 281, 19 Q. B. D. 647, per Lord Esher, M.R., at p. 651; and Hunt v. Great Northern Railway Co., Times, 29th January, 1891. Neither is the appellant a "journeyman," that term is only used with reference to occupations where skill of hand is required.

S. A. T. Rowlatt, for the respondent.—I admit that the appellant is not a "journeyman," but, according to the findings, a substantial part of his duties consist of manual labour, and he is, therefore, a workman within the Act. Yarmouth v. France is in my favour.

GRANTHAM, J.—I regret that in this case I am unable to agree with my learned brother in the conclusion at which he has arrived. It is true that a person in a grocer's shop who occupies the same position as the appellant in this case is usually called an assistant, but I cannot myself see any difference between such a person in a butcher's shop and in a grocer's shop. They each have to perform the same kind of work. In a butcher's shop he is called a journeyman, and may have to serve customers who come into the shop, and may not have to take part in killing animals or in cutting up meat. His principal duties may be the same as those of the appellant in this case. [His lordship then read the finding of the justices as stated above, and continued:—] He is, in fact, all day employed in weighing out things in the same manner as a butcher, and in serving customers; he has to perform services very similar to those performed by the plaintiff in Yarmouth v. France; and it was held in that case that the plaintiff was a workman within the meaning of this Act. Suppose that the appellant had been set to work at a machine for cutting up sugar, and that the machine was out of order, and the appellant was injured, surely his labour would be such as to bring him within the intent and benefit of the Employers' Liability Act? Such labour is intended to be dealt with by this statute. The labour of the appellant seems to me to be of the same character as that of a journeyman, and, therefore, within this Act. I accept the language used by the Master of the Rolls in Morgan v. London General Omnibus Co., when he says that the test is what is the real and substantial business of the person employed. I think that in this case the real and substantial business of the appellant is such as to bring him within the definition of a "workman" in this Act.

A. L. SMITH, J.—I am sorry to differ from my learned brother in this case. This is a special case stated by justices for the opinion of the court; we must take the facts as found by them, and say upon them whether a grocer's assistant comes within the definition contained in section 10 of the Employers and Workmen Act, 1875. [His lordship read the section.] I think the meaning of the section is that it excludes domestic and menial servants, but includes skilled and unskilled manual labourers. The Legislature evidently intended to include certain persons who might not come in under the definition of engaged in manual labour, and therefore those persons were specifically mentioned. If it had been intended to bring in grocers' assistants it would have been very easy to have mentioned them or to have put in "shopman," which would have included such assistants. I cannot think that a grocer's assistant comes within the term "journeyman." Then the question arises, is the real and substantial business of this grocer's assistant manual labour? Porters are kept to do the heavy manual work, and the principal business of the appellant is to serve customers, and is not manual labour. He was only occasionally employed in manual labour, and his ordinary duties were those of an indoor assistant. Then it was said that in that capacity he used his hands, but there is no service in which a person does not use his hands. A hairdresser and a copyist both use their hands largely in their business, but they cannot be said to be engaged in manual labour. In Morgan v. London General Omnibus Co. it was held that a conductor was not within this statute, although he was constantly using his hands for the purpose of his business, and the Court of Appeal gave as the reason for their decision that his real and substantial business was to invite persons to enter the omnibus, and to take and keep for his employers the money paid by the passengers as their fares. So, too, a driver of a tramcar has been held to be outside this Act, although he must necessarily be using his hands all day: Cook v. North Metropolitan Tramways Co. Then, again, in Yarmouth v. France, it was held that a driver employed by a wharfinger was a workman because, as the Master of the Rolls said, his real labour was the loading and unloading a trolley, which was manual labour. The last case I wish to refer to is that of Hunt v. Great Northern Railway Co., in which the court held that a goods guard was not within the Act because he was ejusdem generis with a passenger guard, although he occasionally removed goods into or out of his van. I decide this case upon the same grounds as those on which the cases I have referred to seem to me to have been decided—namely, that the ordinary duties of the appellant were those of an indoor assistant, and that he was not engaged in manual labour. As the court is divided in its opinion, the order of the justices will stand.

Appeal dismissed. Leave to appeal was granted.

REID'S BREWERY CO. (Appellants) v. MALE (Respondent). (a.)

Inland Revenue—Income tax—Brewers—Brewers acting as bankers and money-lenders for their customers—Losses or bad debts in the money-lending branch—Deduction of such losses from profits of the brewery business—5 & 6 Vict. c. 35, s. 100, Schedule D.

A firm of brewers carried on, in connection with their brewery business, a branch business of banking and money-lending confined to the customers of the firm, which they were entitled to do under their memorandum of association. They advanced money by way of loan or advance to their customers, upon various classes of security, such as deposit of deeds, mortgage, and promissory notes. They received money on deposit from their customers, and acted generally as bankers for such customers, but in no case was any loan or advance made by way of permanent investment. Losses in the nature of bad debts having been incurred in the banking and money-lending branch of the business,

Held, that the banking or money-lending branch was an adjunct to the brewery business, only one business being carried on; that the loans were not capital invested; and that the brewers were entitled to deduct the losses in the money-lending branch from their gains in the brewery branch in making their return for income tax.

The appellants, Reid's Brewery Co. (Limited), appealed against an assessment of £110,213 made by the special commissioners of income tax, under Schedule D of the Act 16 & 17 Vict. c. 34, for the year ended April 5, 1890, in respect of the profits from trade as carried on by the appellants at the brewery, Clerkenwell-road, in the county of Middlesex.

The return of the appellants for assessment was dated July 17, 1889, and was based upon the average profits of the three years ended December 31, 1888. From accounts rendered in explanation of the profits it was shown that large sums for "bad debts" incurred in 1886, 1887, and 1888 had been deducted in arriving at the balances of profits upon which the return had been computed. These "bad debts" were found to embrace not only ordinary debts arising from the trade of brewers, but also losses sustained on loans advanced by the appellants on the security of public-houses, with which their business is largely connected, to their customers.

The average amount of these losses on loans for the three years, as stated by the appellants, was £16,517. The special commissioners disallowed the deduction of £16,517, and consequently assessed the appellants for their brewery profits in the sum of £110,213, being the amount of profits returned by the appellants with the addition of the £16,517. It was stated that when the company made an advance to a customer on the security of a public-house, and the public-house was sold, if the security did not realize the amount advanced the company wrote off the loss as a bad debt. The following statement of facts was handed in on behalf of the appellants, and was agreed to:—

Messrs. Reid & Co. for many years carried on the business of brewers, and in connection therewith and as part thereof the branch business of bankers and money-lenders limited to the customers and connections of the firm. The appellants took over the business of Reid & Co. as from July 7, 1888, by purchase and valuation, including therein the business or branch business of bankers and money-lenders.

It is the custom and usual practice of manufacturing brewers, at any rate in London, to carry on the business of bankers and money-lenders as a branch or adjunct of their brewing business, such business being strictly carried on with the customers and connections of the brewery.

Since the purchase the appellants have, pursuant to article 4 of their memorandum of association, which gave them power so to act as bankers, also carried on the business of bankers and money-lenders as therein authorized. In the course of such business the appellants advanced money by way of loan or advance to or on behalf of their customers, and upon various classes of security, and, amongst others, on deposit of deeds, on mortgage, on promissory notes and acceptances. They receive money on deposit from their customers, and cheques are allowed to be drawn upon the appellants, which are accepted and treated by other London bankers as ordinary bankers' cheques. They also collect bills for customers when they become due.

In no case is any loan or advance made by way of permanent investment, but the same is taken only in connection with the current dealings of the customers with the appellants, and in the event of such current dealings terminating the loan or advance is required to be paid off and the account closed.

The brewery profits of the appellants and of Reid & Co. have always been greatly increased by reason of the addition of such business of banking and money-lending, and to enable them to realize their extensive profits such loans and advances are essentially necessary, and unless such loans and advances are made for customers the brewing business of London brewers could not be carried on at a profit.

During the three years in question losses were incurred by Messrs. Reid & Co. and the appellants on the banking or money-lending branch, amounting to £16,517, which had partly been written off as bad debts and irrecoverable, and partly charged against the profits as the amount which, it was believed, would prove to be bad.

On the above facts the appellants contended that the assessment of £110,213 was excessive, as they had not made profits or gains to that amount; that they were entitled to write off by way of deduction from their taxable profits such losses as they have sustained in the debts of the branch of the brewing business relating to loans and advances; in the alternative, that, under the 101st section of 5 & 6 Vict. c. 35, if the said debts are not to be considered as part of the assets of the brewing business, the appellants are nevertheless entitled to deduct or set off the excess of the loss sustained as loss occurring in their business of bankers and money-lenders against the profits acquired by them as brewers. The particulars of these losses, as given by the appellants, was: on deposit of deeds, £304; on mortgages, £16,092; on notes and acceptances, £121; total, £16,517.

The commissioners, having regard to the decision in the case of Watney v. Musgrave, 28 W. R. 491, 5 Ex. D. 241, considered that the sums advanced by the appellants on the security of public-houses were sums employed as capital for the purpose of extending their business as brewers, and that losses arising therefrom were not losses sustained in any trade or concern distinct from such business, and they determined that they could not admit as deductions within the Income Tax Acts the sums claimed by the appellants as losses on deposit of deeds and on mortgage, amounting together to £16,396.

Sir Horace Davey, Q.C. (Pollard and T. Hewitt, with him), for the appellants.—The appellants here carry on one business, which includes the lending of money to their customers. This banking or money-lending branch is not carried on as an investment of capital, but as a branch or part, and a necessary part, of the brewing business, the whole being one business, and therefore the losses incurred in the money-lending branch may be deducted from the gains in the brewing business. But if I am wrong in saying that they are two departments of one business, and if they are two separate businesses which are carried on by this company, I still say that they are both chargeable under Schedule D., and that the loss on one may be deducted from the profit on the other. The case of Watney v. Musgrave was entirely different from the present, as there the expenditure was treated entirely as a capital investment, as a capital expenditure. There was no finding in that case that they carried on this investing in public-houses as a part of their trade or business, or that it was carried on as a trade or business, but it was treated entirely as being a capital investment. That case, therefore, is different from the present case, and is no authority against the contention of the appellants.

(a.) Reported by Sir SHERSTON BAKER, Barrister-at-Law.

Sir R. E. Webster, A.G., Sir E. Clarke, S.G., and Danckwertz, for the respondent.

POLLOCK, B.—The question is whether a deduction, which the commissioners disallowed, ought now to be allowed. From the facts in the case it appears in substance that the appellants carried on the trade of brewers; that, in addition to that, they carried on a business which they had taken over in 1888 from their predecessors, which is called the business and branch business of bankers and money-lenders, and that that was in accordance with the custom and the usual practice of manufacturing brewers. The character of that business is described in the case in this way: that "the appellants advanced money by way of loan or advance to or on behalf of their customers and upon various classes of security, and amongst others on deposit of deeds, on mortgage, on promissory notes and acceptances."

Upon this and upon the other facts of the case a question has arisen as to whether this money-lending business is to be considered as an independent business, or as part of the business of the brewers. If it had been, or if it is, a separate business, seems to me to be immaterial, because I think it would be included within the provisions of section 101 of the Income Tax Act, and that the appellants would be entitled to deduct the profits acquired in one of the concerns, and set them off against the excess of the losses sustained in the other concerns; but, to my mind, this is really one business. Nobody could suppose that this company carry on business as money-lenders only; but what they do is to carry it on as an adjunct ancillary to their business as brewers. That being so, I think the real question in this case is, whether the money so used or expended is to be treated as capital invested. If it be capital invested, then it comes within the express provision of the Income Tax Act, that no deduction is to be made on that account. That is provided for most clearly by the statute, but I think it would be a fallacy to call this money capital invested. In the first place, the case finds that in no case is any loan or advance made by them as a permanent investment. That, of itself, might not be sufficient, but when we come to read what is the course of dealing, no person can doubt that this is not capital invested. It is capital used by the appellants, but used only in the sense that all money which is laid out by persons who are traders is used; it is used and it comes out of capital, but it is not an investment in the ordinary sense of the word.

If that is so, the cases which have been cited for the purpose of showing what is done in the case of capital invested become immaterial. No doubt, I agree, that we are not to deal with this Income Tax Act as if we were taking an account between partners, or as if we had before us the sale of a going concern. There are cases, such as that of Gillatt v. Colquhoun, Reports of Tax Cases, vol. 2, pt. 27, where it was held that the depreciation of leasehold premises that were purchased and used for trade purposes could not be deducted. Perhaps the strongest case was that of Smith v. The Westinghouse Brake Co., Reports of Tax Cases, vol. 2, pt. 35, where the company had, in the case of very large machinery, to remove, for the purposes of their business, a quantity of machinery from one part of the country to another. That would be a loss between the partners before any profit would be arrived at; but there it was held that that was not a deduction that could be made under the Income Tax Acts. That being so, I cannot see any great difficulty in dealing with this case. It seems to me the ordinary case of persons who, before they can make up their accounts and share their profits, not merely as between partners, but under the Income Tax Act, are entitled to this deduction, because, by Cases 1 and 2, Schedule D., it is clear that what the commissioners have to arrive at is the profit. There is one difficulty in dealing with this case which the court must fairly meet—namely, that in Watney v. Musgrave it was held that a firm of brewers who, in order to increase the sale of their beer and to increase their profits, purchased the leases of public-houses which they let to tenants, who contracted to buy from the brewers all the beer to be sold in the houses, were not entitled to any allowance in respect of the premiums that were paid upon those leases.

I should have said myself that there could be no real difficulty in that case if you confined it to the case itself. It might be an advantageous investment of the capital of brewers to purchase houses out of their capital, and it might be that they, for the purpose of taking an account between partners, might take such purchases into account before they arrived at the profit of the business. In such a case, that money could not be said to be money expended by the brewer upon the business of brewers. Such an expenditure would not be an expenditure upon the business either of brewers or money-lenders. Therefore, so far as that case is concerned, I think there is no difficulty.

It seems to me, on these grounds, that this appeal must succeed, with costs.

CHARLES, J.—I am of the same opinion. I do not think that any question arises under section 101, because I think that the proper inference of fact to draw from the case is this, that the appellants carry on one business and not two. That appears to me to be clear upon the agreed statement of facts, and I think the legitimate conclusion from those facts is this, that the appellants carry on the brewing business with this business of money-lending as a branch or adjunct to it. Then, it being one business and not two, are the appellants entitled to the exemption of this sum of £16,000 which they claim? I think that they are.

For the Crown it was urged upon us that this payment is a capital expenditure, and, if it be a capital expenditure, then the deduction of it is expressly forbidden by the 3rd rule of Case 1, Schedule D. But it appears to me that it is not an investment of capital at all, but that it is a use of money by the appellants in the course of their business. I agree with my learned brother that, in arriving at the balance of profits and gains upon which the assessment is to be made, it not being a capital expenditure, it is an expense which they may properly deduct before arriving at the balance of their profits and gains. If, however, in arriving at the balance of profits and gains, they ought to include this sum in the first instance, I think that they are entitled to it by way of actual deduction under the 1st rule applicable to Cases 1 and 2 under Schedule D.

I think that upon the findings this money was money laid out and expended exclusively for the purpose of the brewing trade carried on by the appellants; and, that being so, it is a legitimate subject of deduction in arriving at the balance of the profits and gains, even though it ought not, in the first instance, to be deducted from the profits of the concern.

For these reasons I agree that our judgment ought to be for the appellants, and I also desire to express my concurrence in the observations of my learned brother upon the cases cited.

Appeal allowed.

CAWSE (Appellant) v. COMMITTEE OF THE LUNATIC HOSPITAL, NOTTINGHAM (Respondents). (a.)

Inland revenue—Income tax—Hospital—Hospital supported substantially by charitable funds—Exemption from income tax—Exemption from inhabited house duty—5 & 6 Vict. c. 35, schedule A—48 Geo. 3, c. 55, schedule B (Exemptions), case 4.

A lunatic hospital had been carried on upon its present site for thirty years; it was a building provided for the reception and relief of lunatics who are not paupers, for whose maintenance and medical attendance sums from 10s. to 40s. a week are paid; it was founded and built with charitable donations, and managed by persons who derive no pecuniary benefit therefrom, but who assist it by their subscriptions. The annual reports showed that the hospital is substantially supported by funds derived from charitable sources, and the real property on which the hospital is carried on is vested in trustees upon trust to be used as a lunatic hospital.

Held, that, as the hospital was substantially supported from charitable sources, it came within the exemption in rule 6 of schedule A of the Income Tax Act, and was not liable to be assessed to income tax under that schedule; also, that it was not liable to inhabited house duty, as it came within the exemption of case 4, schedule B, of 48 Geo. 3, c. 55, as being a "hospital provided for the reception or relief of poor persons."

Needham v. Bowers, 37 W. R. 125, 21 Q. B. D. 436, distinguished.

Case stated under section 59 of 43 & 44 Vict. c. 19 as to income tax and inhabited house duties.

The members of the committee of the Lunatic Hospital at the Coppice, Nottingham, the present respondents, appealed to the Income Tax Commissioners against an assessment of £1,000, which had been made upon the committee, under schedule A, and the inhabited house duties, in respect of the said hospital, for the year ending the 5th of April, 1889.

The hospital had been carried on upon its present site for thirty years, and hitherto the only assessment upon it under schedule A of the Income Tax Acts has been upon the resident medical officer's house at £20 a year, and it had also been assessed at the same amount to the inhabited house duty.

The members of the committee of the hospital contended that the hospital, being a charity, is entitled to exemption to income tax by rule 6 of 5 & 6 Vict. c. 35, s. 61, and also comes within the exemption from inhabited house duty of 48 Geo. 3, c. 55, case 4, Exemptions, schedule B, as a hospital or house provided for the reception or relief of poor persons.

The hospital is a building provided for the reception and relief of lunatics, who are not paupers, for whose maintenance and medical attendance sums varying from 10s. to 40s. per week are paid (except that about five patients pay an extra £1 per week for extra room accommodation); it has always been called a hospital, and has all the usual features of a hospital—namely, it was founded and built with charitable donations, it is an institution for the relief of persons suffering from a most distressing disease, and it is managed by charitable persons not deriving any pecuniary benefit therefrom, but, on the contrary, assisting it by their subscriptions.

The assessment had apparently been made under the impression that the hospital is a profit-producing institution, like the Northampton Hospital, where about £7,000 a year profit is made, or the Gloucester (Barnwood) Hospital, where £4,800 is made.

Reference to the annual reports for the three years ended December, 1887, showed that the hospital is partly and substantially supported by funds derived from charitable sources.

The real property on which the institution is carried on is vested in trustees upon trust to be used as a lunatic hospital, and for the benefit of the inmates thereof, and for no other purpose, and in such manner as the rules of the institution shall direct, and there is no power of sale; the endowment funds are also vested in trustees for the benefit of the hospital and the inmates, as a majority of the voluntary subscribers and donors shall direct, and the hospital and its inmates can alone derive benefit from the real or personal estate connected with it.

The surveyor of taxes submitted that the hospital did not come within the exemption claimed, inasmuch as it was earning profit over and above its charitable expenditure, and he cited the cases of Needham v. Bowers, 37 W. R. 125, 21 Q. B. D. 436, and St. Andrew's Hospital, Northampton v. Shearsmith, 35 W. R. 811, 19 Q. B. D. 624.

The committee submitted that "profits," as defined by the Income Tax Acts, means what remains after deducting the value of the occupation of the premises where the profit is made, and that the Coppice Hospital, having cost about £30,000, the value of the occupation is at least £1,000, from which, deducting the alleged profit of £580, a loss of £420 would appear instead of a profit.

The committee also directed special attention to the wording of the exemption clauses under schedules A, C, and D, section 61, No. 6, as to rent of lands belonging to hospitals, section 88, schedule C, 3rd exemption, and section 105, in each of which the exemption is given "so far as the same shall be applied to charitable purposes," and they alleged that the whole of the income of the Coppice Hospital is by the trust deeds bound to be, and is in fact, wholly applied to charitable purposes only.

The commissioners were of opinion that the committee of the hospital were entitled to the exemption claimed, and discharged the assessment.

The surveyor of taxes appealed.

POLLOCK, B.—This is a question involving important principles, and I think I can state in a very few words my grounds for coming to the conclusion that this, being an assessment under schedule A of the Income Tax Act, is not an assessment that can be sustained. The hospital in question was a lunatic asylum; its original object was for the maintenanne of lunatics of the poorer class. Of late years it had become very different in its support, and very different in the class of patients that it received, in consequence of a number of paying patients, who paid so well that for three years at least there was an occasional balance in favour of the trustees. That being so, the question arises whether this building, which was originally beyond doubt a hospital within the exemption created by rule 6 of the Income Tax Act, had ceased to be so.

I will begin by saying that this is not an assessment under schedule D of profits; if it were so, a very different consideration would arise. My own impression is that when the word "hospital" is used in rule 6, it intends to exempt anything that is practically of the character of a hospital, being of an eleemosynary character, and some assistance is gained by referring (as was done by Denman. J., in Blake v. The Mayor of London, 35 W. R. 212, 18 Q. B. D. 437) to the early clause of rule 6, where the words used are, "Any college or hall in any of the universities of the United Kingdom." This goes far to show that the one particular college or hall attached to one of the universities may, by money being left, or by actual payments of those who enjoy the advantage of it, have ceased to be of the same eleemosynary character that it was originally. It could not be argued, therefore, that it should come within the province of taxation.

The argument most strongly used on the part of the Crown is that which was adopted in the case of Needham v. Bowers, and in that case the buildings were assessed to the inhabited house duty, which belonged to the institution for the reception of insane persons, and which were founded by charitable donations, but unendowed. It was vested in trustees and managed gratuitously by a committee, and supported wholly out of the payments made by the patients, of whom some paid more and some less than the cost of their maintenance, and a few were maintained gratuitously. After paying the expenses there was an annual surplus of profit, which was expended in enlarging and improving that institution. In that case the court did but hold that the institution, being wholly self-supporting, was not exempt as a hospital within this exemption. We have no occasion to quarrel with that decision, nor can we say that it governs the decision in the present case, because the whole force of that decision is that the hospital there was supported wholly out of payments made by the patients, that, therefore, is not an authority which governs this case.

I think the case of Blake v. The Mayor of London is more in point. I agree entirely with what was said by my brother Denman there, that the hospital would not be the less entitled to exemption because certain fees were taken from rich persons who chose to take the benefit of the hospital. It may be that for a few years they may flourish by reason of taking those fees, but the eleemosynary character of the institution is not blotted out, but still exists. That is the distinction which arises between this case and the case of the Governors of Charterhouse School v. Lamarque, 38 W. R. 776, 25 Q. B. D. 121, which was decided by my brother Hawkins and myself last year.

Now that seems to me sufficient to dispose of the question of the income tax, with this remark, that this is not an assessment under schedule D. If the profits were assessed apart from the buildings as a going concern upon which profit was derived, a very different question would arise. The question, however, does not arise before us now.

Now comes the question under the statute 48 Geo. 3, c. 55, schedule B, with regard to the claim that is made by the Crown for inhabited house duty. By that schedule the exemption is made in these words: "Any hospital, charity school, or house provided for the reception or relief of poor persons." The same argument that I have stated with regard to the Income Tax Act seems to me to apply to this. This hospital, quoad the buildings in respect of which the assessment is made, has always been, and still is, a hospital provided for the reception or relief of poor persons, and it is not the less so although considerable moneys have been received by taking in persons who can pay, and whose payments have, during two or three years, led to an annual balance which the trustees are enabled to invest.

It seems to me, therefore, that in neither of those respects can this assessment be maintained.

CHARLES, J.—I am of the same opinion. This is an assessment under schedule A of the Income Tax Act, and the question for our consideration is whether this institution falls within any of the exemptions allowed by clause 6 of that schedule. To answer that question satisfactorily the question, and the only question, which is relevant is to ascertain what is the character of the institutions which are exempt by that clause. Now all colleges and halls of universities are exempt, and I think that they could remain exempt even though it was proved that in any particular year a particular college or hall had paid its way. Then comes the exemptions of hospitals, public schools, or almshouses, and it has been held, with regard to public schools, that those words apply to a public school which has some charitable element in its endowment. To that extent the words "public school" are to be restricted. The same thing has been held with regard to hospitals. The word itself would include such an institution as that now in question; but it has been decided that a hospital which has no charitable element whatever in its endowments is not within the exemption. It was so held in Needham v. Bowers, where the hospital was held not to be exempt, the only charitable thing about it being that it was started by charity, and it was in no sense endowed with charity. It has been pointed out for the Crown that if the accounts are analyzed the amounts received in this particular year from paying patients, overtops the expenditure of the institution itself, and so it is said that this is in no sense an institution maintained by charity, and that, not being maintained by charity, it falls within the principle of Needham v. Bowers, and is liable to assessment. The answer appears to me to be this. The question is not whether this institution does or does not in any particular year receive payments from patients which enable it to pay its way; the question is, What is the character of the institution itself? The character of this institution differs from the character of the institution which was under consideration in Needham v. Bowers in this respect, that whereas, in Needham v. Bowers, the institution was maintained wholly out of the payments by patients, and had no charitable endowments whatever, in this case there is a substantial charitable endowment, which amounts to many thousands a year. That makes all the difference between Needham v. Bowers and the present case.

I think, therefore, that this institution, endowed as it is with a substantial charitable endowment, falls within the word "hospital" used in clause 6 of schedule A.

Then, with regard to the inhabited house duty, I only desire to add one word to what has been said. The words in the exemption of the inhabited house duty are these: "Hospital, charity school, or house provided for the reception or relief of poor persons." It appears to me to be tolerably clear that these words "provided for the reception or relief of poor persons" may apply to the word "house." They certainly do not apply to a charity school, although the clause reads, "Hospital, charity school," &c., but as the word "hospital" is used along with charity school, and along with words indicating a poor house, I think that exemption must be construed in the same manner as the exemption in the Income Tax Act, and that the word "hospital" in the Income Tax Act does not include the case of a hospital with no charitable endowment, but that it does include the case of a hospital which has a substantial charitable endowment.

For these reasons I think our judgment must be against the Crown, and in favour of the respondents.

WESTMORE v. PAINE. (a.)

Justices—Practice—Power to state case—Application in writing—Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879 (42 & 43 Vict. c. 49), s. 33—Summary Jurisdiction Rules, 1886, r. 18.

A court of summary jurisdiction has no power to state a special case under the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879, s. 33, unless an application in writing, according to rule 18 of the rules of 1886, has been made to the court whose decision it is desired to question. An application in writing to two out of the five justices who composed such court is not an application made in the manner directed by the rules.

Special case stated by the justices of Dover under 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43 and 42 & 43 Vict. c. 49, s. 33.

The appellant, a stoker employed on board a steamship, was convicted at a court of summary jurisdiction of having neglected his duties as a stoker, contrary to section 243 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854. The court was composed of five justices of the borough. Upon their decision being given oral application was made on behalf of the appellant for a case to be stated on certain questions of law which had arisen, and the court granted the application. Within seven days after the hearing the appellant served upon two of the justices who had constituted the court, at their private residences, a written application, addressed to them only, to state a case, and on the same day he served a copy of the application upon the clerk of the court. The two justices stated the case, but, having a doubt as to whether the requirements of the Act and rules as to the mode of application had been sufficiently complied with so as to give them jurisdiction, stated it subject to the opinion of the court as to their jurisdiction.

The Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879, s. 33, provides that (1) "any person aggrieved who desires to question a conviction, order, determination, or other proceeding of a court of summary jurisdiction, on the ground that it is erroneous in point of law or is in excess of jurisdiction, may apply to the court to state a special case, setting forth the facts of the case and the grounds on which the proceeding is questioned. . . . . (2) The application shall be made and the case stated within such time and in such manner as may be from time to time directed by rules under this Act. . . ."

Rule 18 of the Summary Jurisdiction Rules, 1886, provides that "an application to a court of summary jurisdiction under section 33 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879, to state a special case shall be made in writing and a copy left with the clerk of the court, and may be made at any time within seven clear days from the date of the proceeding to be questioned."

Corrie Grant, for the appellant.—This case was triable "by a court of summary jurisdiction consisting of two or more justices": Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879, s. 20, sub-section (9); therefore two justices may constitute a court, and two justices having been served rule 18 has been complied with. All the convicting justices consented to the oral application for a case, and it would be very inconvenient to serve all of them with a written application. In South Staffordshire Waterworks Co. v. Stone, 19 Q. B. D. 168, 35 W. R. Dig. 110, the justices were not served at all, and so in Lockhart v. Mayor of St. Albans, 36 W. R. 800, 21 Q. B. D. 188, and Ex parte Curtis, 26 W. R. 210, 3 Q. B. D. 13. Those cases are, therefore, distinguishable.

Finlay, Q.C., and Mansfield, for the respondent, desired to obtain a decision upon the merits, and did not argue the question of jurisdiction.

POLLOCK, B.—No doubt it is a matter of regret to both parties, who wish for a decision in this case, that we have no power to hear it; but the statutory conditions precedent to the hearing have not been fulfilled. The rule is extremely clear. [His lordship then read rule 18, and continued:—] Leaving the copy with the clerk is a mere matter of convenience, and cannot affect the necessity for making the written application to the court according to the rule. It may no doubt be inconvenient to get the same members of the court together again. But the party desiring the case to be stated might serve a written application for it on each member of the court, and so serve the court. In the present case an oral application was made to the court which was sitting, and they consented to grant a case; but the applicant, instead of serving a written application on the court then sitting, afterwards made an application in writing to two only of the justices at their respective houses, and those two justices stated the case. If that would suffice, any two members of the court, even if they differed from the opinion of the majority, might state a case, and the manner in which it was stated might depend on the views of those members of the court who undertook to state it. The case could not be properly said to have been stated by the court. It is clear from the decisions in South Staffordshire Waterworks Co. v. Stone, and Lockhart v. Mayor, &c., of St. Albans that the statutory requirements as to proceeding by case stated are conditions precedent to the right of appeal, and cannot be waived by the parties or the justices, and Ex parte Curtis is an authority that "the court" means the court which had decided upon the facts. It is, therefore, clear to us that we have no power to hear this case.

IN BANKRUPTCY.

Q. B. Div. (Cave, J.) Feb. 5, 20.

In re MIRAMS. (a.)

Bankruptcy—Special case—Bankruptcy of clergyman—Chaplain of workhouse—Charge given on salary—Validity of charge—Public policy—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), s. 97.

The bankrupt, who was chaplain of a workhouse, prior to his bankruptcy gave a charge upon his salary to secure payment of a loan. Upon the bankruptcy taking place, the official receiver, as trustee, applied for an order declaring that the salary of the bankrupt as chaplain vested in him, and to restrain the person to whom the charge had been given from receiving any portion of the salary, on the ground that any assignment of the bankrupt's stipend was void or voidable as being contrary to public policy, because the bankrupt was a public officer holding a public appointment, and paid out of the public funds, and because he was a clerk in holy orders, and his salary was payable to him in respect of the cure of souls and the conduct of the services of the church.

Held, that the charge was not invalid upon the ground alleged, a clergyman having the cure of souls not being a public officer within the meaning of the principle of public policy.

Special case stated by his Honour Judge Chalmers from the county court at Birmingham for the opinion of the High Court under section 97 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883.

The case arose out of a motion by the official receiver as trustee of the estate of the Rev. Thomas Mirams, which asked for a declaration that the stipend or salary of the bankrupt as chaplain to the Birmingham guardians vested in him as trustee in the bankruptcy, and to restrain one W. G. Coulton from receiving the portion of the said stipend or salary which he claimed in respect of an assignment given to him by the bankrupt to secure payment of the sum of £49. The consideration for the assignment, which was dated December 24, 1889, was admitted.

The bankrupt is chaplain at the Birmingham Workhouse and at the Birmingham Workhouse Infirmary, his joint stipend or salary being £250 per annum.

The joint appointment is solely in the hands of the Birmingham guardians, and the chaplain is elected by a majority of votes, and the salary is paid out of the rates. The appointment is made as regards the infirmary in pursuance of article 23 of the Local Government Board Orders of December, 1888; and as regards the workhouse in pursuance of the General Orders (Consolidated) of July 24, 1847, article 153.

It was contended in the county court on behalf of the trustee that any assignment of the bankrupt's stipend was void or voidable, as being contrary to public policy—(1) because the bankrupt was a public officer, holding a public appointment, and paid out of the public funds; (2) because he was a clerk in holy orders and his salary was payable to him in respect of the cure of souls and the conduct of the services of the church.

It was contended for the respondent (1) that the office held by the bankrupt was not an office of State, to which alone the doctrine of public policy applies; (2) that the alienation of a clerical stipend is only void or voidable under the statute of 13 Eliz. c. 20, which relates solely to charges by beneficed clergy on their benefices.

The questions stated by the county court judge for the opinion of the High Court were:—

1. Whether the assignment to Mr. Coulton was void or voidable in so far as related to the assignment of or charge upon the aforesaid stipend.

2. Whether the said salary or stipend vested in the trustee as and when received by the bankrupt.

Muir Mackenzie stated the case.—The question is whether the salary of this person appointed public chaplain of the workhouse and infirmary is assignable. The duties of the chaplain are prescribed. His remuneration is paid out of the rates and is awarded to him by the guardians. The contention is that an assignment of salary by an officer holding such a public office, and having regard to the public religious duties he has to perform, is invalid on the ground that it is contrary to public policy.

He referred to Palmer v. Bate, 2 Brod. & Bing. 673; Cooper v. Reilly, 2 Sim. 560; Grenfell v. Dean and Canons of Windsor, 2 Beav. 544; Ex parte Huggins, 30 W. R. 878, 21 Ch. D. 85.

T. W. Chitty, for the respondent.—In all the cases cited the appointment has been from the State, and has been of a permanent nature. Here the appointment is held at the will of the guardians, and it is not public. At the most, this office of chaplain can only be called quasi-public, and in all the cases the appointment was of a permanent character, which this is not.

He referred to Feistel v. King's College, Cambridge, 10 Beav. 491; Metcalf v. Archbishop of York, 1 My. & Cr. 547.

Cur. adv. vult.

Feb. 20.—CAVE, J.—The question in this case is whether a charge given by the bankrupt on his salary as chaplain of the Birmingham Workhouse and Workhouse Infirmary is void on the ground of public policy. As we all know, certain kinds of contracts have been held void at common law on this ground, a branch of the law, however, which certainly should not be extended, as judges are more to be trusted as interpreters of the law than as expounders of what is called public policy.

I have been referred to Grenfell v. Dean of Windsor and Ex parte Huggins as containing the clearest exposition of the law on this subject. In the former case it was pointed out that in order to avoid the assignment of the pay or salary of an officer on this ground the office must be a public one, or in some way connected with the public service; and that the public is interested, not only in the performance from time to time of the duties of the office, but also in the fit state of preparation of the party having to perform them. On the former ground the pay or salary of persons in the service of the Crown, and on the latter ground the half-pay of officers in the military or naval service, cannot be assigned. Similarly in Ex parte Huggins it was laid down that pay given to induce persons to keep themselves ready for the service of the Crown, and pay for actual services rendered to the Crown, cannot be assigned.

On these grounds it has been held that the salary of a clerk of the peace, a freehold office connected with the administration of justice, cannot be assigned: Palmer v. Bate; nor can the salary of an assistant Parliamentary counsel to the Treasury: Cooper v. Reilly. It was in consequence of some of the expressions made use of by the Master of the Rolls in Grenfell v. Dean of Windsor that this case was stated for my opinion, the learned judge of the county court entertaining some doubt whether a clergyman, having the cure of souls, was not a public officer within the meaning of the principle in question. Upon consideration I think that these doubts, though natural, are not warranted by any decided case. It has never been held that a clergyman, having the cure of souls, is a public officer, and, as I have said above, the doctrine in question ought not to be extended. At common law a beneficed clergyman could charge his benefice, and although that was made unlawful by the 13 Eliz. c. 20, yet when that Act was repealed by the 43 Geo. 3, c. 84, in 1803, a charge given between 1803 and 1817, when the 43 Geo. 3, c. 84, was repealed, and the 13 Eliz. c. 20 was revived by the 57 Geo. 3, c. 99, was held valid: Metcalf v. The Archbishop of York. In this case it is true that the salary is paid out of the poor rate, and that the chaplain, although appointed by the guardians, can only be dismissed by the Local Government Board, but I am of opinion that this is no solid ground of distinction. To make the office a public office the pay must come out of the national, and not out of local, funds—the office must be public in the strict sense of that term. It is not enough that the due discharge of the duties of the office should be for the public benefit in a secondary and remote sense. I must, therefore, answer the questions put to me by saying that, in my judgment, the charge is not invalid on the ground suggested.

With regard to the second point, there is, I think, no question that, during the continuance of the bankruptcy and of the office, the salary, subject to the charge, vests in the trustee as property of the bankrupt within section 44, subject to the power of the court to make an order under section 53, sub-section (2), appropriating the salary in the manner therein pointed out.

Court of Appeal.

From Q. B. Div. April 29.

Ex parte COUNTY COUNCIL OF KENT AND COUNCILS OF THE BOROUGHS OF DOVER AND SANDWICH. (a.)

Local government—Transfer of powers to county council—Question for decision of High Court—Right of appeal to Court of Appeal—Local Government Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 41), s. 29—Judicature Act, 1873, s. 19.

By section 29 of the Local Government Act, 1888, if any question arises, or is about to arise, as to whether any business, power, duty, or liability is or is not to be transferred to any county council or joint committee under this Act, that question, without prejudice to any other mode of trying it, may, on the application of a chairman of quarter sessions, or of the county council, committee, or other local authority concerned, be submitted for decision to the High Court of Justice.

Held, that the decision of the High Court upon a question submitted to it under the above section is not a "judgment or order" within section 19 of the Judicature Act, 1873, and that no appeal lies from such decision.

Appeal from the decision of the Queen's Bench Division, reported [1891] 1 Q. B. 389, upon certain questions submitted to the High Court under section 29 of the Local Government Act, 1888.

The County Council of Kent having appealed,

Henn Collins, Q.C., and J. V. Austin, for the council of the borough of Dover, took the preliminary objection that no appeal lay.—Section 29 gives merely a consultative jurisdiction to the High Court, and no appeal lies from the answers given by the court to the questions submitted to it. The decision of the court is not a "judgment or order" within section 19 of the Judicature Act, 1873. There is no machinery to enforce the decision. The question submitted need not have actually arisen, and the decision is to be without prejudice to any other mode of trying the question. The Act provides a convenient mode of obtaining the opinion of the court upon the numerous questions that might arise under the Act.

They referred to Walsall Overseers v. London and North-Western Railway Co., 27 W. R. 189, 4 App. Cas. 30; Bell Cox v. Hakes, ante, p. 145, 15 App. Cas. 506; Haslam Foundry Co. v. Hall, 36 W. R. 407, 20 Q. B. D. 491.

Henn Collins, Q.C., and H. F. Dickens, for the council of the borough of Sandwich.

Channell, Q.C., and Gore, for the County Council of Kent.—This is not a mere consultative jurisdiction. The words "without prejudice to any other mode of trying it" shows that this is only one of the modes of trying the question. The fact that there is no mode provided for enforcing the decision of the court is not conclusive to show that the decision is not an "order" which can be appealed from.

They referred to Corporation of Peterborough v. Wilsthorpe, 32 W. R. 548, 12 Q. B. D. 1.

Cur. adv. vult.

April 29.—The judgment of the COURT (Lord HALSBURY, L.C., Lord ESHER, M.R., and FRY, L.J.), which was read by FRY, L.J., was written by

Lord HALSBURY, L.C.—The only thing with which we have to deal is whether in the form in which the question now arises before us there is an appeal to this court. We are of opinion there is not. An appeal must be given, and it is not to be presumed. We do not, of course, mean that it must be given in so many words. If the thing appealed from becomes a judgment or order, decree or rule, of the High Court, it would, of course, be appealable under section 19 of the Judicature Act, 1873, and perhaps something which may fill the character of a judgment or order, although not known by those names, may be subject to appeal as being practically within the words by which a right to appeal is given, although the words themselves be not used. Now the language of section 29 of the Local Government Act, 1888, which we have to construe, provides that the matter (which we shall describe presently) is to be "decided" by the High Court of Justice. If those words are to be taken by themselves, and without reference to the subject-matter dealt with in the section, they certainly imply no right of appeal. In the case of The Overseers of the Poor of Walsall v. The London and North-Western Railway Co., though the Court of Appeal was divided on the subject of whether an appeal existed in that case or not, no doubt was (nor, we think, could be) expressed that if the proceeding then in question had been purely of a consultative character, no appeal would lie, but for reasons partly depending upon the forms of the procedure, which involved a rule quashing an order of sessions, the House of Lords ultimately held that an appeal did lie.

Now in this case (again postponing the consideration of the thing to be done under the section, and confining ourselves for the moment to the mere words) there is no rule, there is no order, there is no judgment, there is no decree. The word used in the section is "decision." We think the Legislature must be taken to have been aware of the state of the law as pronounced by the House of Lords in 1878, and if those who framed the Act of Parliament had intended that an appeal should lie they would have either given it by express words, or taken care to use the language the importance of which had been pointed out ten years before by the decision of the House of Lords in the case to which we have referred. But the Legislature has not done so. It has used a popular and not a technical or legal word, and we are of opinion that it must be taken to have intentionally used a word which would exclude the right of appeal. And now, dealing with the subject-matter to which the question relates, we cannot doubt that the nature of the matter referred to is one which itself suggests that the application to the High Court of Justice is intended to be purely consultative. In the first place, it is not necessarily a question that has arisen, but one which may be about to arise. It is to be a question of the transference of the "business, power, duty, or liability" from one set of authorities to another, and it appears to have been thought convenient, without any existing litigation justifying the intervention of a court of justice, that the High Court of Justice might be consulted for their opinion as to which local authority was the proper authority for undertaking such "business, power, duty, or liability." We have used the words "might be consulted" because, although the actual language is "submitted for decision," it is a question which might be "about to arise," and can therefore only be decided in the sense of expressing the opinion of the court how it ought to be decided when it does arise. It is to be "without prejudice to any other mode of trying it," and it can only be submitted on the application of a "chairman of quarter sessions or of the county council, committee, or other local authority concerned." So far as we can see, there is no obligation on the High Court to hear anybody who might be interested as a matter of fact in the decision of the question. And when one sees that the only parties to such a consultation are the authorities which may be charged with the administration of the "business, power, duty, or liability," it is to our minds clear that the Legislature did not contemplate an actual determination of any existing dispute in which a private right was involved, and in which the owner of that private right would have all the ordinary rights of a citizen to maintain it in a court of law, but was solely dealing with the question as to which set of authorities should be charged with such and such portions of administration. The Legislature sufficiently guarded private rights by saying that such an application to the High Court should be without prejudice to any other mode of trying it. They gave discretion to the court to hear such parties as the court itself should think just, and confining the decision, as we think they did, to the High Court of Justice, they appear to us to have carefully avoided the use of any language or any forms of procedure which might involve a right of appeal. For these reasons we are of opinion that this court has no jurisdiction to entertain the questions now raised on appeal, and that this application must be dismissed.

Shipping—Advanced freight—"One-third freight, if required, to be advanced, less three per cent. for interest and insurance"—Loss of vessel before requirement of advanced freight.

Where a charter-party contained the clause, "One-third freight, if required, to be advanced, less three per cent. for interest and insurance," and the demand for payment of the advanced freight was not made until after the vessel and cargo had been totally lost,

Held, that the demand had been made too late, and that the charterers were not liable for the advanced freight.

Decision of Charles, J. (ante, p. 318, [1891] 1 Q. B. 42), reversed.

Appeal from the decision of Charles, J., reported ante, p. 318, [1891] 1 Q. B. 42.

The action was brought by shipowners against charterers on a charter-party to recover the sum of £245 advanced freight.

On the 30th of November, 1888, the defendants chartered the plaintiffs' ship, The Gamma, to load a cargo of coals at Hull and proceed therewith to Odessa, freight to be paid on unloading and right delivery of the cargo. The charter-party contained the following clause: "One third freight, if required, to be advanced, less three per cent. for interest and insurance.

On the 19th of December The Gamma left Hull, and the same afternoon she grounded in the Humber, and was, with her cargo, totally lost. Bills of lading had not then been presented or signed, but on these being presented by the charterers after the loss was known the shipowners asked for the payment of one-third freight in advance, and on being refused brought the present action. Charles, J., held that the demand for payment was not too late, and that the charterers were therefore liable.

The defendants appealed.

The arguments used and cases cited were the same as in the court below.

Lord COLERIDGE, C.J.—I am of opinion that this appeal must be allowed. The contract which is before us for construction is one standing by itself, and our judgment must proceed on the true construction of that contract. Anything, therefore, that I may say leaves the general law on the subject entirely untouched. The ground of my decision is therefore short and simple. We have to deal with a contract containing words which are different from those of any of the decided cases. No doubt for certain purposes advanced freight is freight which, in a general way, and if there is no qualification, cannot be recovered back if it has been paid. The words in the particular contract are: "One-third freight, if required, to be advanced, less three per cent. for interest and insurance." I am clearly of opinion that the fair meaning of those words is that the freight should be advanced if it was required at a time when the three per cent. could be used for the purposes of interest and insurance. The requiring the payment to be made is a condition precedent to its being advanced. It is unnecessary to decide precisely what the nature of the requirement must be. It is clear, I think, that some kind of demand must be made for the freight to be advanced. But it must be a demand for freight which, when paid, is capable of being insured. In this case the demand was not made until a time at which it would have been impossible for the charterer to insure if he had paid it. The demand was not made at a time, therefore, when it could be enforced. The contract is, in my opinion, expressly framed to prevent a further extension of the law laid down in previous cases as to the inability of the charterer to recover advanced freight. The demand was, therefore, in my opinion, too late.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—According to the other terms of the charter-party, the freight which the charterer had to pay was to be paid on the unloading. If, therefore, the vessel never reached its destination, no freight would have been payable. But then comes this stipulation, that part of the freight shall be advanced if required. It is a well-known peculiarity of English law with regard to advanced freight that if the freight is advanced, and both ship and goods are lost, and never reach their destination, nevertheless the freight cannot be recovered, and, further, that, in the absence of any stipulation to the contrary, advanced freight becomes payable the instant the vessel leaves the port of loading, and may therefore be recovered even although she is lost on the voyage. The parties, knowing this to be the law, enter into this contract, which is not in the ordinary and well-known form. It is altered in favour of the charterer, and the part of the freight which is to be advanced freight is not made due when the vessel leaves port, but it is to be due only when demand for it is made by the shipowner.

The demand is, therefore, a condition precedent to the liability of the charterer to pay the advanced freight at all. The shipowner may not demand it, and until he does so the liability to pay it does not arise. Until the charterer has to pay it he has no insurable interest in the freight. But in this case when it was demanded there was no freight that could be insured. I think that the demand must be made at a time when the charterer was in a position to insure the risk he ran—that is to say, at any time before the loss of the vessel. After the loss of the vessel the demand was too late, and the charterers, therefore, were not liable to pay. I think Charles, J., misapprehended Lord Kingsdown's words in Kirchner v. Venne, 7 W. R. 455, 12 Moo. P. C. C. 361, and did not give them the interpretation which was put upon them by the House of Lords in Allison v. Bristol Marine Insurance Co., 24 W. R. 1039, 1 App. Cas. 209.

FRY, L.J.—The stipulation in question creates an option in the payee as to the time at which this part of the freight shall be paid. Primâ facie such an option can only exist so long as the sum may be payable. Directly the sum becomes unpayable the option ceases to exist. Primâ facie, therefore, this option cannot be exercised after the freight has, by the loss of the vessel, become unpayable. But then come in the rules which the Master of the Rolls has mentioned as to advanced freight. I do not think they affect this case. Obviously, this was to be a payment of freight on account. How can there be a payment on account when the freight itself is no longer payable? Again, there is a provision that three per cent. is to be deducted for interest and insurance—interest as compensation to the charterer for paying earlier than he otherwise would have done, and insurance of the risk he ran. But after the loss of the ship he would have to pay no freight, and, therefore, no such compensation would be needed. So, as to insurance, he could not insure in respect of a sum which was already lost. I think, therefore, that this was an option which could only be exercised so long as there was a sum which could be paid. It is clear that it never was so exercised, and that this appeal must, therefore, be allowed.

Married woman—Capacity to contract—Separate property—Restraint on anticipation—Married Women's Property Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 75), s. 1, sub-sections 2-4.

In an action of contract against a married woman under section 1, sub-section 2, of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, the plaintiff must show that the defendant had separate estate at the time of entering into the contract.

Palliser v. Gurney, 35 W. R. 760, 19 Q. B. D. 519, affirmed.

A gift to a woman to her separate use will not be implied from the mere fact that there is a restraint upon the alienation or anticipation of income given to her.

Appeal from the decision of Day, J.

The action was brought against the defendant, who was a widow, to recover £1,320 18s. 6d. due to the plaintiff from the defendant under a covenant.

On the 20th of November, 1875, the defendant, who was then the wife of C. L. Thorpe, executed a deed of separation with her husband, by which her husband covenanted with trustees to pay to them an annuity of £500 (which he had agreed to allow his wife "as for her separate maintenance and support during the joint lives" of himself and his wife), such annuity to be held by them during the continuance thereof, upon trust to pay the same to his wife "as and for her separate use without power of anticipation." Thorpe died in 1877, having by his will left to his executors certain sums of money to be invested in favour of certain ladies therein named, and a sum of £5,000 in trust to invest and to pay the income arising therefrom to his wife, the defendant. The will went on to declare that none of the ladies benefited by the will "shall have power to alienate, charge, or anticipate the income of the several legacies bequeathed for their benefit." On the 26th of April, 1880, the defendant married Philip Lee, and on the 20th of January, 1883, an agreement was executed between Lee and the defendant of the one part and the plaintiff of the other part whereby it was admitted that the defendant was indebted to the plaintiff in the sum of £1,320 18s. 6d. for moneys advanced by him to her, and in consideration thereof, and of the forbearance by the plaintiff to enforce immediate payment, Lee and the defendant jointly and severally covenanted to pay the said sum and interest to the plaintiff on the 8th of February, 1883, and charged the properties contained in the schedule thereto as security for such payment. The schedule comprised the income and arrears owing from the sum of £5,000, to which the defendant, or Lee in her right, was entitled under Thorpe's will, and the arrears due to her under or by virtue of the separation deed.

Lee died in 1886, and the present action was commenced in March, 1889.

Day, J., gave judgment for the plaintiff against the separate estate of the defendant.

The defendant appealed.

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., Aspland, Q.C., and Moxon Browne, for the defendant.—The defendant had no separate estate which she could bind at the time she executed the charges in favour of the plaintiff. In order to bind after-acquired separate property a married woman must have some separate property at the date of the contract: Married Women's Property Act, 1882, s. 1; In re Shakespear, 33 W. R. 744, 30 Ch. D. 169; Palliser v. Gurney, 35 W. R. 760, 19 Q. B. D. 519; Leak v. Driffield, 38 W. R. 93, 24 Q. B. D. 98. The arrears of the annuity remaining unpaid at the date of the death of the former husband, C. L. Thorpe, were not separate property, because the separate use was only created for the joint lives of Thorpe and the defendant. As to the £5,000, the restraint on anticipation cannot create a separate use. It is only valid when it is added to an interest given to a woman for her separate use: Baggett v. Meux, 1 Coll. 138; Moore v. Morris, 5 W. R. 383, 4 Drew. 33.

Channell, Q.C., and Herbert Reed, for the plaintiff.—As to the arrears of annuity, when property is given to a woman for her separate use, the separate use applies to every coverture, and only ceases to have effect so long as she is discovert. It revives if she remarries without having disposed of the property: Tullett v. Armstrong, 1 Beav. 1, 4 My. & Cr. 377. As to the £5,000, it is only necessary in order to create a separate estate that there should be an intention to do so, and the court will infer such an intention from the clause restraining anticipation.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—I think the objections which have been taken to the judgment are too strong to be got over, and we must disagree with the learned judge in the court below.

The whole matter depends upon what is the true construction of the separation deed and the will. If the construction of them both is such that the defendant had no separate estate at the time when the charges in favour of the plaintiff were created, the plaintiff's case necessarily fails, by reason of the decision in Palliser v. Gurney. That case will now have the authority of the Court of Appeal, as well as that of a divisional court consisting of three judges of the Court of Appeal.

With regard, then, to the construction of the separation deed, I think it is admitted that if the deed had said in express terms "the annuity which I give to my wife for our joint lives is to be for her separate use as against me only," there would be no separate use as against any other husband whom the wife might have after the death of the first. But I think that upon any reasonable construction of the deed as a whole, one must be led to the conclusion that the husband was speaking only of a separate use in his wife as against himself. He could not have been thinking of a husband to whom she might be married after he was dead, because the annuity was to cease with the joint lives—that is, the moment he died if he died first. He could not, therefore, have intended to give the annuity to the separate use of his wife as against a husband whom she might marry after his death. With regard to any husband whom she might marry in case of a divorce obtained by himself, the deed provides that, if the cause for the divorce should arise after the date of the deed, the annuity is thenceforth to cease, and, therefore, he could not have thought of that any more than of a husband whom she might marry after he was dead. There was, of course, the possibility of his finding out after the execution of the deed that he had a cause for obtaining a divorce from his wife which existed before the date of the deed. But can anyone who takes a reasonable view of human nature suppose that when he made this deed and settled an annuity of £500 a year on his wife he was contemplating the possibility of her having previously given him a good ground for obtaining a divorce, and intending that, in case he should obtain a divorce on that ground, the annuity should be to her separate use as against any husband whom she might then marry before his own death. The very notion is absurd.

Can it, then, be supposed that he was contemplating the possibility of his wife's obtaining a divorce from him? It is conceivable that he might afterwards give her a good cause for obtaining a divorce; that is in human nature; but that he should sit quietly down and contemplate the possibility of his doing so is not conceivable, because the only cause which he could give her would be adultery, coupled with cruelty, and, therefore, he would be contemplating something very wrong on his own part. The question of desertion could not arise, because the husband and wife were agreeing to live separately. I think, therefore, it is clear that the separate use mentioned in the deed is a separate use of the income as against the first husband alone, and that arrears of the annuity which ought to have been paid before, and which, if they had been paid before, would not have been separate estate, except as against him, were not, after his death, separate estate at all.

Then we come to the will of the husband. The will gives the wife the income of a sum of £5,000 during her life, without any words of separate use: but there is a subsequent declaration that she is not to have "power to alienate, charge, or anticipate the income." Are those words by themselves, there being no other words, sufficient to give her a separate estate as against her husband; are those words enough to authorize the court to draw the inference that the income was intended to be the wife's separate property? On this point there is in Baggett v. Meux a dictum of Knight-Bruce, V.C., which, although it was not necessary for the decision of that particular case, was part of his considered judgment. He says in the most deliberate and explicit terms that words (equivalent to those of the present will) prohibiting alienation of property by a married woman would be of no effect, unless there were also other words giving the property to her for her separate use. And Lord Langdale, in Tullett v. Armstrong, used language which shows that he took precisely the same view as Knight-Bruce, V.C. Two such authorities as these are, I think, sufficient to determine the present case on authority alone. But on principle the construction insisted upon on behalf of the plaintiff would lead to this, that that which is a mere accessory to the separate use for the purpose of rendering it effectual ought, standing alone, to compel an implication of that separate use to which it is only an accessory. I think that the two cases to which I have referred govern the construction of this will, and that no separate estate was given to the wife by it.

The defendant had, therefore, no separate property, either by deed or will, as against her second husband, and she had, therefore, no separate estate at the time she entered into the covenant sued upon. It follows that we cannot agree with the learned judge, and we must allow the appeal and enter judgment for the defendant.

BOWEN, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. As regards the restraint on alienation created by the will, nothing is plainer than that such a restraint may be effectual as an accessory to a separate use already existing. If, however, the restraint is imposed in any other way, it is inoperative. I think I need say no more on this point.

Then as regards the separation deed the argument for the defendant comes to this, that the deed shows that the separate use was not intended to continue beyond the existence of the marital relation between the parties. I would rather put it thus, that the deed was intended to create a separate use only during the joint lives of the parties, for I desire to leave open the possibility that in the probably undreamt-of contingency of a divorce, to which the Master of the Rolls has alluded, the separate use would have arisen as against a second husband taken by the wife during the joint lives of herself and her first husband. Whether that view or the one taken by the Master of Rolls is the more correct one is not really material, because the separate use was certainly to come to an end at the death of either party.

FRY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. With regard to the separation deed, it appears to me difficult to conceive that there could be an intention that the produce of the annuity should be held to the separate use of the wife at a time when the annuity itself had ceased. The annuity was to cease on the death of either husband or wife. It is difficult to imagine that a separate use could be created after the death of the husband, but I think the meaning is reasonably plain as expressed in the instrument itself. In the first place, there is a recital that the husband had agreed to allow the wife an annuity of £500 "as and for her separate maintenance and support during the joint lives" of himself and his wife. Then follows the most material part of the deed, the declaration of trust:—"It is agreed and declared that the trustees, and the survivor of them, shall stand possessed of the annuity during the continuance thereof, upon trust to pay the same to the wife for her separate use without power of anticipation." Therefore, by the express terms of the instrument itself, the trust for the separate use is declared only during the continuance of the annuity. In other words, the deed declares that the separate use is to be until the death of whichever shall first die of the husband or wife, and we are only giving effect to the instrument itself in holding that whether the separate use applies to any other coverture than that which was then existing, it does not apply to any coverture which may exist after the termination of the joint lives.

Now with regard to the will the case stands thus. There is a gift of income to four ladies (one of them being the testator's wife) for their respective lives, and there is a declaration that neither of them "shall have power to alienate, charge, or anticipate the income of the several legacies bequeathed for their benefit." It is admitted that that, as it stands, is an attempt to restrain anticipation by the ladies during their lives, whether they are married or unmarried; but we are asked to cut it down to a restraint on anticipation during coverture only, and thence to infer a gift to their separate use. Now it is to be observed that a restraint on anticipation can never exist except as an accessory to a trust for a separate use, and we are asked to infer the existence of the substance from the existence of the accessory. In my opinion that cannot be done. It must be borne in mind that the courts have always leaned against a restraint on alienation, and for this very obvious reason, that to give property to a person involves giving him a power to alienate it, and an instrument which, while giving property, takes away that incident to it, must always be construed strictly. I believe that in no case has a trust for a separate use been inferred from a restraint on alienation.

Attention has already been drawn to Baggett v. Meux, in which Knight-Bruce, V.C., expressed a clear and decisive opinion that this could not be done; and I may quote also the language used by Lord Langdale in Tullett v. Armstrong, where he says:—"I conceive that the validity of a clause in restraint of alienation, when clearly expressed in connection with a clause giving the estate for the separate use of a married woman, also clearly expressed, has not till lately been doubted." That, I think, is the furthest extent to which the doctrine has been carried, and therefore it is impossible for us, from the general restraint on alienation or anticipation, to infer a trust for the separate use of the wife. Consequently the defendant had no property for her separate use at the time when she executed the charge in favour of the plaintiff, and therefore, on the authority of Palliser v. Gurney, the plaintiff's case fails, and we must give judgment for the defendant.

Appeal allowed.

(a.) Reported by H. M. CHARTERS MACPHERSON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

This was a summons by vendors under the Vendor and Purchaser Act, 1874, for the purpose of ascertaining whether they could make a good title to certain freehold hereditaments situate in Church-road and Clarence-place, Bristol.

The title commenced with indentures of lease and release, dated the 22nd and 23rd of November, 1836, the release being made between Ann Whittaker, the elder, of the first part, John Walker and Martha his wife, William Perryman and Mary his wife, James Hammonds and Elizabeth his wife, Thomas Horatio Penny and Charlotte his wife, Ann Whittaker, the younger, and Rebecca Whittaker, of the second part, and William Dwevvy and Thomas Penny of the third part. By it the property in question was conveyed unto and to the use of William Dwevvy and Thomas Penny, their heirs and assigns, upon trust that they or their assigns, or the survivors of them, or the heirs and assigns of such survivor, or other the trustees or trustee for the time being, should sell the same as therein mentioned. And it was therein provided that if any of the trustees thereby appointed, or to be appointed as thereinafter was mentioned, should depart this life, or decline to act in the trusts thereby in them reposed, then and in such case it should and might be lawful to and for the said Ann Whittaker, the elder, during her life, and after her death to and for the said John Walker and Martha his wife, William Perryman and Mary his wife, James Hammonds and Elizabeth his wife, Thomas Horatio Penny and Charlotte his wife, Ann Whittaker, the younger, and Rebecca Whittaker, and the survivors and survivor of them, and after the death of such survivor to and for the acting trustees or trustee for the time being, or the executors or administrators of the last acting trustee, to appoint one or more person or persons to be a trustee or trustees in the room of the trustee or trustees so dying or declining to act, and that the property should be vested in the trustee or trustees so appointed.

All the parties of the second part named in the said indenture, died without having exercised their power of appointing new trustees.

William Dwevvy died in 1849, and Thomas Penny died in 1855, intestate as regards trust estates, leaving Thomas Horatio Penny his heir-at-law.

Thomas Horatio Penny died in 1857, intestate as regards trust estates, leaving Thomas Horatio Stephen Penny his heir-at-law.

Thomas Horatio Stephen Penny died intestate in 1876, leaving his three daughters, Charlotte Matilda Penny, Emma Bird, and Clara Ann James, his co-heiresses-at-law.

By an indenture dated the 7th of June, 1890, Charlotte Matilda Penny, Emma Bird, and Clara Ann James, who had never previously acted as trustees, purported to appoint George Cunningham, Alfred James Hammonds, and Edwin Arthur Hammonds, trustees of the deed of the 23rd of November, 1836, and to vest the property in them.

The trustees thus appointed on the 7th of July, 1890, entered into an agreement for the sale of the property to E. S. Frayling.

H. F. Lawes, for the vendors.—The power of appointing new trustees in the deed of 1836 was validly exercised by the deed of 1890. The three co-heiresses were not only seised of the legal estate, but were also "acting trustees" within the deed of 1836.

He referred to In re Morton and Hallett, 28 W. R. 895, 15 Ch. D. 143, and the Conveyancing and Law of Property Act, 1881, s. 31, sub-section 6.

Warrington, for the purchaser.—The three ladies never acted in the trusts save to execute the deed of 1890, and they were consequently not "acting trustees." Further, the legal estate never vested in them upon the death of Thomas Horatio Stephen Penny, who was a "bare trustee" within section 5 of the Vendor and Purchaser Act, 1874, and section 48 of the Land Transfer Act, 1875, and upon whose death intestate the property devolved upon his personal representative.

He cited Morgan v. Swansea Urban Sanitary Authority, 27 W. R. 283, 9 Ch. D. 582, and Re Docwra, Docwra v. Faith, 33 W. R. 574, 29 Ch. D. 693.

Lawes, in reply, referred to Christie v. Ovington, 24 W. R. 204, 1 Ch. D. 279. A trusteeship that involves considerable responsibility cannot be described as "bare."

STIRLING, J.—This case raises a question of law between vendor and purchaser which it is not satisfactory to have to decide. That question is whether the deed of the 7th of June, 1890, was a valid exercise of the power of appointment contained in the deed of the 23rd of November, 1836..

It is said that Charlotte Matilda Penny, Emma Bird, and Clara Ann James were not the "acting trustees or trustee for the time being." Now according to the case of In re Morton and Hallett it is clear that the heir-at-law of the last surviving trustee who has the legal estate can execute a trust for sale; and here the trust estate has devolved upon Charlotte Matilda Penny, Emma Bird, and Clara Ann James as co-heiresses-at-law of Thomas Stephen Horatio Penny, and if the legal estate in the property also devolved upon them they were in a position to exercise the trust for sale

It is quite plain from the judgment of Jessel, M.R., in In re Morton and Hallett that he thought that where, as here, there is a trust to sell and a power of appointing new trustees, the heir-at-law of the last surviving trustee can execute that power. Now here, if the legal estate vested in the three co-heiresses, it seems to me that they, being persons capable of executing the trust, would fall within the designation of "trustees or trustee for the time being" in the power to appoint new trustees in the deed of the 23rd of November, 1836. Then are they "acting" trustees? I am told that they have received no rents from the property; but I find them here exercising the power of appointing new trustees, which is evidence of their acting. Their not having received the rents is not irreconcilable with this, because it merely amounts to this, that down to a certain time they did not act, but did so, when called upon, by executing this power. I think, therefore, they are "acting trustees" within the meaning of the power.

Then the question remains, whether, having regard to the Vendor and Purchaser Act, 1874, and the Land Transfer Act, 1875, the legal estate vested in these ladies? There are conflicting opinions of Jessel, M.R., and Hall, V.C., as to the meaning of a "bare trustee" within these sections. I regret to have to decide between them, but as I have to form my own opinion on the subject, I must state that I prefer the view of Hall, V.C. This was, as I understand it, that a trustee with active duties to perform is not a "bare trustee" within the meaning of these sections. It is obvious that in Morgan v. Swansea Urban Sanitary Authority, though it was not necessary for his decision, the late Master of the Rolls held a contrary opinion. He says: "I should have thought that a 'bare trustee' or a 'naked trustee' meant a trustee without any beneficial interest." Being of opinion, however, that the view of Hall, V.C., is preferable and more in accordance with the general opinion of the profession, I hold that Thomas Stephen Horatio Penny was more than a bare trustee, and that the legal estate devolved upon these ladies as his co-heiresses. I have already held that they were acting trustees; they had, therefore, power to appoint new trustees, and the appointment which they made was valid. I therefore hold that the vendors have made out a good title to the property.

SHACKELL v. COLNETT. (a.)

Mortgage—Payment off by part owner of property under mistake—Presumption of intention to keep mortgage alive.

A person who, believing himself to be the owner of an estate, pays off a mortgage upon it, when he is in fact only owner of a portion, will be presumed by the court, in the absence of any express declaration by him, to have made the payment for his own benefit, and the mortgage will be deemed to be kept alive as to the portion of the estate not belonging to him.

A testator devised hereditaments, which were subject to mortgage, to his six children, including P. and S. P. acquired three more of the six shares, and in 1859 he purchased the share of S. In 1862 S. commenced a suit to set aside this sale to P., but before the decree P. paid off the mortgage on the five-sixths of the property to which he believed himself to be entitled.

Held, that the mortgage was kept alive as against the share of S. for the benefit of P.

All the necessary facts are stated in the judgment.

Graham Hastings, Q.C., and F. Thompson, for the summons.—Under such circumstances equity will always presume that a mortgage is kept alive for the benefit of the person paying it off. It is absurd to suppose that J. Pride paid off the mortgage on the share of a hostile litigant.

They cited Adams v. Angell, 25 W. R. 139, 5 Ch. D. 634; Earl of Buckinghamshire v. Hobart, 3 Swans. 186; Drinkwater v. Combe, 2 Sim. & St. 340; and Countess of Shrewsbury v. Earl of Shrewsbury, 1 Ves. jun. 227.

Augustine Birrell, for the plaintiffs.—The plaintiffs were ignorant of J. Pride's dealing with the mortgages till after the commencement of the action. Any equity to the mortgage has been barred by lapse of time.

Hastings, Q.C., replied.

STIRLING, J.—In this case a summons has been taken out by the defendants to vary the certificate of the chief clerk made in pursuance of a judgment in an action brought by the trustee of the plaintiff's marriage settlement and the plaintiff against the trustees and executors of one James Pride to recover a share of the residuary estate of one Thomas Pride, with accounts of such share and of the income thereof. This judgment directed (1) an inquiry whether two mortgages affect the one-sixth share of the plaintiff, Susan Spring, in the testator's residuary real and personal estate, and what is due to the defendants in respect thereof, and (2) an account of the rents and income of such one-sixth share received by the defendants.

The question is whether the two mortgages are still subsisting; and the chief clerk has found that they are not.

As regards, first, the mortgage for £2,000, the facts are, shortly stated, as follows:—Thomas Pride was the father of the plaintiff, S. Spring, and had five other children, to whom (by his will) he left his residuary real and personal estate in (practically) equal sixths, James Pride taking one-sixth share and S. Spring another. Part of the property consisted of land and tithes which, with other property not belonging to the testator, were subject to two mortgages, the amounts due upon which, prior to the date of the re-conveyance, to which I shall presently refer, had been reduced to £2,000 and £300. James Pride had from time to time acquired other shares of his brothers and sisters, in his father's estate, and on the 19th of April, 1859, Susan Spring executed a deed conveying her sixth to him; so that, in the result, James Pride became possessed of the whole of his father's residuary estate (with the exception of the share of Anne Jones, one of the daughters) subject to the two mortgages. On the 1st of December, 1867, Susan Spring commenced a suit to set aside the sale of her share to James Pride, and by a decree of Wood, V.C., dated the 17th of February, 1864, it was set aside. In the meanwhile, on the 1st of February, 1864, a deed was executed, to which the first and second mortgagees, a party entitled to a charge on the property, Henry Jones and Anne, his wife, entitled to one-sixth, and James Pride, entitled to the remainder, were parties, and which was in form a reconveyance to James Pride, of the whole residuary estate, subject to a right of redemption as to one-sixth share in favour of Henry Jones and Anne, his wife. There was, therefore, an absolute reconveyance to James Pride of five-sixths of the property, including the share of Susan Spring, free from the mortgages. Did that in equity put an end to the mortgage?

There is a statement of the law on this subject in the case of Adams v. Angell, where the late Master of the Rolls said: "In a court of equity it has always been held that the mere fact of a charge having been paid off does not decide the question whether it has been extinguished. If a charge is paid off by a tenant for life, without any expression of his intention, it is well established that he retains the benefit of it against the inheritance. Although he has not declared his intention of keeping it alive, it is presumed that his intention was to keep it alive, because it is manifestly for his benefit. On the other hand, when the owner of an estate in fee or in tail pays off a charge, the presumption is the other way; but in either case the person paying off the charge can, by expressly declaring his intention, either keep it alive or destroy it. If there is no reason for keeping it alive, then, especially in the case of an owner in fee, equity will, in the absence of any declaration of his intention, destroy it; but if there is any reason for keeping it alive, such as the existence of another incumbrance, equity will not destroy it."

The question here is under which branch of the rule thus laid down this case falls—whether under that which applies when a tenant for life pays off a charge, or when the owner in fee or a tenant in tail does so. Even in the case of a tenant in tail, if the estate cannot be barred and the tenant thus become absolutely entitled, the rule that the charge is not presumed to be kept alive does not apply, as was decided by Lord Thurlow in Countess of Shrewsbury v. Earl of Shrewsbury; and so, too, in Drinkwater v. Combe, in the case of an owner in fee who paid off the charge, where the estate was subject to an executory devise over, which took effect, it was held that the usual rule did not apply. The presumption, therefore, is in either case that the intention is to keep the charge alive, because to keep it alive is for the benefit of the person who pays it off.

Here the owner of five-sixths of the estate paid off the charge pending a suit to set aside the sale to him of one of these sixths. It would be most unreasonable to presume that he paid it off for the benefit of the very person who was bringing that suit against him instead of for his own benefit. I think, therefore, I must follow the cases to which I have just referred, and apply the rule which is applicable where a tenant for life pays off a charge on the inheritance without expressly declaring his intention. I think, therefore, an intention must be presumed to keep alive the mortgage of £2,000.

[His lordship then dealt with the mortgage for £300, and also with the accounts and other evidence which showed that James Pride had, in fact, shown his intention of keeping the mortgages alive, and varied the chief clerk's certificate.]

GOOD v. LICKORISH. (a.)

Will—Gift of income to A.—Cesser on assignment or bankruptcy—Discretionary trust to apply income for the benefit of A. only—Discretion of trustees.

A discretionary trust to apply income for the benefit of a cestui que trust, arising upon cesser of his life interest by assignment or bankruptcy, may be exercised by the trustees, notwithstanding that the cestui que trust is the only object of the discretionary trust.

A testatrix directed trustees to stand possessed of a fund upon trust to pay the income to T. W. B. during his life, or until he should become a bankrupt or liquidating debtor, or should cease to be entitled to receive such income for his own benefit; and, in case any of those events happened, then "to pay to him or apply for his benefit during the remainder of his life" either the whole or so much only of the said income as the trustees should, in their uncontrolled discretion, think fit, and, "subject to the aforesaid interest," upon trust for other beneficiaries. T. W. B. assigned his interest, and subsequently became bankrupt.

Held, that the trustees might, in the exercise of their discretion, expend the whole or any part of the income for the maintenance of T. W. B., and that any part not so applied by them went to the persons entitled under the gift over.

Semble, that payment of the debts of T. W. B. might be an application of the income for his maintenance.

Adjourned summons.

Mary Bullock by her will, dated the 29th of May, 1883, in exercise of a power of appointment given to her by her husband's will, directed that the trustees of the fund subject to such power, should stand possessed of £15,000, part thereof, upon trust to invest the same, and to pay the income of the investments to her son T. W. Bullock during his life, or until he should become a bankrupt or a liquidating debtor or cease to be entitled to receive such income or any part thereof for his own personal use or benefit by any means or for any purpose, and upon any of those events to pay to him or apply for his benefit during the remainder of his life either the whole or so much and so much only of the said income as the testatrix's late husband's trustees or trustee should in their or his uncontrolled discretion think fit, and subject to the aforesaid interest thereinbefore appointed in favour of the said T. W. Bullock, the trustees should hold the said sum and the investments and income upon trust for other objects of the power. Mary Bullock died in 1886.

By a memorandum of charge, dated the 30th of January, 1889, T. W. Bullock assigned to Messrs. Lickorish & Bellord all his interest under Mary Bullock's will to secure a sum of about £500, and notice of this assignment was on the 23rd of August, 1890, given to the trustees.

On the 23rd of October, 1890, a receiving order was made in bankruptcy against T. W. Bullock, and in December he was adjudicated a bankrupt.

This was a summons by the trustees of the fund asking for the opinion of the court as to whether they might during the life of T. W. Bullock apply any part of the income of the fund in providing, as the trustees should think fit, for the past and future lodging, board, clothing, maintenance, and support of T. W. Bullock, and the payment of sundry legal expenses, or how the income ought to be dealt with by them.

March 21.—KEKEWICH, J.—[After holding that the assignee of T. W. Bullock and the trustee in his bankruptcy had no valid claim to any part of the income of the fund, continued:—] The question is raised as between T. W. Bullock and those entitled under the gift over who are claiming adversely to him. The argument on their behalf was that the language of the will only empowers the trustees to pay the income to T. W. Bullock or apply it for his benefit, and that neither of these things can be done. As regards payment reliance was placed on the decision in In re Coleman and my own judgment in Hemming v. Neil, to which, on reflection, I adhere; and it was said that to pay income to T. W. Bullock would be to make a payment in derogation of the overriding title of the trustee in bankruptcy, and therefore a wrongful payment, which would be no discharge to the trustees of the will, and would render them accountable to the trustee in bankruptcy. That argument is, I think, well founded.

As regards applications for the benefit of T. W. Bullock it was argued that where the court has upheld a discretionary trust for applications arising on bankruptcy or its equivalent, the discretion has been exercisable with reference to the wife and children as well as the bankrupt, and the courts have proceeded on the impossibility of determining beforehand what, if anything, the trustees would, in the exercise of their discretion, apply for the benefit of the bankrupt as distinguished from the other objects of the power. The language of the judgments in Godden v. Crowhurst and Kearsley v. Woodcock countenances this argument, but the precise point now before me was not before the court in either case. I can see no reason on principle for defeating the obvious intention of the testatrix. It is clear that the trustee in bankruptcy can take no interest in income applied for the benefit of the bankrupt; and it is difficult to see how those entitled under the gift over can successfully claim as coming to them what, if it does not come to them, would not go to the trustee in bankruptcy. In Chambers v. Smith it was held that trustees possessing a discretionary power might exercise it in favour of beneficiaries, notwithstanding arrestment by judgment creditors. [His lordship referred to the judgments of Lords Hatherley and Blackburn, 3 App. Cas., pp. 804, 807, 817, and continued:—] T. W. Bullock has no control over the fund when the trustees resolve to exercise their discretionary power. He cannot, and no one claiming through him can, make a claim against the trustees for payment. The assignment in this case, which is equivalent to the arrestment in Chambers v. Smith, called the discretionary power of the trustees into operation; and it would be a contradiction to hold that the power is inoperative just when it was intended to be exercised. What the trustees in the exercise of their discretion do not from time to time think fit to apply for the benefit of T. W. Bullock, goes by the words of the will to those entitled under the gift over, but they take only this overplus, and cannot claim what the trustees determine to apply.

I was asked by the trustees to define the limits within which they may apply the income for T. W. Bullock's benefit. I find it extremely difficult to do this in the abstract, and I am unwilling to fetter the trustees' discretion, which was intended to be, and ought to be construed as a large discretion. I can say no more at present than that they certainly may, in my opinion, spend the whole or any part of the income in maintenance, using that word in its most general and widest sense; and I doubt whether I was right in saying in the course of the argument that they could not properly pay T. W. Bullock's debts. The discretion is vested in them, and they must exercise it, and so long as they exercise it honestly—that is, as men of ordinary business habits and prudence—and with due regard to all the circumstances of the case, the court will not interfere with them.

KENRICK v. DANUBE COLLIERIES AND MINERALS CO. (LIMITED). (a.)

Copyright—Publication—Report—Injunction—Damages.

A mining engineer, K., made a report upon a mining property and handed it to a person engaged with a syndicate in bringing out a company. It was agreed between them that the report might be printed and shown to the syndicate, and, if they determined to proceed with the formation of the company and published the report, K. was to be paid £1,000 for it, but if the company was not proceeded with, the report was to be returned to him. Some 100 copies of the report were printed and shown to the syndicate. Copies were given to some of the members of the syndicate and to one or two other persons. The proposed company having been abandoned, the defendant company took up the property, and, having obtained a copy of the report, made use of it in the prospectus issued by them.

Held, that K. was entitled to an injunction against the company to restrain them from publishing the report, which remained his property, and also to an inquiry as to damages.

The plaintiff, William Wynn Kenrick, was a mining engineer of considerable experience in English and foreign coalfields. In 1884 he surveyed the Ubunya Collieries and other coalfields in Hungary, which were about to be sold to certain persons who were contemplating the formation of a limited company, to be called the Danubian Coal and Iron Co. (Limited). The plaintiff prepared a detailed report, dated the 22nd of May, 1884, of the collieries and properties, with plans and an appendix, and handed it to F. W. Dawson, one of the persons interested in the formation of the proposed company. It was agreed between F. W. Dawson and the plaintiff that the former might print the report, plans, and appendix, and show them to the persons who were engaged with him in the formation of the company, and if they published the report, plans, and appendix, or otherwise made use thereof, the plaintiff was to be paid therefor the sum of £1,000; but that, if the formation of the company was not proceeded with, the report, plans, and appendix were to be returned to the plaintiff.

The plaintiff subsequently went to South Africa on professional business, and soon after his departure F. W. Dawson and the syndicate determined to abandon the formation of the company. Dawson had caused 100 copies of the report to be printed, and in addition to copies which were given to some of the members of the syndicate a copy was given to one Argles, who was the owner of the mine, and another to one Clemisha, and others to the plaintiff himself.

Subsequently a new company (the defendant company) was incorporated for the purpose of acquiring and working the said collieries and mineral properties, and the promoters having obtained a copy of the plaintiff's report, plans, and appendix, handed the same to the directors of the company.

On the 18th of November, 1889, a prospectus of the new company was published containing references to the plaintiff's report and appendix, and it was stated that a copy of the plaintiff's report, with others, could be seen at the company's offices.

The plaintiff issued his writ on the 3rd of April, 1890, and claimed an injunction to restrain the defendant company from issuing or publishing any copies of the prospectus or otherwise publishing the report and appendix, and also an inquiry as to damages. The defence denied the agreement above stated, and alleged that the plaintiff's report and appendix were printed and published before they came into their hands, and that the plaintiff was not the registered proprietor of the copyright therein. The defendants also pleaded that if they had infringed the plaintiff's rights they had been led to do so by the plaintiff's own conduct, and had done so in ignorance of his rights, and stated that they had no intention of issuing or publishing further copies of the prospectus.

parted with his report on a condition which was not fulfilled, nor has it been published except in the limited manner specified in the agreement; any further publication was unauthorized. The plaintiff has, therefore, at common law, power to prevent any infringement of his right in a private unpublished document.

Neville, Q.C., and E. F. Studd, for the defendants.—The publication of the report is admitted, and was authorized by the agreement; the effect of that agreement was to create a transfer of the plaintiff's right to Mr. Dawson, who is the proper person to sue. The plaintiff, not having registered his copyright, has no claim to an injunction to restrain the publication, if any, of the plaintiff's reports: Edlesten v. Edlesten, 11 W. R. 328, 1 De G. J. & Sm. 185.

H. Terrell, in reply, on the question of publication, referred to the cases of Jefferys v. Booseys, 4 H. L. 815, 3 W. R. Dig. 155; Caird v. Sime, 36 W. R. 199, 12 App. Cas. 326, see p. 343.

ROMER, J.—The evidence in this case is meagre, and it is not easy to ascertain what the real facts of the case are. It is admitted that the plaintiff is the author of the report, the subject of this action, in which term I include the appendix and plans, so that his title is primâ facie clear. The defences to the action urged at the bar on behalf of the defendants are in substance two. First, that the plaintiff has sold his right to the report to one F. W. Dawson, and is, therefore, not the proper person to sue. Secondly, that the report was published by the plaintiff, or by his authority, before action brought, and that the plaintiff, not having registered, cannot sue for infringement of copyright. It appears to me important to bear in mind that the onus of proving the facts upon which these two defences are based is on defendants. To support their first defence the defendants rely on the agreement which is pleaded in paragraph five of the statement of claim, and urge that the conditions under which the £1,000 became payable to the plaintiff were complied with. But they have not proved to my satisfaction that Mr. Dawson and the persons who were engaged with him in the formation of the intended company, and who have been referred to as the syndicate, "determined to proceed with the formation of the said company." I agree with the argument of the defendants' counsel that this phrase does not necessitate the company being registered and floated, but, on the other hand, some latitude must be allowed to the syndicate, and it would not follow that, because some steps were taken towards the formation of the company, the syndicate had determined to proceed, within the meaning of the phrase in the agreement.

The only witness on the point is Mr. Dawson, who gave evidence for the plaintiff. The plaintiff himself was abroad, and could not be called. An application was made to me before the action to allow a commission to issue to take his evidence and postpone the trial, but this application I refused. Now Mr. Dawson did not say that the syndicate had determined to proceed. It was not for the plaintiff to establish this, but for the defendants, and the question was not asked him. The defendants then ask me to infer such a determination. It appears to me that I cannot safely do so. On the one hand I find from the evidence of Mr. Dawson that the company was not registered, and that no contract concerning the company was ever registered, and that the first directors of the company were never selected, and the idea of forming the company appears to have been abandoned because sufficient capital could not be obtained. Some letters of the plaintiff were referred to as throwing doubt on the evidence of Mr. Dawson, but Mr. Dawson was clear, and I think that the statements in the letters were not accurate. Indeed, it is clear that in some respects they are not accurate, and I see no sufficient reason for discrediting Mr. Dawson, especially as the defendants have not called any witness to speak to any matter beyond the acts of the defendants themselves, and how they became possessed of the plaintiff's reports. As against this it also appears from Mr. Dawson's evidence that a prospectus was prepared, and the memorandum and articles of association of the intended company. But, as I have said, I cannot safely draw from this such an inference as the defendants ask. But beyond this, for the reasons I will presently mention, I have come to the conclusion that there has been no publication of the report (beyond the defendants' unauthorized acts). Nor has, in my judgment, the syndicate been proved to have "otherwise made use thereof" within the meaning of that phrase in the agreement. The only acts which were relied on by the defendants to support such a user, beyond the showing of the report to the syndicate expressly provided for by the agreement, were the sending of a copy of the report to Mr. Argles, and also giving one to Mr. Clemisha. But it does not appear that Mr. Argles, who was one of the owners of the mines, was not also a member of the syndicate, or that Mr. Dawson in sending the copy to him was using the report by authority of the syndicate, and as to Mr. Clemisha, it is improbable that the copy was given to him with such authority, seeing that it was given as late as 1886 or 1887, and Mr. Dawson appears when he gave it to have felt he was acting without authority, having regard to what he says he stated to Clemisha at the time. At any rate, I again say, the onus being on the defendants to establish the user within the meaning of the agreement, they have not discharged it to my satisfaction.

The result is that the conditions on which, according to the agreement, the plaintiff was to be paid for the report have not been complied with, and the report remains his, and this view is strongly supported by the fact that the £1,000 has not been paid or sued for, and that the parties to the agreement are only the plaintiff, who is suing as owning the report, and Mr. Dawson, who comes as a witness to support the plaintiff's case.

As to the second point, prior publication is not proved. The only witness on the point is Mr. Dawson. The defendants had no witness to support this part of their case. Mr. Dawson's evidence is substantially to the following effect: That there was no publication of the report (unless what I am about to state is a publication); that the report was printed according to the agreement with the plaintiff, and shown to the members of the syndicate and a copy given to one or two members and to the solicitor of the syndicate, and that some copies were sent to the plaintiff; that a copy was sent to Mr. Argles and also to Mr. Clemisha, and these I will especially refer to; that except as above no copies were parted with, and only 100 copies were printed, and except those parted with, these copies remained in Mr. Dawson's possession, but how many remained he could not say. Now it is admitted that the mere printing of the report for the purpose of showing it or handing copies of it to a few persons engaged in considering the formation of the company would not be a publication. Nor, in my judgment, was the mere sending of one copy to Mr. Argles a publication, even if that gentleman were not one of the syndicate, having regard to his possession as one of the co-owners of the property, and even if Mr. Dawson was authorized to hand the copy to him, which has not been established.

As to the sending of one copy to Mr. Clemisha, I have already dealt with that. It appears to have been sent to enable Clemisha to assist Dawson in finding persons to help in bringing out Dawson's proposed company, and this would not constitute a making public of the report, even if Dawson had been authorized in what he did by the plaintiff, which, from Dawson's words and demeanour, I gathered he was not. Moreover, neither Clemisha nor Argles is forthcoming as a witness for the defendants, though the defendants claim through them. Clemisha cannot be found, and that may be the misfortune of the defendants. But Argles appears to have been in communication with the defendants, and assisting them, but he is not called, nor is any explanation offered of his absence. The defences, therefore, in my judgment, fail.

The defendants appear to have got the copy of the report which they used from either Argles or Clemisha, probably the latter, though the matter is left somewhat in obscurity on the defendants' evidence. Certainly from no point of view was Argles or Clemisha entitled to deal with the copy of the report which he obtained by selling it to the defendant company, or by authorizing the defendant company to use it as that company has done, and no care or inquiry as to the title of Argles or Clemisha to the report appears to have been taken or made by the defendant company or by Captain Inglis, who was the vendor of the company; so that, even if the defendants succeeded in their defences to the present action, they would still be open to an action for damages by the right owner after registration.

It follows that the plaintiff is entitled to an injunction. The defendant company printed the report and used it by showing it to applicants for shares, as admitted by their statement of defence, and by stating the substance of it in their prospectus. The offer, after action brought, in the statement of defence, coupled with a denial of the plaintiff's right, does not entitle the defendants to resist the injunction. I think the plaintiff has suffered damage. It is said that the case is like the innocent user of a trade-mark in ignorance of the true owner's rights, which gives no claim at law in damages to such true owner. I think the cases are not the same. The plaintiff here has a property recognized at law, which has been injured by the defendants' acts. I therefore give him an inquiry as to damages for the part publication by the defendants of his report.

The injunction will be to restrain the defendants, their agents and servants, from further publishing the said report, plans, and appendix, or any of them. The defendants must pay the costs up to and including judgment. The costs of inquiry as to damages will be reserved.

The plaintiff, a railway porter, sued his employers, a railway company, for deductions made from his wages applied as contributions to a sick fund under the terms of a written agreement signed by him, the amount of such deductions being shown by the defendants to have been in fact expended in medical relief to the plaintiff and his wife.

Held, that a contract for deductions to be applied for medical relief was not in contravention of the Truck Act, 1831, and the amending Act of 1887, but came within the contracts legalized for exceptional purposes under section 23 of the Truck Act, 1831, and that the permissory provisions of section 23 must be read on to the prohibitory provisions of the amending Act of 1887.

Appeal from the judgment of his Honour Judge Bristow, sitting at the county court of Doncaster, in favour of the defendants.

This was an action by a railway porter against his late employers, the Great Northern Railway Co., for £2 8s. 9d., the amount of certain deductions made from his weekly wages under an agreement as to the terms of his service signed by him at the time of service, and paid into the Great Northern Railway Sick and Funeral Allowance Fund. The following clause was the clause of the agreement signed by the plaintiff, so far as it was material to the present action:—"There will be deducted from the pay of every porter under all circumstances so long as he continues to be a servant of the company the following sums, . . . being contributions to the Great Northern Railway Co.'s Sick and Funeral Fund, established for the benefit of the company's servants, administered under the rules, copies of which are supplied. It is optional for any servant to join this fund if he belongs to some other benefit society entitling him when sick to 10s. a week if a man, or 3s. 6d. a week if a lad." A table of the contributions so deducted was attached to the form of agreement.

The drawback, or deduction, amounted to 8s. a year, and evidence was given by the defendant company that the whole of that amount (and more) had been expended for medical attendance upon the plaintiff or his wife. The plaintiff contended that any such deduction was in contravention of the Truck Acts of 1831 and 1887 (1 & 2 Will. 4, c. 37, and 50 & 51 Vict. c. 46), and that he, being "engaged in manual labour," was entitled to the benefit of those Acts under the provision of section 2 of the amending Act of 1887 extending their scope to manual labourers. The judge held that the deduction came under the exceptional deduction for medical expenses legalized by section 23 of the Truck Act, 1831, and gave judgment for the defendants.

The plaintiff now appealed.

Aspland, Q.C., and Blake Odgers, for the appellant.—Such a deduction was not "payment of wages in current coin of the realm" or "payment of the entire amount of wages" as required by sections 1 and 3 of the Truck Act, 1831. The agreement was illegal as being "a contract made directly or indirectly respecting the manner in which the wages should be expended" contrary to section 2 of the said Act. These provisions are re-enacted by sections 3 and 6 of the amending Truck Act, 1887, and the exceptional deductions, including that for medical attendance, allowed by section 23 of the earlier Act are only exempted from the prohibitory provisions of the later Act in regard to section 5 of that Act, which allows an employer to counter-claim in respect of anything excepted under section 23. This deduction was not made solely for medical attendance, but for a general benefit fund, and medical attendance to a wife does not come within the scope of section 23.

Montague Lush, for the respondents, was not called upon.

A. L. SMITH, J.—The plaintiff in this action was a servant in the defendant company's employ from August, 1876, up to June, 1890. At first he was a goods guard, and afterwards he became a porter at one of their railway stations. In March, 1880, he signed a document containing the terms on which he was willing to serve the company. This was a written agreement, and the only term to notice as material for the present purpose is one accepting wages at the rate of from 16s. to 18s. a week, from which he covenanted to agree to a small weekly deduction to go to the Great Northern Sick and Funeral Allowance Fund.

Under the terms of this form of agreement it was optional for any employee to subscribe to this fund if he was a member of any other benefit society and entitled to not less than 10s. a week when on sick pay. The plaintiff had paid under this covenant 8s. a year. He now brought an action to recover the amount so deducted from September, 1887, to June, 1890, on the ground that previous to the first date the Truck Act of 1887 had become law, and that under that Act any such deduction from the rate of wages had become illegal, and he sued for £2 8s. 9d. as the amount deducted for the above-mentioned fund during this period. The defendant company, on the other hand, say, first, that there was no contravention of the Act by them in retaining this amount, and, secondly, they produce evidence that the whole of the amount deducted, and more, has been expended by them in payments for medical attendance upon the plaintiff or his wife in each year during this period. It is admitted that the plaintiff, as a railway servant, could not have sued before the recent Truck Act of 1887 came into operation, because the old Truck Act of 1831 (1 & 2 Will. 4, c. 37), did not apply to such a class, but the later Act applies the provisions of the former Act to "persons engaged in manual labour" within the terms of the Employers and Workmen Act, 1875. This point has not been argued before the court, because it has not become necessary. We know that the defendants' counsel was prepared to argue against the plaintiff being entitled to be included under that term. Without expressing any binding opinion, I will only say that, as at present advised, I should be inclined to hold that the plaintiff as a porter was, in fact, a manual workman within the meaning of the Act and in accordance with the principles of interpretation of those words laid down by Day, J., and myself in Morgan v. General Omnibus Co., 32 W. R. 416, 12 Q. B. D. 201.

But to come to the point argued before us. Was this deduction by the defendant company from the plaintiff's wages prohibited or not by the two Truck Acts read together as enacted? By sections 2, 3, and 4 of the Truck Act, 1831, drawbacks generally are prohibited, but by section 23 they are permitted in the particular case of drawbacks for medical attendance. Certain drawbacks are legalized by section 23. One of these is the drawback for medical attendance, provided that the agreement to allow it is in writing. The agreement here was in writing; but it is said that it was for something more than medical attendance, in that it was for a general benefit fund including other purposes than medical attendance. However that may be, the company here have proved that the whole amount and more has been actually expended in medical attendance on the plaintiff or his wife. He cannot now turn round and claim for money proved to have been so expended as "wages earned and not actually paid to him by his employer" under the terms of section 4. It is, however, said that such a deduction, if not prohibited by the Truck Act of 1831, comes under the prohibition of section 6 of the amending Act of 1887. That section deals particularly with agreements for deductions or drawbacks made under coercion. Such contracts as come under the first sections of the Act of 1831 are to be illegal and void if proved to have been made under coercion; but does that section apply at all to agreements sanctioned under section 23 of the earlier Act? The two Acts are to be construed together. That being so, the proviso in section 5 of the later Act, expressly excepting agreements under section 23 of the earlier Act, seems to me really surplusage. The provisions of section 23 as to the particular drawbacks legalized must be read in after both sections 5 and 6 of the later Act, and if the agreement, as here, comes under section 23, as one for medical attendance, it is excepted from the prohibitory provisions of the later Act, whether expressly provided to be so excepted or not. I do not think the dicta by some of the court in In re Morris are applicable. That was a case where there was no written contract, and the dicta merely suggest a query as to what might have been the opinion of the court had there been a contract in writing.

I am of opinion that the judgment for the defendants must be affirmed, and this appeal must be dismissed.

GRANTHAM, J.—I agree. The contract must be held to include medical relief afforded to the plaintiff's wife as well as to himself. I think that section 5 of the later Act must have been re-enacted, though nearly in the same form as in the earlier Act, in order to meet the case of a counter-claim by the employer, whereas the earlier Act only dealt with any set-off in these various respects made by an employer. Again, section 2 of the earlier Act applies only to "wages due" to the workman, whereas section 6 of the later Act applies to the place or manner in which the wages "are paid," and against any coercion by the employer as to the method in which such wages are to be afterwards expended by the workman. In any case, section 23 supplements all the provisions of the later Act, and agreements for the purposes legalized by that section are excepted from any prohibitory provisions of the later Act.

Appeal dismissed.

LANGSTON (SURVEYOR OF TAXES) (Appellant) v. GLASSON (Respondent). (a.)

Inland revenue—Income tax—Bursar of college—Salary as bursar—Exemption from income tax in respect of such salary—Income Tax Act, 1842 (5 & 6 Vict. c. 35), s. 146, Schedule E.

The principal bursar of St. John Baptist College,

(a.) Reported by Sir SHERSTON BAKER, Barrister-at-Law.

Oxford, claimed to be exempt from income tax on his salary of £450 a year which he received as such bursar, on the ground that, though not actually a member of the corporation of the college, his salary is "by statute" a charge upon the revenues of the corporation, and is therefore equally exempt from direct taxation. The principal bursar is an officer appointed for five years by the president and fellows, who are members of the foundation, and he is, by the statutes of the college, one of the necessary officers of the college.

Held, that, as he was not one of the body who constitute the college, but merely an officer appointed by the president and fellows, he was not entitled to the exemption claimed, but was liable to be assessed for income tax, under Schedule E. of section 146 of 5 & 6 Vict. c. 35, upon the salary which he received as bursar.

Case stated by Income Tax Commissioners under section 59 of 43 & 44 Vict. c. 19.

At a meeting of the Income Tax Commissioners for the University of Oxford on the 21st of December, 1889, Mr. William J. W. Glasson, M.A., of St. John Baptist College, principal bursar of the said college, appealed against an assessment on £450 under Schedule E. of 5 & 6 Vict. c. 35, s. 146, made upon him for the year ending the 5th of April, 1890, being the amount of his stipend as the principal bursar of St. John Baptist College.

The Act 5 & 6 Vict. c. 35, s. 146, enacts that the duties thereby granted contained in the Schedule marked E. should be assessed and charged under the following rules, which rules shall be deemed and construed a part of this Act, and to refer to the said duties, as if the same had been inserted under a special enactment.

Rule 1 provides that the duties should be annually charged on the persons respectively having, using, or exercising the offices or employments of profit mentioned in the said Schedule E., or to whom the annuities, pensions, or stipends mentioned in the same schedule shall be payable, for all salaries, fees, wages, perquisites, or profits whatsoever accruing by reason of such offices, employments, or pensions, after deducting the amount of duties or other sums payable or chargeable on the same by virtue of any Act of Parliament, where the same have been really and bonâ fide paid and borne by the party to be charged.

Rule 3 provides that the said duties shall be paid on all public offices and employments of profit of the description hereinafter mentioned, videlicet (amongst others), any office or employment of profit held under any ecclesiastical body, whether aggregate or sole, or under any public corporation, or under any company or society, whether corporate or not corporate; any office or employment of profit under any public institution or on any public foundation of whatever nature or for whatever purpose the same may be established.

The respondent claimed to be exempt from direct assessment on the above sum, which represents his stipend as bursar, on the ground that, though not actually a member of the corporation of the college, his salary is "by statute" a charge on the revenues of the corporation, and is, therefore, equally exempt from direct assessment; he also said that he received the same allowances for buttery, &c., charges as members who are actually on the foundation.

The respondent put in a copy of the statutes made for St. John Baptist College by the University of Oxford Commissioners acting in pursuance of the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge Act, 1877.

Statute 1 provides as follows:—"The college shall consist of a president, fellows, and scholars." Statute 4, section 1, provides:—"The officers of the college shall be the vice-president, two deans of arts, a bursar or bursars, tutors, lecturers, and librarian. If there are more bursars than one, one of them shall be called the principal bursar." Section 2: "The president and fellows may regulate the conditions of the tenure, and the powers, duties, and emoluments, as well of such new offices as of the existing offices." Section 3: "The officers of the college, with the tutors and lecturers, shall be elected by the president and fellows at stated general meetings, and for periods not exceeding five years."

On the 25th of April, 1889, the respondent was duly elected principal bursar for five years, at a yearly salary of £450.

The surveyor, in support of the assessment, contended that the office of bursar in this case, not being held by a fellow or any person on the foundation of the college, was an "office" or employment of profit held under a society corporate, and as such fell within rule 3 of 5 & 6 Vict. c. 35, s. 146; that the college had no power to, and do not, deduct income tax from the bursar's stipend, and there was no enactment to exempt the stipend from direct taxation.

The commissioners found (1) that the respondent was not on the foundation of the college, but that (2) his stipend was charged by the statutes of the college on the corporate revenues of the college, and they held that the stipend was not directly assessable, and allowed the appeal.

The surveyor appealed.

Sir R. E. Webster, A.G., Sir E. Clarke, S.G., and Danckwertz, for the appellant.

A. P. Poley, for the respondent.

POLLOCK, B.—This is an appeal on the part of the Crown upon an exemption allowed by the commissioners sitting for Oxford University in favour of the bursar of St. John Baptist College, in the University of Oxford; and they allowed that deduction to be made "because his stipend was charged by the statutes of the college on the corporate revenues of the college"; and they also added that they had regard to the "official interpretation of the law expressed by the Board of Inland Revenue," a matter which ought not to be the ground of decision either by the commissioners or by us. The question is, Is that deduction admissible? I am sorry to say I have come to the conclusion that it is not.

The bursar is a gentleman who comes within statute 4 of the College Statutes which were passed, and to which the common seal of the University of Oxford Commissioners was affixed in the year 1881; and by statute 4, which relates to officers of the college, it is provided by the 1st section that "the officers of the college shall be the vice-president, two deans of arts, a bursar or bursars, tutors, lecturers, and librarian." Then there is a power given to the president and fellows to regulate these offices, and they may from time to time institute new offices, and they may suppress offices, and they may assign to such new offices reasonable stipends as they may think proper; and they may from time to time regulate the condition of the tenure and the powers, duties, and emoluments as well of such new offices as of the existing offices.

It is to be observed that the respondent was appointed in 1889, certainly long since the passing of these statutes; therefore that clause as to existing offices does not apply. Therefore he receives such stipend as the president and fellows at their general meeting consider to be the proper stipend. We were referred to the original statutes of the college with reference to the position and payment of the bursar. The only point that throws any light upon his position is that it is said as to his stipend, "a collegio recipiat." When we look at the collocation of these words, and see that there are several officers who are to be paid in like manner, they do not at all show that he is one of the body who constitute the college. If he were one of the body who constitute the college in the sense that he was one of those who had the power of dividing among themselves the revenues of the college, then there would be no office, no salary, but he really would be receiving that which fell to his lot as one of that college body. It is clear to me, both from the original statute and from this more recent statute of 1881, that he is an officer in the sense that he is appointed by the president and fellows, and he receives a salary for the discharge of his duties.

Then, that being so, we find, by reference to Schedule E. of the Income Tax Act, by the 3rd subsection, "the duties paid upon all public offices, and employment of profit of the description hereinafter mentioned within Great Britain shall be as follows." Then follow a series of offices belonging to the Houses of Parliament, courts of justice, and so forth, and then comes this: "Any office or employment of profit held under an ecclesiastical body, whether aggregate or sole, or under any public corporation, or under any company or society, whether corporate or not corporate." Therefore this case comes within that strictly, and in substance also it comes within that definition, and as such it seems to me that the respondent must pay this income tax exactly in the same way as if he had received a salary that was paid by some other corporation or by some private individual. With regard to that corporate body, they pay upon the funds which belong to a corporate body, and those who are the constituent members of that corporate body are merely persons going to form the body. The funds of that body belong to the corporate body as a corporate body, and not to the individual members, and are dealt with accordingly by the Income Tax Act. Again, it was said that the bursar gets his pay from the college; true, he does in this sense, that he is employed by the college, and whether an action for his salary should be against the collegiate body or against those individual persons appointing him, who would recoup themselves from the funds of the college, is equally immaterial.

It was said there was a little hardship upon the respondent, and the commissioners obviously thought so, because of the direction given to the officers of the Inland Revenue by the Board of Inland Revenue, and that is in these words, "The members of a capitular or collegiate body are not liable to direct assessment in respect of sums which they are as members of the corporate body legally entitled to receive out of the taxed income of the corporation. Salaries paid out of such income to persons who are not members are, however, chargeable by direct assessment, unless they are a charge by statute or otherwise on the revenue of the corporation." That really raises only the point raised here to-day. If we could find that the respondent was a member of the collegiate body, and was merely taking his share of the collegiate property, then he would not be taxed; but if he comes within the second branch, namely, that he receives a salary paid out of such income, then, though it is said that applies only to persons who are not members, it seems to me that there is no hardship in respect of this direction given. Any one construing the direction with reference to the legal status of the parties would see no difficulty in saying that the respondent came within the second category, and not within the first. However that may be, the objection as to hardship raises no point of law at all. It is only fair, however, to allude to it as part of the commissioners' ground of decision.

It appears to me, therefore, that this allowance cannot be made, and that this assessment is incorrect.

DILLON v. CORPORATION OF HAVERFORDWEST. (a.)

Income tax—Gas works belonging to municipal corporation—Profit on trade with private customers—Deductions—Expenditure incurred in lighting streets—Income Tax Act, 1842 (5 & 6 Vict. c. 35), s. 100, Schedule D., Cases I. and II.

The corporation of a borough were empowered by Act of Parliament to erect gasworks and light the streets without contracting for the purchase of gas; and they were further empowered, after sufficiently lighting the streets, to supply gas to any persons who should be willing to pay for it.

Held, that, in estimating the profits of their trade with their private customers, for the purpose of assessment to the income tax, they were not entitled to deduct the amount expended in the public lighting of the streets.

Case stated by Income Tax Commissioners under 43 & 44 Vict. c. 19, s. 59.

At a meeting of the commissioners for the general purposes of the income tax for the division of Haverfordwest, held on the 31st of October, 1888, the Corporation of Haverfordwest appealed against an assessment of £558 10s. made upon them under Schedule D. in respect of the profits of their gas works.

A local Act of Parliament, passed in 1835 (5 & 6 Will. 4, c. lxxiii.), for paving, lighting, and otherwise improving the town of Haverfordwest, after appointing certain persons to be commissioners for carrying the Act into execution, by section 45 empowered the commissioners, or the persons with whom the commissioners might contract for the purpose, to set up lamps in the streets, and light the same with gas, oil, or otherwise. Section 53 empowered the commissioners, if they thought fit to light the streets without contracting for the same, to erect gasometers and all necessary apparatus for the production and supply of gas, and for that purpose to purchase land. Section 56 enacted that, if the commissioners should deem it expedient to erect such gas apparatus and to light the streets without contracting for the same, it should be lawful for them, after sufficiently lighting the streets, to let or demise to any person or persons who should be willing to take the same any lights or burners, and to supply the same with gas upon such terms and conditions, and at such annual rents for the same, and in such manner, as the commissioners should think proper; provided that all money to arise therefrom should be, in the first instance, applied towards defraying the expenses of the said gas apparatus and other things connected therewith, and if there should be any overplus, then the same should be applied generally for the purposes of the Act. Section 96 authorized the commissioners, for the purpose of defraying the expenses of carrying the Act into execution, to levy a rate annually on the occupiers of all dwelling houses and other buildings within the district not exceeding one shilling in the pound.

By an Act (40 & 41 Vict. c. cxxxii.) to confirm certain provisional orders of the Local Government Board, all the jurisdiction and powers of the said commissioners were transferred to the council of the borough of Haverfordwest.

The commissioners, and afterwards the corporation, annually levied a rate of one shilling in the pound under section 96.

The sum of £558 10s., at which the corporation were assessed, represented the profits made by them in their business of supplying gas to private consumers. The corporation contended that they were entitled to deduct from such profits the expenses incurred by them in the manufacture of gas for the public lamps and in lighting the streets. The surveyor of taxes, on the other hand, contended that such expenses could not legally be deducted.

The commissioners of income tax decided in favour of the corporation, and reduced the assessment to £500 17s. 9d.

The surveyor of taxes, being dissatisfied with the decision, required the commissioners to state a case, for the purpose of bringing this appeal.

Danckwerts (Sir Edward Clarke, S.G., with him), for the appellant.—The respondents, in the first place, carry out their statutory duty of lighting the public lamps; and in the second place, over and above that duty, they carry on a trade, manufacture, adventure, or concern in the nature of trade—viz., the manufacture and supply of gas to private consumers. They are liable to be assessed to income tax on the profits arising from that trade. The method of ascertaining those profits is to set on one side the gross receipts and to set on the other side those expenses which the Income Tax Act allows to be deducted therefrom. By section 60, Schedule A, No. III., 3, of the Act of 1842, gas works are to be assessed on the amount of the profits received therefrom; and the expenses allowed to be deducted in ascertaining those profits are those specified in the rules to Schedule D: see 29 & 30 Vict. c. 36, s. 8. The respondents contend that they are entitled to make this deduction under Schedule D, Cases I. and II., rule 1, which allows the deduction of money wholly and exclusively laid out or expended for the purposes of the trade. But this means expenses incurred in the trade, not expenses incurred so as to be able to carry on the trade. The expenditure attributable to lighting the public streets is capital expenditure, it is a sum paid for the privilege of supplying the public with gas; and it ought not to be deducted from the profits of the respondents' trade.

F. C. Gore, for the respondents.—The commissioners were right in allowing this expenditure to be deducted. The respondents' trade with the private consumers of gas ought not to be treated as a separate matter from their business of lighting the public lamps. The gas trade which they carry on is one trade only. The effect of section 56 of their Act is that they cannot make any profit from supplying gas to private customers till they have performed the duty of lighting the public lamps. The thing assessed to income tax is profit. And the profit of a trade is the surplus by which the receipts exceed the expenditure necessary for the purpose of earning those receipts. The expense incurred by the corporation in respect of the public lamps is a sum necessarily laid out and expended by them in earning what they receive from their private customers.

The following cases were cited:—Corporation of Dublin v. McAdam, 20 L. R. Ir. Ex. D. 497, 36 W. R. Dig. 98; Glasgow Corporation Water Commissioners v. Miller, 13 Ct. Sess. Cas. (4th series), 489; Russell v. Town and County Bank, 13 App. Cas. 418, 36 W. R. Dig. 96.

POLLOCK, B.—This corporation, by their private Act of Parliament, acquired the power to supply themselves with gas, they took power to erect gas works and light the streets without contracting for the purchase of gas; they also took additional power to use the same gas works for the purpose of supplying any persons who were willing to buy their gas, and to receive payment for it, always provided that they were not to sell gas to other persons until they had complied with the duty undertaken by them of supplying the public lamps. Now, when the corporation rendered their accounts, on the gas which they manufactured for the public account there would be and could be no profit, but upon the gas which they supplied on the private account to consumers to whom they sold their gas—that account being taken separately—there was a profit; and on that profit they were in the first instance assessed. They appealed, and appealed successfully, to the assessment commissioners, and now again the Crown appeals to this court.

I have come to the conclusion that this appeal must succeed. The respondents are assessed under section 60, Schedule A, No. III., of the Income Tax Act, 1842: "The annual value of all the properties hereinafter described shall be understood to be the full amount for one year, or the average amount for one year, of the profits received therefrom within the respective times herein limited." And by sub-section 3 this rule applies to gas works. It is as owners of gas works that the corporation are assessed. Now with regard to deduction the rules applicable to the present case are those given in Schedule D, Cases I. and II. The first of these rules is: "In estimating the balance of the profits or gains to be charged according to either of the first or second cases, no sum shall be set against or deducted from, or allowed to be set against or deducted from, such profits or gains, for any disbursements or expenses whatever, not being money wholly and exclusively laid out or expended for the purposes of such trade." It is clear to my mind that anything expended upon the public lighting of the town was not expended for the purposes of that trade in respect of which the respondents were assessed. Here is a body which is bound to provide for the lighting of the town. They may buy gas or they may make it. They elect to make it, and of course it must be paid for by a rate. In doing this they are in no sense traders; there are no vendors, and no vendees. To use the expression of Palles, C.B., in Corporation of Dublin v. McAdam, it is a case of principal and agent, that is to say, the corporation are the agents to supply gas to their principals, the people of the place. So far no trade is carried on. But then they have beyond this an option of doing something more; section 56 enacts that it shall be lawful for them, after sufficiently lighting the streets, to supply gas to any persons who shall be willing to pay for it. They choose to act upon this; they make gas and sell it, and immediately, by virtue of the relation of vendor and vendee coming into existence, a trade arises and profits for the first time arise in that trade.

It seems to me that this case is tolerably clear when we see the real meaning of this section, and consider the Glasgow case and the Dublin case. In the latter case Palles, C.B., says, "I think the true ground of decision is that the body to pay is a distinct and separate body from the body to receive, that the relation between the two bodies is that of vendor and purchaser of water, as in the case of municipal inhabitants it is that of principals and agents in respect of that supply." And later on he returns to the same mode of argument, and says that, to his mind, it is clear that no trading arises until a supply is given to those who are beyond the boundary. All that argument applies very strongly to the present case. Upon the other side it has been argued that the whole thing is to be looked at in one light, that we must look on this body as a trading body to which the law has established a sort of clog or drawback, to this effect—you must not supply private inhabitants until you supply the public lamps, and, therefore, when you make up your accounts, if you find you make a profit upon the private supply, you must look back and see whether you have made a loss upon the public supply, and then deduct that loss from it. But I think I have already answered that proposition by showing that no profit arises until the corporation for the first time begin to give a private supply. I am of opinion that this appeal must be allowed, and the assessment must stand as passed.

CHARLES, J.—The trade which the respondents carry on is that of supplying gas to private consumers. Their operations, so far as the public streets are concerned, are not operations carried on by them as a trade at all, but for the purpose of supplying themselves with gas. People cannot trade with themselves, and this corporation cannot be held to carry on a trade so far as the duty of lighting the streets is concerned. They begin to trade as soon as they have customers, and their customers are those who choose to contract with them to take their gas.

But it is said that, nevertheless, this deduction of the expense incurred in lighting the public lamps ought to be allowed. Mr. Gore argued that, though it is an expense incurred in the discharge by the corporation of their public duties, yet it is wholly and exclusively laid out for the purposes of the trade of the corporation, for under section 56 a private customer cannot be supplied unless this expense be incurred, because it is only after they have sufficiently lighted the streets that the corporation may sell gas to private customers. That certainly was a captivating way of putting the case, but upon reflection I am not able to assent to it. I think that this expenditure was not an expenditure for the purposes of the trade, which was a trade of supplying the private customers only, but was for the purpose of enabling the corporation to enter upon that trade, which is a very different matter. The Act does not say that the initial expenditure incurred by a person to enable him to enter a particular trade is to be deducted from the profits which he earns in that trade.

Upon principle, and also on the authorities which have been cited, I am of opinion that our judgment ought to be for the Crown.

Apprentice—Apprenticeship deed—Felony by apprentice—Refusal of master to carry out covenants under the deed.

In an action against a master for a breach of covenant by him, under an apprenticeship deed, in refusing to continue to keep, teach, and maintain an apprentice, the defence went to prove that the apprentice was an habitual thief.

Held, that this was a good defence, on the ground that the master impliedly covenanted to teach the apprentice how to carry on the particular trade honestly, and that the apprentice, by becoming an habitual thief, had rendered the fulfilment of such a covenant impossible by his own default.

Action tried at Leeds Assizes before A. L. Smith, J., without a jury, and judgment delivered in London.

A. L. SMITH, J.—This is an action brought by the guardians of Arthur Pickard, a lad of about sixteen years of age, to recover from the defendant damages, or, in the alternative, the whole or part of the sum of £100, being the premium paid by the plaintiffs upon apprenticing Pickard to the defendant, by reason, as it is alleged, of breach of the articles of apprenticeship by the defendant, he having refused to keep, teach, and maintain Pickard after December 31, 1888. By the deed, bearing date December 23, 1887, and made between the plaintiffs of the one part, and the defendant of the other part, Pickard was bound apprentice to the defendant for a term of five years and three months, during which term Pickard was bound, among other things, to order and behave himself as a true and faithful apprentice, and not to waste his master's goods; and in consideration of Pickard having so put and bound himself, and also in consideration of the sum of £100 then paid to the defendant by the plaintiffs, the defendant covenanted to teach the said Pickard the trade of a pawnbroker, to board and lodge him during the said term, and during the last two years thereof to pay him the weekly wage of 30s. The defendant was a pawnbroker and silversmith in a large way of business in Halifax, in conjunction with which he carried on an extensive trade in jewellery. He had two places of business in the town, having at the Charlotte-road premises, the lesser business of the two and where Pickard was located, as much as from £300 to £400 worth of jewellery pledged with him daily, together with other articles of value. If Pickard had continued apprentice he would have graduated up to the larger business, in which jewellery to the amount of £2,000 to £3,000 was constantly dealt in. By uncontradicted evidence it was established that from the time when Pickard entered upon his duties as apprentice in December, 1887, his conduct was bad. Young as he was he frequented singing-rooms and theatres, smoked cigars, and stayed out till late hours of the night, the defendant having repeatedly threatened to lock him out if he would not mend his ways; he, however, persisted in his conduct, in spite of the efforts of the defendant. For some months prior to December, 1888, the defendants' money had been repeatedly missed from the till at Charlotte-road, and upon the afternoon of the 31st of December, 1888, Pickard was detected to have stolen 6d. out of it. On being found out and challenged as to how much more he had taken, he said that he did not know, but that he had been taking it for months, sometimes as much as 5s. at a time. Sums amounting in all to about £5 had during these months been missed from the till. The defendant thereupon had an interview with the plaintiffs and informed them of what had happened. They asked the defendant to take Pickard back, and he said he would take time to consider. This he did, and on the next day informed the plaintiffs that, as he could have no confidence in Pickard, he could not further keep him, and sent him back to the plaintiffs. This action was then brought. That Pickard was an habitual thief—that is, that he had been in the habit of stealing—in my judgment, has been proved. The question now arises, Is a master, under articles of apprenticeship, bound to keep, teach, and maintain at his own risk an habitual thief for the term stipulated for by the articles? I should certainly answer offhand the question in the negative; but it was said that I was bound by authority to hold otherwise. It was said on behalf of the plaintiffs that, inasmuch as the defendant's covenant in the deed of apprenticeship to keep, teach, and maintain the apprentice was independent of the obligations imposed upon the apprentice, that, therefore, the breach of the obligations by the apprentice afforded no answer to a breach of covenant by the master to keep, teach, and maintain for the stipulated time. It has unquestionably been held that, in an ordinary apprenticeship deed, the covenants by the master are independent covenants, the performance of which does not depend upon the performance by the apprentice on his part of the obligations imposed upon him by the deed. The cases of Winstone v. Linn, 1 B. & C. 460, and Phillips v. Clift, 7 W. R. 295, 4 H. & N. 168, are direct authorities upon this point. It appears, however, to me that this does not decide what I have to determine in the present case. Where an apprentice by his own wilful act prevents a master from teaching him, the master can set this up as a defence when sued upon his covenant to keep, teach, and maintain the apprentice, irrespective of the question whether the apprentice has performed his obligations under the deed or not. This is settled by the case of Raymond v. Minton, 14 W. R. 675, L. R. 1 Ex. 244. The ratio decidendi of that case is not that the master is absolved because the apprentice has not performed the obligations imposed upon him by the articles, but because the apprentice, by his own acts, has put it out of the power of the master to carry out what he had contracted to do. Apply this reasoning to the present case. The master has contracted to teach the apprentice how to carry on a pawnbroker's trade honestly. That must be the contract by the master. The apprentice, by becoming an habitual thief, has rendered that impossible. Then why does not the principle laid down in Raymond v. Minton apply? Moreover, the remedy suggested in some of the cases as being the sole one which the master had upon default of the apprentice and loss consequent thereon—namely, to sue for the loss—can hardly exist in a case where the apprentice becomes an habitual thief; he cannot sue at once for his loss, but must prosecute his apprentice and get him convicted and sentenced if he can, then take him back for the residue of the term, and sue for the loss he has sustained—an inapt procedure beyond all question. A very similar point to that now under discussion was attempted to be raised in the case of Phillips v. Clift. The plea in that case alleged "that the apprentice conducted himself in so dishonest a manner in the defendant's business, and defrauded and robbed the defendant so that it became unsafe for the defendant to continue him in his service, wherefore the defendant dismissed him." The case was argued upon demurrer, and the court held the plea to be bad. The Lord Chief Baron held that the plea did not allege a felonious taking, and he went on to say: "I do not think it necessary to express an opinion as to what would be the effect of an allegation in the plea that the apprentice had been guilty of a felonious stealing, or had been actually convicted and suffered punishment, for the plea alleged neither the one nor the other." Baron Watson said: "I do not know what the plea means. The apprentice may have taken sweetmeats from a jar, or a shilling from the till, for which offences he might be corrected by personal chastisement or kept in confinement; but the master has no right to dissolve the contract." I will add, a very different taking from what has been proved in this case. Baron Channell rested his judgment upon the ground that the covenants were independent. This certainly is not an authority showing that a master cannot justify upon the ground of his appentice having become an habitual thief. Two years later—viz., in 1861—Byles, J., at Nisi Prius in the case of Cox v. Mathews, 2 F. & F. 397, expressly held, in an action by an apprentice against his master for not teaching him, that "if the plaintiff was in the habit of stealing, the defendant would not be bound to have him in his shop to instruct him, as there was gold lying about, and constant opportunities of stealing." This ruling is in point. No authority has been cited, and I am not aware of one either overruling or even doubting this ruling of Byles, J. It is a ruling which commends itself to me, I follow it, and for the reason above I hold that the defendant in this case has successfully justified the breach of covenant alleged against him. This being so the claim for damages fails. But it was further argued that, even if the defendant was justified in acting as he did, yet he must return so much of the premium as was not exhausted for keeping, teaching, and maintaining the apprentice. There has been no total failure of consideration, and there is no action for damages maintainable. Then how can the proportionate part of the premium be recovered? It cannot. Moreover, the case of Whincup v. Hughes, 19 W. R. 439, L. R. 6 C. P. 78, shows that this is so. I will point out that in this deed the covenants by the master are made, not only in consideration of the payment of the premium, but also in consideration of the apprentice having bound himself to the defendant. This is different from the deeds which I find set out in the cases; for in them the covenants by the master are in consideration only of the payment of the premium. I only allude to the fact to point it out. I do not found my judgment in any way upon it, but I take it for the purposes of this case that the deed is an ordinary apprenticeship deed, with independent covenants, and I give judgment for the defendant, with costs.

Appeal from a divisional court of the Queen's Bench Division.

The plaintiffs were machine manufacturers residing in Lancashire, and the defendants were an Italian firm consisting of ten partners, all of whom were foreigners residing and domiciled abroad, and the defendant firm had no place of business and no manager in England, and no property there. Two of the partners—namely, Giovanni Festi and Cesare Rasini were, by the deed creating the defendant partnership, appointed managing partners, with unlimited liability, and each of them was authorized separately to represent and bind the firm. The other eight partners, one of whom was itself the firm of Francesco Turati, and another the Banca Generale of Rome, were in the position of sleeping partners with limited liability, and could in no way represent or bind the defendant firm.

The plaintiffs had supplied the defendant firm with machinery, and the defendant firm had failed to pay an instalment amounting to £3,151, being part of the price payable for the machinery delivered to them.

The plaintiffs in consequence brought this action against the defendants, who were sued in their firm name, to recover the £3,151 for goods sold and delivered, and the plaintiffs obtained leave from A. L. Smith, J., under ord. 2, r. 4, to issue notice of the writ of summons out of the jurisdiction, and to serve such notice on the defendant firm in Italy, the defendant firm being required to enter an appearance within sixteen days after service thereof. Nothing was said in this order as to how the service was to be effected. The plaintiffs served the notice of the writ in Italy on Cesari Rasini, one of the managing partners in the defendant firm. No appearance of any kind having been entered, the plaintiffs, on the expiration of the sixteen days after service, applied ex parte to the master at the Central Office to enter judgment in default of appearance. The master refused to do so, and an application by the plaintiffs that the master might be directed to enter judgment was refused by Denman, J., and subsequently by a divisional court (Cave and Grantham, JJ.).

The plaintiffs appealed.

Loehnis, for the appellants.—The plaintiffs contracted to deliver machinery in Italy to the defendant firm, who contracted to pay £3,151 on delivery. The defendants' contract to pay ought to have been executed in England, and accordingly the plaintiffs' action is founded on breach of a contract which ought to be performed within the jurisdiction. The case therefore comes within ord. 11, r. 1 (e): Robey v. Snaefell, 36 W. R. 224, 20 Q. B. D. 152; and the plaintiffs have obtained leave to issue notice of the writ of summons out of the jurisdiction. Then ord. 16, r. 14, provides that any two or more persons, being liable as co-partners, may be sued in the name of the firm of which they are co-partners. The words of that rule are perfectly general, and therefore it applies to a partnership firm the members of which are foreigners; and in Dubout v. Macpherson, 38 W. R. 62, 23 Q. B. D. 340, it was held that a third-party notice under ord. 16, r. 48, might be served on a foreigner out of the jurisdiction, and the same had been previously held in Swansea Shipping Co. v. Duncan, 1 Q. B. D. 644, 24 W. R. Dig. 205. These cases show that the whole of order 16 is applicable to foreigners, whether they are plaintiffs or defendants. The cases of Russell v. Cambefort, 37 W. R. 701, 23 Q. B. D. 526, and Western National Bank of New York v. Perez Triana & Co., ante, p. 245, [1891] 1 Q. B. 304, are distinguishable from the present case, because in each of those cases the cause of action was not one to which order 11 was applicable, and leave to serve notice of the writ out of the jurisdiction was not, and could not have been, obtained; but it was attempted in those cases to use ord. 9, r. 6, for the purpose of creating jurisdiction, so as to circumvent order 11. The cause of action in the present case is within order 11, and leave has been obtained to serve notice of the writ out of the jurisdiction. Then ord. 11, r. 7, provides that notice of the writ shall be given in the manner in which writs of summons are served: and that, therefore, makes ord. 9, r. 6, applicable, which provides that, "where persons are sued as partners in the name of their firm the writ shall be served upon any one or more of the partners . . . and . . . such service shall be deemed good service upon the firm." Ord. 9, r. 6, is simply procedure. As was pointed out by Fry, L.J., in Russell v. Cambefort, it provides that service on one partner is service on them all, in those cases in which they could all have been personally served. That could have been done here. This view is supported by the judgment of Lindley, L.J., in Western National Bank of New York v. Perez Triana & Co. Ord. 9, r. 8, deals with service of a writ of summons on a corporation, and in Scott v. Royal Wax Candle Co., 24 W. R. 668, 1 Q. B. D. 404, it was held that where the cause of action came within order 11 the court had jurisdiction to allow service out of the jurisdiction upon a foreign corporation as defendants; and the plaintiff in that case having issued the writ and served notice thereof by leave of the court out of the jurisdiction upon the foreign corporation, was held to be entitled to sign judgment in default of appearance. I submit that the same procedure is applicable in the case of a foreign firm. [KAY, L.J.—But according to the judgment of the majority of the Court of Appeal in Western National Bank of New York v. Perez Triana & Co. your writ, being against the defendants in their firm name, is wrong, and although you have obtained leave to issue and serve a wrong writ, how does that help you?] The fact that in the present case the cause of action comes within order 11 gives the court jurisdiction, and ord. 9, r. 6, is therefore applicable. The plaintiffs have obtained the evidence of an Italian advocate which shows that, under the Italian law, service on one partner, if a managing partner, is good service on the firm. It would be practically impossible to serve each of the partners in the defendant firm here personally; one of the partners, Francesco Turati, is itself a partnership firm: to serve that partner, if each partner must be served, the plaintiffs will have to ascertain who are the partners in that firm, and serve each one of them.

Cur. adv. vult.

May 14.—LINDLEY, L.J.—This is an appeal from the refusal of a divisional court to give directions to the proper officer to allow the plaintiffs to sign judgment against the defendants upon default of appearance. The action, which was brought against the defendants in the name of the defendant firm, was for breach of a personal contract for goods sold and delivered. The members of the defendant firm are all Italian subjects resident abroad, and the defendant firm has no property, no place of business, and no manager in England. Nevertheless, leave was given to serve notice of the writ upon the defendant firm abroad. I do not say that that was irregular, as the defendants might have appeared, and I do not say if they had appeared that judgment might not have been signed against them. I think, however, that ord. 9, r. 6, has no application unless the foreign firm choose to appear. That was the interpretation put on that rule by this court in Russell v. Cambefort and by the majority of the Court of Appeal in Western National Bank of New York v. Perez. It has been ably and skilfully contended by Mr. Loehnis that the present case is different from those cases, because, in the present case, leave has been obtained under order 11 to serve notice of the writ abroad. That is very true, but it does not assist the plaintiffs unless the defendant firm chose to appear.

Before the Judicature Acts there was no jurisdiction to allow a foreign firm to be sued in the firm name. Have the Rules of the Supreme Court enlarged or extended the jurisdiction in that respect? In my opinion they have done nothing of the kind. What the jurisdiction of the English court was with respect to the service of its process abroad, and the very circumscribed limit of that jurisdiction when permitted, is shown by the cases of Cookney v. Anderson, 11 W. R. 628, 1 De G. J. & S. 395, and Foley v. Maillardet, 12 W. R. 355, 1 De G. J. & S. 389, before Lord Westbury, and the case of Drummond v. Drummond, 15 W. R. 267, L. R. 2 Ch. App. 32.

Bearing in mind that the jurisdiction now contended for did not exist before the Judicature Acts, if we were to allow this appeal we should be putting a construction on the rules which, though verbally admissible, would be contrary to the general principles of international law. I think that was the ratio decidendi in Russell v. Cambefort, and in my opinion the reasoning there was correct, and was based on general principles of law. I think it would be a monstrous thing to allow a plaintiff in this country to obtain judgment in default of appearance against a foreign firm having no manager, no place of business, and no property in this country, by serving one of the partners of the foreign firm the other members of which might perhaps be in another part of the world altogether. It is nothing to the purpose to say that, according to Italian law, the process of the Italian courts could be so served.

Mr. Loehnis has, no doubt, the advantage of the wording of the rules in his favour, but one cannot on that account disregard the general principles of international law.

In my opinion there is no jurisdiction to allow judgment to be signed in this case, and the appeal must be dismissed.

LOPES, L.J.—In my opinion ord. 9, r. 6, does not apply to a foreign firm none of the members of which are domiciled or resident here, unless the firm chooses to appear.

In the present case the defendant firm is not domiciled or resident here, has no property here, and has not appeared. I am clearly of opinion that ord. 9, r. 6, does not apply to this case, and that view is in accordance with the cases of Russell v. Cambefort and Western National Bank of New York v. Perez.

Mr. Loehnis argued that the present case was distinguishable from those cases, because in the present case leave had been obtained to issue and serve notice of the writ abroad. But that does not assist the plaintiffs unless the defendant firm has appeared.

I have only one further observation to make. Before the Judicature Acts it is clear there was no jurisdiction in a case like this, and jurisdiction cannot be said to be increased by the rules made under the Judicature Acts. These rules do not, and cannot, give the jurisdiction contended for.

KAY, L.J.—I agree. How far the lex fori applies to foreigners is an important question. No doubt if a foreigner sues in this country he must conform, and be taken to submit, to the lex fori. But the matter is altogether different when he is sued. Before the Judicature Acts, if a foreigner was sued as to certain kinds of property here, or land here, no doubt then, if he appeared, no difficulty would arise in proceeding against him. But there should have been personal service upon him, and he should have appeared.

Here what has been attempted is this. A firm consisting entirely of foreign subjects, having no place of business, no manager, and no property here, have committed a breach of contract here, on account of which it is said they are brought within ord. 11, r. 1 (e). Then it is said, there being jurisdiction (which is assumed), ord. 11, r. 7, provides that notice in lieu of service shall be given in the manner in which writs of summons are served, and that you must, therefore, look back to the earlier rules and orders as to that. So far, on the face of the rules, there is a great deal apparently in favour of the plaintiffs' contention. The foreign firm, however, is sued in their firm name—not as individuals—and leave has been obtained to issue and serve notice of the writ abroad on the foreign firm. One of the partners of the foreign firm has been found abroad, and notice of the writ has been served on him there. Ord. 9, r. 6, has been relied upon as authorizing this. The whole question is whether that rule applies to the case of an altogether foreign firm. In Russell v. Cambefort the defendants were a foreign firm which had a place of business here and a manager here. There had, however, been no breach of a contract to be performed within the jurisdiction, and, therefore, there was no jurisdiction under order 11 by reason of the actual cause of action. But an action was nevertheless brought, and the writ was served on the manager of the defendants' place of business here. The Court of Appeal had, therefore, to consider ord. 9, r. 6, and Cotton, L.J., held that it did not apply to a foreign firm at all. The Lord Justice said (37 W. R., at p. 701, 23 Q. B. D., at p. 528): "No doubt the rule in question is made under the authority of an Act of Parliament, and that has been relied on as giving it as great an effect as an Act of Parliament; but although an Act of Parliament can give jurisdiction to the court against British subjects, as to foreigners Parliament has not, and does not assume to have, jurisdiction against those who are residing abroad and have not submitted to the jurisdiction of the English courts. Therefore, in construing the rule we must have regard to what Parliament has the power to do, and in my opinion we should be wrong in construing it as giving jurisdiction against those who are in no way subject to the English Parliament; and although the rule does authorize service on one member of a partnership in general terms, yet it ought to be construed only as applying to partnerships the members of which, either by their nationality or residence, have become subject to English law and to the power of Parliament. Looking at it in that view I do not think the rule applies to firms consisting of foreigners who have in no way become subject to the English Parliament." If those words have any meaning at all they must mean that the thing there was wrongly done, not because the actual cause of action did not give jurisdiction, but because ord. 9, r. 6, does not apply at all to a firm consisting of foreigners, even although having a place of business and a manager here. In Western National Bank of New York v. Perez Triana & Co. Bowen, L.J., referring to Russell v. Cambefort, said: "The judgment of the Court of Appeal was, however, based expressly on the view that ord. 9, r. 6, was not intended to govern writs directed against foreign firms none of whose partners were resident or domiciled in England"; in other words, he adopts what I think is the exact meaning of what was said by Cotton, L.J., in Russell v. Cambefort. Unless, therefore, we are to overrule both those cases we must hold that ord. 9, r. 6, does not apply at all to the present case, and if that be so, then order 11 cannot give ord. 9, r. 6, a different effect. I agree with Lindley, L.J., that it would be a strong thing that this rule as to service on partnership firms should apply to a foreign firm all of whose members are domiciled and resident abroad, and enable a plaintiff to sign judgment in default, after serving one of the partners of the foreign firm. I should be most reluctant to give such a meaning to that rule, and in my opinion the matter is really decided by Russell v. Cambefort and Western National Bank of New York v. Perez Triana & Co.

CRAWFORD v. FORSHAW. (a.)

Executor — Renunciation of probate by one executor — Power of selection of beneficiaries.

A testator by his will appointed three executors, and gave the residue of his estate to certain named charitable institutions, "or such others or additional as my executors herein named may select to be divided in such proportions as they may approve of." One of the executors renounced probate.

Held (reversing the decision of Kekewich, J., 38 W. R. 412, 43 Ch. D. 643), that the executor who had renounced probate was not entitled to exercise the power, but that the power belonged to the two executors who had proved the will, in their official capacity, and was exercisable by them.

Keates v. Burton, 14 Ves. 434, approved.

Appeal from Kekewich, J.

This was an appeal by Messrs. J. D. Crawford and William Jones, the proving executors of the will of J. K. Mainwaring, deceased, from a decision of Kekewich, J. (reported 38 W. R. 412, 43 Ch. D. 643).

The will contained the following bequests, amongst others:—"To Annie Kyffin Hughes . . . the sum of one hundred pounds, to be paid to her on attaining the age of sixteen years, in the event of her decease prior to which time, the amount to remain at the disposal of my executors, for distribution to such charities or charitable institutions as they approve of." "To my executors herein named the sum of fifty pounds each for the trouble they may have in the execution of this my will, and also to mark my friendship and regard for them." The will then proceeded:—"I hereby appoint J. D. Drawford, J. Forshaw, and William Jones executors of this my will"; and later on, after giving various charitable legacies, contained the following gift:—"The residue of my estate I bequeath to the above-named charitable institutions, or such others or additional as my executors herein named may select, to be divided in such proportions as they may approve of."

J. Forshaw renounced probate but claimed, nevertheless, to take part in the selection of the charitable institutions to share in the gift of residue; and Kekewich, J., held that he was entitled to do so.

The two proving executors appealed.

The case was argued before the Court of Appeal in November last, when the court was of opinion that the Attorney-General should be served with notice to argue on behalf of the Crown.

Crawford (Neville, Q.C., with him), for the appellants.—The simple question is, does the trust fail if the renouncing executor cannot take part in the distribution? The words "executors herein named" mean executors simply, and those who have proved can exercise the power. This is not merely a bare authority, but an authority coupled with an interest and survives to the other two executors: Attorney-General v. Gleg, 1 Atk. 356. Kekewich, J., thought the point was not decided in Keates v. Burton, 14 Ves. 436, but it really was so; there the power was given to the executors, but they had not exercised it, and could not exercise it because they had renounced the only capacity in which they could exercise it. [LINDLEY, L.J.—Was not Kekewich, J.'s difficulty the words "the executors herein named"? If he excluded them, how could Forshaw join?] It simply means executors, and this is not a naked power, but a power coupled with an interest.

He also cited Attorney-General v. Fletcher, 5 L. J. N. S. Ch. 75, and Hibbard v. Lambe, Ambl. 309; and relied on 20 & 21 Vict. c. 77, s. 79.

Ingle Joyce, for the Attorney-General.—I agree that the executor having renounced cannot take part in the distribution. This is a power coupled with an office, and in order to exercise the power it must be exercised by the three persons named, and they must also accept the executorship. "Executors herein named" means the three executors named; if it were not so the testator would not speak of them elsewhere in his will simply as "my executors." The testator wished all these three gentlemen to exercise this wide power of selection. This is an arbitrary power quite distinct from the trust, and not an integral part of it, and being a bare authority and so different from that which is coupled with an interest, cannot survive: Peyton v. Bury, 2 P. Wms. 626. It is not every power given to an executor which must necessarily survive. This power must be exercised by all three executors, and cannot now be exercised by the one who has renounced probate jointly with the others: Cole v. Wade, 16 Ves. 42.

The respondent did not appear on the appeal.

Crawford replied.

LINDLEY, L.J.—This appeal from the decision of Kekewich, J., raises the question whether two out of three executors appointed by the will of J. K. Mainwaring have or have not the power of saying amongst what charities the residue of his estate shall be distributed. One executor renounced probate, hence arises the difficulty. When the case first came before the court we thought it right not to decide it in the absence of the Attorney-General, and it therefore stood over in order that he might be served. The will, which is a short one, contained the following clause, which is material: "To Annie Kyffin Hughes . . . my god-daughter, the sum of one hundred pounds, to be paid to her on attaining the age of sixteen years, in the event of her decease prior to which time, the amount to remain at the disposal of my executors, for distribution to such charities or charitable institutions as they approve of." The executors are not named before that clause, but they are afterwards; and the persons to exercise that power are those who proved the will and not otherwise. [His lordship then read the clause in the will on which the main question arises, and continued:—] Kekewich, J., construed the power as a naked power not coupled with an interest, and when we read his judgment we find his attention was not called to the clause dealing with Annie Hughes' bequest. The case seems to be exactly the same as Keates v. Burton, and Attorney-General v. Fletcher, which was not referred to in the court below. The distinction between the latter case and this I cannot see. The proper construction is to give the power to these gentlemen in their official capacity; and Mr. Forshaw is not now at liberty to exercise the power, but the others can. Mr. Joyce argued that the power is not now exercisable by any: the answer is that they do it in their official capacity. The result is that the appeal must be allowed, and we propose to vary the order by declaring that Mr. Forshaw, having renounced, is not entitled to exercise this power, but it can be exercised by the other executors.

BOWEN, L.J.—This case is one of construction, where one may be guided by the reasoning in similar cases, and is not concluded by authority. It was argued on behalf of the Crown that the power was given to the three persons, and the other side contend that the power was given in an official capacity, so that the power survives to the survivors. The only ground for Mr. Joyce's ingenious argument was the occurrence of the words "herein named," and it would be giving too much force to those words to imply that by virtue of them all the executors must act or none: that is not a reasonable view. It is more reasonable to suppose that the testator would have used language much more clear and precise if he had that in view.

KAY, L.J.—The point here is one of construction. [His lordship then read the will, and continued:—] The question is whether the words "herein named" do limit and control that power given to the executors. The addition of those words seems to me to add not really any serious difficulty. The power is one attached to the office of executors.

Practice—Writ—Service of writ—Action against foreign firm in firm name—R. S. C., 1883, ord. 9, r. 6.

A writ was issued against the defendants in the name of their firm. The firm was a foreign firm, carrying on business at Buenos Ayres, and consisted of three partners, all of them foreign subjects. Two of the partners were resident and domiciled abroad, and one was residing in England at the date of the issue of the writ. The partner in England used a room in London for the purposes of the business of the firm. The writ having been served on the partner in England, he moved to set aside the writ and the service.

Held, following the decision in Western National Bank of New York v. Perez Triana & Co., ante, p. 245, [1891] 1 Q. B. 304, that ord. 9, r. 6, did not apply to the case of a foreign firm, the only mode of suing a foreign firm being to issue the writ against the partners individually, and obtain leave to serve them under order 11; and that the writ and the service must be set aside.

Appeal from the Queen's Bench Division (Cave and Charles, JJ.) refusing to set aside the writ and service of the writ.

The writ was issued by a firm in London against the defendants, a foreign firm carrying on business in Buenos Ayres. The defendants were sued in the firm name, the firm consisting of three partners, who were all foreigners. Two of them were domiciled and resident at Buenos Ayres, and the third, Sanford, who formerly resided at Buenos Ayres, about eighteen months before the service of the writ came to reside in London. The writ was served upon Sanford in London. The claim indorsed upon the writ was for moneys paid by the plaintiffs for the defendants at their request, the money being paid in London upon bills of exchange drawn by the defendants in Buenos Ayres upon the plaintiffs, accepted payable in London for the accommodation of the defendants.

It appeared that Sanford used two rooms in the City of London for the purposes of the firm's business, but neither his name nor that of the firm was written up there. Sanford having moved under ord. 12, r. 30, to set aside the writ and the service, the Divisional Court dismissed the motion. Sanford appealed.

Finlay, Q.C., and Danckwerts, for Sanford.—This is the case of a foreign firm consisting of foreign subjects, two of whom are residing out of the jurisdiction; and ord. 9, r. 6, which allows service of a writ, issued against a firm, upon a partner, does not apply to such a case. The plaintiffs ought to have issued the writ against the individual partners, and to have obtained leave under order 11 to serve notice of the writ on the two partners in Buenos Ayres, and served the writ itself upon Sanford in this country. The plaintiffs seek to avoid the necessity of obtaining the leave of the court to serve the foreign partners. The plaintiffs cannot, by proceeding under ord. 9, r. 6., get rid of the necessity of obtaining the leave of the court. Ord. 2, r. 4, and order 11 form a complete code as to service on foreigners out of the jurisdiction, and ord. 9, r. 6, must be read subject to those orders.

They referred to Russell v. Cambefort, 37 W. R. 701, 23 Q. B. D. 526; Western National Bank of New York v. Perez Triana & Co., ante, p. 245, [1891] 1 Q. B. 304; In re Busfield, 34 W. R. 372, 32 Ch. D. 123; In re Maugham, 22 W. R. 748; ord 16, r. 14; ord. 42, r. 10.

Tindal Atkinson, for the plaintiffs.—The defendants' firm are carrying on business in England as well as in Buenos Ayres, having an office here. The contracts sued upon were made here, and were to be performed here. In Western National Bank of New York v. Perez Triana & Co. the contracts were foreign contracts, to be performed abroad, and the firm was a foreign firm with no one residing in this country capable of being served. That case is therefore distinguishable.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—This case seems to me to be settled by authority. The judgment of the majority of this court in Western National Bank of New York v. Perez Triana & Co. decides that in the case of an action against a foreign firm, ord. 9, r. 6, cannot be made use of; in other words, that the plaintiff cannot issue the writ against the foreign firm in the firm's name. That proposition seems to me to be as plainly stated as possible. Bowen, L.J., said:—"The judgment of the Court of Appeal (in Russell v. Cambefort) was, however, based expressly on the view that ord. 9, r. 6, was not intended to govern writs directed against foreign firms, none of whose partners were resident or domiciled in England, and I do not think we should be carrying out the real view of the law so laid down if we were to seek to distinguish the case of service effected on a partner under one portion of the rule from that of service effected on a manager under the other portion of it. . . . It must not be supposed that our decision implies that no remedy can be had against foreign firms, or such of their members as happen to come within the jurisdiction. The law as to suing and serving them will remain what it always has hitherto been, though the writ cannot under ord. 9, r. 6, be addressed against them in the foreign firm's name. The old course will still be pursued—viz., to insert in the writ the names of the partners whom it is desired to sue, and such writ so framed may be served on any of the partners who are found within the jurisdiction. For service out of the jurisdiction recourse must be had to order 11 if the case is one which can be brought within the rules of that order." The meaning of that seems to me to be that the plaintiff cannot issue a writ against a foreign firm in the firm's name. It decides that the foreign partners cannot be served by service on one of the foreign partners in England. The foreign partners can only be served by obtaining leave under order 11 to serve notice of the writ upon them abroad. The court in that case ordered the writ to be amended, as the partner who was served had appeared, and had thus waived the irregularity. In the present case the defendant Sanford has not appeared. The writ, therefore, was wrongly issued and wrongly served, and the writ and service must both be set aside. I cannot see how we can decide this case in the plaintiffs' favour without going contrary to the decision in Western National Bank of New York v. Perez Triana & Co.

FRY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. In my view order 11 forms a code which determines the mode of service of writs and notices of writs out of the jurisdiction. Ord. 9, r. 6, was never intended to be applied so as to remove the necessity of obtaining the leave of the court to serve the writ or notice of the writ out of the jurisdiction. In no way could a plaintiff avail himself of ord. 9, r. 6, to escape from the exercise of the judicial discretion of the court under ord. 2, r. 4, and ord. 11, before he can issue a writ and serve the writ or notice of the writ out of the jurisdiction. The effect of suing a firm in the firm's name is, as pointed out by Lindley, L.J., in Western National Bank of New York v. Perez Triana & Co., that "it is only a convenient method for denoting those persons who compose the firm at the time when that name is used, and a plaintiff who sues partners in the name of their firm in truth sues them individually, just as much as if he had set out all their names." Supposing that the plaintiffs in the present case had sued the three partners individually, it is obvious that before they could take any step which would give them a right to judgment and execution against the partners in Buenos Ayres, they must have applied for leave to issue and serve notice of the writ, and the judicial discretion of the judge must have been exercised before leave could be given. It was said that by writing the names short as the name of the firm, the plaintiffs could proceed under ord. 9, r. 6, and obtain judgment and execution against the partners in Buenos Ayres. The result would be to allow the form in which the action was brought to determine the matter, for if the defendants were sued in the firm's name ord. 9, r. 6, would be applicable, whereas if the defendants were sued in their individual names order 11 would be applicable. The whole scheme of the rules shows that it was not intended to allow the mere form in which the writ was issued to alter the rights of the parties. The truth is, as pointed out by the majority of the court in the case cited, that the name of the firm is only the names of the partners writ short. The writ and service, therefore, in the present case are of no avail against the two partners in Buenos Ayres, because the leave of the court to issue and serve the writ has not been obtained, and they are of no avail against the defendant Sanford, because the writ has been issued in such a form that judgment could only be obtained upon it against the firm. The writ and service must, therefore, be set aside. In arriving at this conclusion I am fortified by the decisions in Russell v. Cambefort and Western National Bank of New York v. Perez Triana & Co.

Company—Reduction of capital—Sinking fund—Contract in memorandum—Payment off of preference shares—Companies Act, 1877 (40 & 41 Vict. c. 26), s. 4—General Orders, March, 1868, rr. 2—20.

The memorandum and articles of a company contained a contract binding the ordinary shareholders to set apart, and the preference shareholders to accept, a sinking fund for the payment off of their preference shares. The fund having been set apart, and a petition presented for reduction of capital, according to the contract,

Held, that the reduction of capital so to be effected did not involve "the payment to any shareholder of any paid-up capital" within section 4 of the Companies Act, 1877, and, consequently, that creditors (if any) were not entitled to object; and Order made without the usual inquiries as to creditors.

Petition.

This was a petition for reduction of capital.

The company was registered under the Companies Acts in 1884 with a nominal capital of £30,000, divided into 460 ordinary and 140 preference shares, all of £50 each, which, according to the memorandum of association, were to "have the rights specified in the articles of association." The material articles were, in effect, as follows:—

Art. 15 provided for reduction of capital by special resolution.

Art. 142 provided that the board might from time to time set apart out of the moneys of the company such sums as in their judgment were necessary or expedient to be, at the discretion of the board, applied or used, among other purposes, "as a sinking fund to pay off the preference shares."

(a.) Reported by G. ROWLAND ALSTON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Art. 146 provided that the net profits of the company should be applied as follows:—

1. In providing a cumulative preferential dividend of 8 per cent. on the preference shares.

2. In setting apart during five years after commencement of business a sum equal to 20 per cent. of the amount of the preference shares issued by the company for the formation of a fund for paying off such shares at the expiration of five years.

3. Subject to such 8 per cent. and 20 per cent. payments, the profits to belong to the ordinary shareholders.

All the preference shares and 160 of the ordinary shares had been issued and fully paid up.

The company commenced business in April, 1886, and since then had regularly paid the 8 per cent. on the preference shares and set aside the 20 per cent. as a sinking fund, besides paying a large dividend on the ordinary shares.

It was now proposed to pay off and cancel all the preference shares, but as this involved a reduction of capital this petition was presented.

The chief clerk had directed that advertisements should be issued as In re Tambracherry Estates Co., 29 Ch. D. 683, 33 W. R. Dig. 39.

It appeared that there were creditors, though not to any large amount.

The petition was unopposed.

Ingpen, for the company.

CHITTY, J.—Whatever difficulty there is in this case arises from the extraordinary prosperity of the company. The memorandum expressly refers to the articles and incorporates into its own provisions the provisions as to the rights of both classes of shareholders contained in the articles. The material articles defining the rights of shareholders are articles 142 and 146, and they contain the contract which is embodied in the memorandum, and, in my opinion, both sets of shareholders have rights with respect to the enforcement of this contract. In other words, the preference shareholders could claim the fund if they desired to insist on their rights, and, conversely, the ordinary shareholders could insist on the fund set apart being applied in payment off of the preference shares. Hence there is a contract, referred to in the memorandum, under which the preference shares are to be extinguished, not out of capital, but out of a fund arising from accumulated surplus profits. This is a contract which it is competent for the company to enter into.

The company has passed a formal resolution to apply the fund in hand to the purpose for which it was established. It follows that the resolution involves a cancellation of capital, but a cancellation according to a contract, and by means of moneys which are not capital moneys of the company, though they are moneys which any creditor of the company could have reached in an action at law or other proceedings. I think, therefore, that it is competent to the court to sanction this reduction of capital by cancellation according to the contract.

But there is still a question remaining to be decided —viz., whether the case falls within section 4 of the Companies Act, 1877. Before making the order I must see that the case does fall within the section, or I shall have to send the case to chambers for the usual inquiry as to creditors. I may mention that there appear to be some creditors, though not to any great amount. I cannot, however, act on the suggestion made at the bar with reference to the probability of all the creditors assenting, or as to the smallness of the amount due to them, but I must determine judicially whether this case falls within section 4.

The proviso of the section directs, in effect, that creditors may not object where the reduction of the capital does not involve either, 1, the diminution of any liability in respect of unpaid capital; or, 2, the payment to any shareholder of any paid-up capital. It is clear that the payment in this case does not involve the former alternative. Does it involve the latter? Both classes of shareholders are entitled to enforce a contract that is valid in law, and this fund might have been paid direct to the preference shareholders. The reduction of capital is in pursuance of a contract that the profits were to be applied in the redemption or extinction of shares, and the contract involves such redemption or extinction on payment off. Hence the contract does not involve "the payment to any shareholder of any paid-up capital," because it is the right of both classes of shareholders that on this payment the rights of the preference shareholders, as shareholders, shall cease. The case is a very peculiar one, and not likely to occur again. I therefore make the order.

Order made.

ALLIANCE PURE WHITE LEAD SYNDICATE v. MACIVOR'S PATENTS AND OTHERS. (a.)

Practice—Patent action—Interrogatories—Further particulars—Patent Law Amendment Act, 1852 (15 & 16 Vict. c. 83), s. 41—Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 57), s. 29.

Where a defendant in a patent action alleges, in his particulars of objections, general user of the plaintiff's alleged invention previous to the date of the letters patent, he may be compelled to answer interrogatories asking for the names and addresses of persons so using it as alleged.

Motion.

In July, 1890, the plaintiffs commenced an action against the defendants for an injunction to restrain them from infringing a patent dated the 11th of November, 1887, taken out by the plaintiffs for improvements in making white lead. The statement of claim asked also for an account of the gain and profits made by the defendants by the user of the plaintiffs' process, or by the manufacture of white lead in accordance therewith, or in accordance with any process only colourably differing therefrom, and that the defendants might be ordered to pay the amount of such gains and profits to the plaintiffs, and for damages.

The defendants set up the defence of want of novelty in the plaintiffs' patent, and in their particulars of objections delivered with their statement of defence relied upon the following objection (among others) to the validity of the letters patent:—(paragraph 7) "that the said alleged invention was previous to the date of the said letters patent published within this realm by the manufacture and sale by white lead manufacturers generally in London and the vicinity thereof continously from the year 1836 up to the date of the said letters patent of white lead made according to the said alleged invention, or substantially in accordance with the same."

The plaintiffs on the 15th of January, 1891, delivered interrogatories to the defendants in which they asked for the names and addresses of the white lead manufacturers in London and the vicinity thereof by whom, as alleged in the 7th paragraph of the defendants' particulars of objections, white lead had been manufactured according to the plaintiffs' invention or substantially in accordance therewith, and sold between the year 1836 and the date of the plaintiffs' letters patent.

The defendants having in their answers, filed the 10th of March, submitted that they could not be required to set forth the names and addresses as asked for by the plaintiffs, the plaintiffs applied for an order for further and better answers to be given by the defendants, and, the order having been made accordingly, the defendants now moved to have it discharged.

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., and G. Henderson, for the defendants.—The matter is concluded by Palmer v. Wagstaffe, 1 W. R. 438, 8 Ex. 840. Where a defendant relies on a general user he cannot be required to give names.

Moulton, Q.C., and A. à B. Terrell, for the plaintiffs.—The old Exchequer reports are useless to guide the court on a question of interrogatories of the present day. The case is concluded by Birch v. Mather, 31 W. R. 362, 22 Ch. D. 629. The Patent Law Amendment Act, 1852, did not exclude the right to administer interrogatories: Flower v. Lloyd, 20 SOLICITORS' JOURNAL, 860, is also an authority in favour of the plaintiffs.

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., in reply.—[NORTH, J.—Mr. Moulton does not object to your giving a good reason for not answering; he only says you have given no good reason. What is the materiality of your objection? If a defendant alleges user by A. and B. and C. and several others, and proves user by one only, he succeeds; why not, if he alleges a general user and proves user by one?] The contrary seems to be the effect of Palmer v. Wagstaffe.

NORTH, J.—It is quite clear the interrogatories must be answered. It is true the case cited from the Exchequer reports of 1853 says that the present answer of the defendants is sufficient. But what could be more vague than that answer? And there are other decisions of more modern date which go to show that the answers asked for must be given, and I am of opinion that they must.

The plaintiffs to have their costs in any event.

Trade-mark — Alteration of registered trade-mark — Essential particulars—Terms—Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 57), s. 64, sub-section (c); s. 74, sub-section 2; s. 92—Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 50), ss. 10, 16.

On motion for leave to alter the registration of certain trade-marks registered under the Act of 1883, by striking out of each of them as registered the words "trade-mark,"

Held, that this ought only to be allowed on the terms that the applicants should undertake to indorse on their application and enter on the register a statement of the essential particulars of their marks, and a disclaimer of the exclusive right to the added matter (if any) to the satisfaction of the comptroller.

Motion.

The question was on what terms permission should be granted to alter Messrs. Colman's trade-marks by striking out the words "trade-mark."

There were several trade-marks of various dates. Those in dispute were all registered under the Act of 1883 before the Act of 1888 came into force. They consisted of labels of various colours, with different devices on them. One label which was taken as an illustration bore on it a bull's head, with the word "trade" printed in close proximity to it on one side, and the word "mark" on the other.

Messrs. Colman were afraid that the validity of their trade-marks might be effected by the remarks of Fry, L.J., in delivering the judgment of the Court of Appeal (Lindley, Bowen, and Fry, L.JJ.) in In re The Apollinaris Co.'s Trade-Mark, 35 Sol. J. 153, 8 Rep. Pat. Cas., at p. 164, to the effect that where a whole label was registered as a trade-mark, and yet contained an assertion that the most conspicuous part of the label was "trade-mark," that was an assertion that it, and it alone, was the trade-mark, and, therefore, that the label as a whole was not; and so the registered owner might lose protection for the mark as a whole. They therefore moved for leave to alter their trade-marks by striking out of each of them as registered the words "trade-mark" wherever the same appeared therein (except where the said words appeared in the "cautions" in some of the trade-marks), and by striking out of one trade-mark the words "Marque de Fabrique," or that the register might be otherwise altered as to the court should seem just.

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., and Sebastian, for the motion.—Leave should be granted without any conditions, or, at any rate, without requiring more than a disclaimer under section 74, sub-section 2, of the Act of 1883. The Act of 1888 does not apply to these trade-marks, which are distinctive labels under section 64, sub-section (c), of the Act of 1883.

Sir R. E. Webster, A.G., and M. I. Joyce, for the Comptroller-General. — We do not object to the alteration, but leave should only be given on condition that the applicants state what particulars of their label are essential and what are not. They have misled the public by the use of the word "trade-mark," and their label is deceptive. They now come for an act of grace, and in return for that they should inform the public what parts of the label may be taken and what may not.

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., in reply, referred to In re Hudson's Trade-Marks, 3 Rep. Pat. Cas. 164.

KEKEWICH, J.—It is not for me to determine whether the applicants are well advised in making the application which they do to the court, nor to consider whether the remarks of Fry, L.J., govern the trade-marks in question here or not. That is entirely a question for the applicants to consider before they make their application. They have considered it, and, of course, without in the least degree admitting that they are affected by the Lord Justice's remarks, they entertained a doubt whether they would be able to sustain these labels if hereafter attacked, by reason of those remarks, and therefore they make their application. They come, therefore, under an Act which enables the court to do what is just towards them, but at the same to do it upon such terms as the court thinks fit, and, subject, of course, to the right of appeal, they cannot complain of any terms which the court thinks fit to impose. Argument, of course, there may be as to the reasonableness of any particular terms; but they come for an act of grace. I confess that if this had been severely contested on the part of the comptroller I should have been indisposed to allow any alteration at all, and for this reason. Quite apart from what the Lord Justice says, it seems to me clear that the applicants have in their registered trade-mark signified that the bull's head is, as the Attorney-General said, one of the essential parts of the trade-mark, and I think they have done more. I think they have said, putting into English what we are familiar with as schoolmen Latin, that the bull's head is that without which the trade-mark is not; not only that it is one of the essential parts, but that the other essential parts by themselves would not be sufficient protection; and therefore it seems to me that, at any rate, they are justified in entertaining the doubt, and they have placed the comptroller and the court in a difficulty, because they seek to alter that which, up to this time, they represented in the way which I have stated. Now when that word "trade-mark" is expunged—that is to say, when the application has been granted, what will remain as the essential parts? Who can tell? We know now, at any rate, that there is one essential part. We really know no more, except, of course, that, as the Attorney-General has pointed out, there is the get up of the whole label. Whether with a representation of the blue boy, or other devices, there is that open to be protected against imitation. But when the trade-mark is gone, when we cease to be told that the bull's head is the essential part of the trade-mark, then who is to know what is the essential part? It seems to me that some such considerations must have been present to the mind of the draftsman of this section 92, which is in the Act of 1883 and remains in the Act of 1888, because what the application may be directed to is the addition or alteration of a mark in any particular, not being an essential particular within the meaning of the Act, and the preservation of the essential particulars is a necessary incident to the application.

Therefore I think the offer made by Mr. Cozens-Hardy does not go far enough, and I think that the suggestion of the Attorney-General is required in order to meet the justice of the case—that is to say, in order to protect the public. It is quite true that when that has been done the public will not be informed, as I understand, not even in the Trade-Marks Journal, not certainly in the certificate, the label will go forth to the world as a whole, and as being as a whole the trade-mark; but there will be this important result, that if Messrs. Colman thereafter come to protect themselves against the infringement, then they will not be entitled to say this or that is an essential part. They will be bound down by the declaration which it is suggested they should make now, and what they now declare to be essential will be essential, and what they do not declare to be essential will not be essential, and all difficulty about that will be removed.

Then Mr. Cozens-Hardy relies upon the fact that he registered under the Act of 1883, and he says no greater term should be imposed on him than could have been imposed under the Act under which he registered. Now I must go back and consider the application as made at the date of the registration. I think it is a sufficient answer to that to say that he, coming now for an act of grace, must take it on the proper terms according to the law of the present day. I need not discuss the question of the old marks before 1875, because the Attorney-General admits that no alteration beyond that which the applicant himself wishes is required as regards those. But as regards the others I think that he ought to state now, as a condition of expunging the words "trade-mark," what are and what are not the essential particulars of the label, and with that I think the matter had better go back to the comptroller.

I quite recognize that the task of going into and discussing the details now would be, as the Attorney-General said, ridiculous, and ridiculous certainly in this sense, that it would be impossible; and I also recognize the extreme desirability of my making nothing more than general remarks, because these points may be raised again in many other cases, and I do not think I ought to do more than express an opinion of a general character.

Order granted; the applicants undertaking to indorse on their application and enter on the register a statement of the essential particulars of the mark, and a disclaimer of the exclusive right to the added matter, if any, to the satisfaction of the comptroller, with liberty to apply to the court in case of difference. The applicants to pay the costs of the motion.

Held, that the former fraudulent user of the marks disentitled the applicant to have them registered as new marks, even though the dishonest portions were omitted, since to permit registration would in effect be allowing the applicant to benefit by his former fraudulent conduct.

Summons.

This was a summons under the Patents, &c., Act, 1883, originally taken out by one José Fuente, and carried on by his representatives after his death pending the proceedings, that the Comptroller-General might be directed to proceed with the application of José Fuente notwithstanding the opposition of L. and H. Pinto. An application had been made on the 10th of September, 1887, by José Fuente to register two trade-marks hereinafter called respectively "La Republica Francesa de la Union" trade-mark, and the "Plantacion de la Union" trade-mark in respect of tobacco whether manufactured or unmanufactured.

There was also an application to register another mark called "La Union" as an old trade-mark, but this part of the case does not call for a report.

(a.) Reported by J. W. GREIG, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The "La Republica Francesa de la Union" mark, No. 67,419 (Trade-Marks Journal, Feb. 22, 1888, p. 234) consisted of three labels. The first label had two seated female figures lightly clad holding between them a medallion containing a laureated head. Over the label were the words "La Republica Francesa" in one line in large type, and below, the words "De la Union" in smaller type, and then, in another line, "Fabrica de Tabaccos Superiores" in still smaller type. Below the medallion were the words "De J. Fuente, Vera Cruz." The second label was an oval, and contained the words "Vera Cruz," with J. Fuente's name written across them. The third label was similar to the first, but of smaller size. The applicant described himself in the application to register as successor to Madraz y Ca., Vera Cruz, Mexico, and the description of goods to which he proposed to apply the trade-mark was "Tobacco, whether manufactured or unmanufactured."

The "Plantacion de la Union" trade-mark, which was numbered 67,418 in the Trade-Marks Journal of June 13, 1888, also consisted of three labels. The first represented a plantation, over which were the words "Plantacion de la Union," "Fabrica de Tabaccos Superiores," and below, the words "De J. Fuente, Vera Cruz." The second label was a smaller representation of the one just described, while the third one was an oval with the words "Vera Cruz" and J. Fuente's name written across them. The applicant described himself in the same way as in the other application, and the trade-mark was to be applied to the same description of goods.

The evidence showed that for some years previous to 1887 the same marks had been used by the applicant, except that instead of his own name appearing on them the labels contained the name of his predecessors, Madraz y Ca., with the address "Habana" as part of the label. The applicant or his predecessors had never had any factory or place of business at Havana, and the cigars sold by him were made at Vera Cruz, in Mexico. Shortly before, or immediately after, the passing of the Merchandise Marks Act, 1887 (50 & 51 Vict. c. 28), the applicant discontinued the use of the name of Madraz y Ca. and the address of "Habana," and substituted his own name, De J. Fuente, and his true address, Vera Cruz. The grounds of opposition to both the applications contained, amongst others, the following objections:—"That the applicant has used the word 'Habana' in conjunction with the said trade-mark in such a way as to amount to or convey a misrepresentation." "That the applicant has used in conjunction with the said trade-mark a statement conveying or intending to convey to the public the impression that he is the successor in business of the firm of Madraz y Ca., whereas, in fact, he is not such successor." The grounds of opposition to the Plantacion de la Union trade-mark also contained the following objection:—"The applicant has never used the said trade-mark in the way in which he proposes to register the same. The words 'Vera Cruz' on the trade-mark has been substituted for the word 'Habana,' which has been used on a trade-mark so as to amount to or convey a misrepresentation."

Neville, Q.C., and F. B. Muir, for the applicant.—The word "Habana" has not been used since 1884, and its use, correct or otherwise, ought not now to be allowed to stand in the way of an honest application to register. The case of Newman v. Pinto, W. N., 1887, p. 119, is a decision that where the whole circumstances show fraud the court will not assist, but there is nothing of that sort here, as the cigars were well known to be of Mexican origin, and there is nothing in our present mark which cannot be registered—there is nothing in it common (i.e., open) to the trade as defined in Burland v. Broxbourn Oil Co., 38 W. R. 89, 42 Ch. D. 274, where common to the trade is shown to mean anything the trade can legitimately use.

Aston, Q.C., J. Cutler, and McColl, for the opponents.—There has previously been a fraudulent user of the same mark with a slight difference. The applicant cannot now be allowed, by omitting the fraudulent part, to benefit by the former user. The case is primæ impressionis, but is an instance where the rule should be applied that he who comes to this court must come with clean hands.

Neville, Q.C., in reply.—It is solely a question whether the personal disability created by the former fraudulent user is to be allowed to prevent an honest applicant from getting his mark registered after that user has been discontinued. It would be unjust to say that once tainted this mark is always tainted.

ROMER, J.—There are three applications before me. [His lordship dealt first with the application to register "La Union" as an old trade-mark, which he dismissed on the ground that the mark was not an old mark. He then continued:—] But that leaves the court to consider the application so far as concerns two new marks, No. 67,419 and No. 67,418. Those two marks may be dealt with together, for substantially the points arising with regard to them are the same, and in my judgment I will confine my observations to the trade-mark 67,418, which has been referred to as the Plantacion trade-mark.

It is contended on behalf of the respondents that the application to register that trade-mark should be refused because of the facts that I am about to refer to: That mark, though new in the sense of not having been used prior to 1875, has, in fact, been used several years prior to this application, and attention is called to the way in which that mark has been used, though not quite in the form set forth in the Trade-Marks Journal. As used, instead of having the words at the bottom, being the name of De J. Fuente, the applicant, and the address, Vera Cruz, which is now the place of residence or factory of the applicant, the mark as used contained the name of Madraz y Ca. as the predecessors in title of Fuente, with the address "Habana," and stamped upon the boxes which contained the cigars coming from this factory occur the words "Plantacion de la Union," and underneath, but as part of the stamp, the word "Habana"—between the two words appearing the initials of the applicant's predecessors, Madraz y Ca. The box also contains a smaller label with the word "Habana" printed on it, and the initials "Madraz y Ca." written across it. It appears that in the form which I have mentioned, and not otherwise, the mark which it is now sought to have registered has been used for several years and in no other form.

But it appears as the result of the evidence before me that at or about the year 1887, on the passing of the Merchandise Marks Act of 1887, the applicant discontinued using the mark the word "Habana," in any shape or form, and used instead his own name with the address of Vera Cruz, in Mexico. It further appears that there was an application made by Fuente to register the trade-mark as used in the form which gave the name of his predecessors in title as the owners of the mark, with the address of "Habana" as the place of residence. That application was not proceeded with, and in lieu of it the application now before me was made, and made as far back as the 10th of September, 1887.

With regard to the contention on the part of the applicant that since the time I have mentioned, or even since 1885, he has not used the label with the word "Habana" upon it at all, I find there is no evidence that any box of his cigars with any label of his which does not contain the word "Habana" upon it has ever been seen in this country; and though Mr. Fuente in his affidavit made a general statement as to his not having used the label in its old form since the time I have mentioned, owing to his death the respondents have had no opportunity of cross-examining him upon that. But so far as I can gather from the evidence, whatever may have been the intention of Mr. Fuente, or even his practice in Vera Cruz, it does not appear that he has sent any cigar boxes to this country having upon them a label in the form in which it is now sought to have them registered.

Under these circumstances the respondents say that the application should be refused, because of the alleged fraudulent user by the applicant and his predecessors of substantially this very mark. The first question which arises is this, Was the mark as used fraudulent? I have come to the conclusion that it was. Inside the box, and looking at the label as used, as appears from the exhibit before the court, it is clear to me that the representation is there made that Madraz y Ca., who were the predecessors of Fuente, had their place of business at "Habana." But it does not rest there. The mark on the box itself, which is burnt, and to which I before referred, also supports the view that the representation is being made that the words "Plantacion de la Union" were being used with reference to cigars coming from Habana. And that is also further supported by the small label to which I have referred, having the word "Habana" upon it, and the name of Fuente's predecessors in title written across it.

I come to the conclusion, therefore, that the trade-mark which it is now sought to register as in fact used with certain words put there in the place of the word Fuente of Vera Cruz was used fraudulently for several years, and used up to the time when the application was made for registration of this mark.

Under these circumstances I have to consider whether the applicant is entitled to get this mark registered as a new mark. On the whole, I think he is not so entitled. It is clear, and, indeed, was admitted, and rightly admitted, by one of the applicant's counsel in the course of his argument, that the object of the applicant in this case in applying for registration of this mark as a new mark is, in effect, to enable him to get the benefit of the old user—that is to say, the old user which I have come to the conclusion was a fraudulent user. That, it appears to me, ought not to be allowed. I think if this mark was registered it would give the applicant, in effect, the benefit (a benefit to which he is not entitled) of the old user. Further, I think that the effect of the registration in this case might well be calculated to deceive. I think that any person who had been accustomed to deal with the cigars under the old form of the label, and who had been led to believe that the cigars came from Habana, might still be led, by cigars under the new form of the label, into believing that they also were Habana cigars, for he would not unnaturally remember the old label which he would find substantially the same as the new one, and either might not notice or might not appreciate the difference between the two arising from the substitution of the words Fuente of Vera Cruz for the words "Madraz y Ca., Successores, Habana."

And as it occurs to me the point might be put in another way. Suppose the case had come before the court as follows:—Application by Mr. Fuente to register the mark as a new one, saying nothing whatever about prior user. Answer put in on behalf of the opponents. This is not a new mark, it is substantially an old mark as used, which shows on the face of it that that is so. That would be an answer to the claim but for the reply which the applicant in this case asks the court to allow him to establish to this effect: I used the label and the trade-mark referred to, and I used it, not for Habana cigars, but for Mexicans, and I ask the court to allow me to show for my own benefit on this application, and in support of it, that my old user was fraudulent and, therefore, ought to be removed from my path. In my judgment he ought not to be allowed to rely on that before the court in order to assist him in getting this mark registered. As I said at first, the substance of the application is that the applicant, by registering this as a new mark, may, in substance, get the benefit of his old fraudulent user. The point is a new one, and I will not be the first judge to assist the applicant in a case of this kind. Having regard to this decision it is unnecessary for me to consider, and therefore I do not decide, the other points which have arisen in this case, and in my judgment all three applications fail, but with regard to costs I feel bound now, having had the whole of the evidence before me, to express my strong disapprobation of the evidence given by Mr. Pinto and of his conduct in reference to these marks, and, having regard to what he has said on oath, his cross-examination, and his conduct, in dismissing these applications, to mark my sense of Mr. Pinto's conduct, I dismiss them without costs.

Married woman—Joint contract—Separate liability— Res judicata.

The rule in Kendall v. Hamilton, 28 W. R. 97, 4 App. Cas. 504, that a judgment (although unsatisfied) against one of two joint contractors for breach of the contract is a bar to a subsequent action for the same breach against the other joint contractor, applies where that other is a married woman, and therefore bound only as to her separate estate.

This was an appeal from a decision of the judge of the Clerkenwell County Court directing that a nonsuit should be entered.

The facts and arguments sufficiently appear from the judgments of the court.

Cur. adv. vult.

April 23.—The following written judgments were delivered:—

A. L. SMITH, J.—The question in this case is, whether the learned judge of the county court at Clerkenwell was right in nonsuiting the plaintiff.

The circumstances are as follows:—By agreement in writing dated the 19th of September, 1888, Charles Niblett, the husband of the present defendant, by his agent, Vincent, contracted to let to the plaintiff, a married woman, No. 42, Upper Bedford-place, Russell-square, together with the furniture and effects therein for the term of one year, and thereby contracted to give to the plaintiff the option of purchasing such furniture and effects. This contract Charles Niblett broke, and thereupon the plaintiff sued him for not letting the house to her and for not giving her the option to purchase, and ultimately recovered judgment against him for £30 damages and costs.

Charles Niblett only in part satisfied this judgment and then became bankrupt. The plaintiff thereupon commenced another action against the present defendant, the wife of Charles Niblett, upon the same contract and for the same breaches for which she had sued Charles Niblett.

Objection was taken that this second action was not maintainable by reason of the well-established rule of law that a joint contractor cannot be sued in a second action upon the same contract, though not a party to the first action in which judgment had been recovered, the reason, as I understand it, being that there can only be one judgment upon one entire contract: Kendall v. Hamilton; Hammond v. Schofield, [1891] 1 Q. B. 453 (per Vaughan Williams, J., at p. 457).

The learned judge held the objection well founded, and nonsuited the plaintiff.

The way the plaintiff sought to make out a case against the defendant was by showing that Vincent in reality contracted with her not only on behalf of Charles Niblett, as stated in the contract, but also on behalf of his wife, the present defendant, and it must be taken that legal evidence can be produced in that behalf.

This case may therefore be discussed upon the hypothesis that both the husband and the wife had signed the contract of the 19th of September, 1888. Mr. Willis, for the plaintiff, asserts that even if this were so the husband and wife are not joint contractors upon one entire contract, because by the contract the wife could only contract in respect of her separate estate, whereas the husband contracted personally, and he says that consequently there were two contracts, and not one. It must, however, be pointed out that they both contracted by one contract in writing to do the same identical thing, they both committed the same breaches, and both became liable for the same amount of damages. Why, then, is this not one entire contract jointly entered into by both?

The argument of Mr. Willis goes the length of asserting that a married woman cannot, by possibility, enter into a joint contract, for if she enters into a contract conjointly with another she must always contract in respect of something in respect of which the other does not contract, and that this is so even if she jointly contracts with another married woman. This proposition I have never heard before, and I do not agree with it. Fry, L.J., in the case of Whittaker v. Kershaw, ante, p. 25, 45 Ch. D., at p. 329, says: "The effect of section 1, sub-section 2, of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, as it appears to me, is to allow a married woman to be sued in respect of anything in respect of which a man could be sued; subject to this, that her power to contract is limited, and that the remedy is confined to her separate estate. The right of action is the same as against a man, but the relief is different." It seems to me that she can contract in the same way as a man; subject to this, that she must have separate estate at the date of contract, which the man of course need not. It appears to me that Mr. Willis is in this difficulty—if the defendant had separate estate when she contracted, she can contract as a feme sole, and consequently can enter into a joint contract and if she has not, she cannot contract at all. So, whichever way it is taken, the plaintiff cannot succeed, for if the defendant had separate estate then the rule of law about joint contractors applies, and if not then she cannot be sued. Whichever way you take it the plaintiff must be nonsuited. For these reasons it appears to me that the learned county court judge was right in nonsuiting the plaintiff. It is unnecessary to decide any further point taken by the defendant, and in my judgment this appeal must be dismissed, with costs.

GRANTHAM, J.—In my judgment this nonsuit was right. The plaintiff contended that the goods, the subject of this action, being claimed by Mrs. Niblett in her husband's bankruptcy as her goods and not Mr. Charles Niblett's at the time the contract was made by him with the plaintiff, the plaintiff can now sue Mrs. Niblett and recover against her separate estate the damage for a breach of so much of the contract made between the plaintiff and Mr. Niblett as relates to these goods. Assuming there had been no proceedings taken under this contract which ended in judgment being obtained by the plaintiff against Charles Niblett, I think the plaintiff could have maintained such an action, but as in this case the plaintiff first sued Charles Niblett, not as agent at all, but as principal, and got judgment against him, she cannot now sue the wife.

The action could only be maintained on one of two grounds—either that she was an undisclosed principal, or else that she was a feme sole dealing with her separate estate. If the former the plaintiff, is precluded from maintaining it because the only written contract is one by Vincent, as agent for the husband, and if the husband is treated as agent for the wife, then there is a judgment outstanding against the agent, and until that is set aside you cannot maintain another action against the principal. And if you treat it as an action against the wife, contracting in reference to her separate estate, she must have entered into a joint contract with her husband, because, the transaction being one, the contract being one, the subject-matter of the contract being the same, it is exactly the same cause of action on which the plaintiff first sued—viz., a contract to put her in possession of these goods, and she having obtained a judgment on that cause of action, it must be treated as a judgment obtained against one of two joint contractors, and no authority has been suggested that takes the case out of the ordinary law above referred to.

Appeal dismissed.

REG. v. JUDGE OF THE HALIFAX COUNTY COURT AND BAIRSTOWE. (a.)

County court—Jurisdiction—Validity of patent—"Title to any franchise"—County Courts Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 43), s. 56.

The privileges granted to an inventor by letters patent are a "franchise" within the meaning of section 56 of the County Courts Act, 1888. A county court has, therefore, no jurisdiction to entertain an action in which the title to letters patent is in question.

(a.) Reported by T. R. COLQUHOUN DILL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

In this case a rule nisi had been obtained calling upon the judge of the Halifax County Court to show cause why a mandamus should not issue directing him to hear and determine an action for the infringement of a patent which had been commenced in his court.

The plaintiff alleged that the defendant had infringed his patent, and the action was brought to recover thirteen guineas damages for the infringement. The defendant disputed the validity of the patent. The county court judge held that he had no jurisdiction to try the action, and nonsuited the plaintiff. The plaintiff then obtained the rule nisi, which now came on for argument.

T. Terrell showed cause against the rule.—Such an action as the present is not within the ordinary jurisdiction of the county court as defined by section 56 of the County Courts Act, 1888. Actions relating to patents are regulated by the Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 57). Sections 28-32 of that Act deal with legal proceedings, and "the court" therein referred to is defined by section 117 to mean "her Majesty's High Court of Justice in England"; the procedure under the Act generally, and in particular the provisions of section 29, as to delivery with the statement of claim in an action for infringement of particulars of the breaches complained of could not be followed in the county court. Moreover, patent cases are excepted from the jurisdiction of the county courts by section 56 of the County Courts Act, 1888, for the word "franchise" in that section includes patent rights: Blackst. Comm., vol. 2, p. 37, sub voc. Franchise; Termes de la Ley, sub voc. Franchise. [CHARLES, J. referred to Finch's Law, c. 14, pp. 164-167, where instances of franchises are given, and there is no mention of letters patent.]

R. A. Dale, in support of the rule.—A patent is not a franchise; that expression relates to rights affecting real property, such as a right to hold markets and take tolls: Rastall's Entries, p. 382; Com. Dig., sub voc. Franchise; Chitty's Prerogative, p. 119, where a list of fourteen franchises is given, and letters patent are not included. In section 56 the word immediately follows, and is to be taken as ejusdem generis with, the words "toll, fair, market." The Patents Act, 1883, only regulates the practice in patent actions; that practice could be adopted in the county courts; provision now exists for delivery of particulars where the claim exceeds 40s. This is a personal action, and the Patents Act has not taken away the jurisdiction of the county court: In re Stuart v. Jones, 1 W. R. 20, 1 E. & B. 22.

Terrell, in reply.—It was not intended that the county courts should have jurisdiction in matters of such difficulty as the investigation of titles to hereditaments or to letters patent, and there is no recorded instance of the validity of a patent having been tried in a county court.

Cur. adv. vult.

April 22.—POLLOCK, B., delivered the judgment of the COURT.—This action was commenced in the county court of Yorkshire, holden at Halifax, for the infringement of a patent. The defendant denied the validity of the patent, and upon the case coming on for hearing the judge declined to hear it, upon the ground that the court had no jurisdiction. The plaintiff then applied to this court for an order directing the judge to proceed with the case. The question, therefore, for our determination is whether or no the county court has jurisdiction to try such an action where the plaintiff's title to the patent is in issue. No instance of such an action having been tried in a county court was brought to our attention, and there are good reasons why in practice such actions should be brought in the superior courts. The right of the Crown to grant letters patent to a person for the sole use of any art first invented by him is a part of the ancient royal prerogative; this right has been limited by the Statute of Monopolies, but the grant is founded on the common law right of the sovereign. In modern times, although the right conveyed to a subject by a patent is the same as in the time of James I., and an action is now, as then, maintainable by the grantee of a patent against anyone who causes him damage by an infringement, the procedure, which is necessarily peculiar in its requirements as to particulars, inspection, and other matters, has been dealt with first by rules of court and later by statutes. The existing Act (by which the earlier provisions have been repealed) is 46 & 47 Vict. c. 57. Sections 28 to 32 provide in detail for the procedure of "the court" in a patent action, and by section 117 "the court" is defined as meaning "her Majesty's High Court of Justice in England." Hence either party, plaintiff or defendant, who is desirous of availing himself of such procedure can do so only where the action is in that court. It was argued before us that this alone would denote such an intention on the part of the Legislature that all proceedings in patent actions should take place in the High Court as to deprive the county courts of jurisdiction. We think, however, that this proposition does not exhaust the question, and that, although it is not without some weight, it is by no means conclusive. We must, therefore, next look to see what is the jurisdiction of the county courts.

The jurisdiction of the county court is given by the original County Court Act of 1846 (9 & 10 Vict. c. 95), s. 58, and the same language, with a variation as to pecuniary limit, occurs in the Act of 1888, s. 56. By this section "all personal actions where the debt, demand, or damage claimed is not more than £50" may be commenced in county courts. The words "personal actions" clearly include an action for the infringement of a patent, but in both of these Acts the following proviso occurs:—"The court shall not have cognizance of any action of ejectment, or in which the title to any corporeal or incorporeal hereditaments, or to any toll, fair, market, or franchise shall be in question, or for any libel or slander, or for seduction, or for breach of promise of marriage," and it was contended on behalf of the defendant that "franchise" includes the right or privilege which is granted by a patent for a new invention.

The primary meaning of the word "franchise," as its origin denotes, is a freedom, but it has been used in the language of the law in a wider sense, as including a liberty or privilege. In Termes de la Ley the only meaning given to it is "an immunity or exemption from ordinary jurisdiction." The various rights, however, which it aptly describes are dwelt upon at great length in Viner and Comyn and in Bacon's Abridgment and in Blackstone's Commentaries, vol. 2, p. 37, it is said "franchise and liberty are used as synonymous terms, and their definition is a royal privilege or branch of the king's prerogative subsisting in the hands of a subject. Being, therefore, derived from the Crown they must arise from the king's grant, or in some cases may be held by prescription, which, as has been frequently said, pre-supposes a grant. The kinds of them are various and almost infinite." In Chitty's Prerogative of the Crown, p. 119a, franchise is defined to be "a royal privilege or branch of the royal prerogative subsisting in the hands of a subject by a grant from the king," and for this he refers to Finch's Law, 164.

In Comyn's Digest (Prerogative D., 30) it is said, "The king may grant to another to have any franchise or liberty"; so as to "privileges of trade," and under the head of "Trade" (B.) instances are given of grants by the king's patent for the sole printing of certain books. In Darcy v. Allein, 11 Rep. 84b (vol. 6, p. 159), the court said in dealing with the first question—viz., whether the said grant to the plaintiff of the sole making of cards within the realm was good or not—"Also such charter of a monopoly against the freedom of trade and traffic is against divers Acts of Parliament, as 9 Ed. 3, c. 1 and 2, which for the advancement of trade and traffic extends to all things vendible, notwithstanding any charter of franchise granted to the contrary, or usage or custom or judgment given upon such charters, which charters are adjudged by the same parliament to be of no force or effect." These words are inapplicable to the "first question" unless the court intended to assume that the grant of the sole making of cards within the realm was a "charter of franchise," and although the charter of franchise mentioned in the statute cited apparently referred to charters which had been granted to corporations or towns, it seems to be a fair inference that the court considered such charter of a monopoly as a charter of franchise, and that this would be none the less true when the monopoly answered to the description which the court declared to be lawful—i.e., "when any man by his own charge and industry, or by his own wit or invention, doth bring any new trade into the realm, or any engine tending to the furtherance of a trade that never was used before, and that for the good of the realm."

The result of these authorities is, in our opinion, that "franchise" does include such a right as was put in issue by the proceedings in the county court. The plaintiff, however, further contended that, even assuming this to be so with reference to the general meaning of the word "franchise," the language of the exemption is such as requires that a more limited meaning should be given to it. The sentence in which it is found commences by exempting from the county court jurisdiction "any action of ejectment, or in which the title to any corporeal or incorporeal hereditaments, or to any toll, fair, market," shall be in question, and it is said that as these words apply to claims in respect of realty, or quasi-realty, the word "franchise" which follows ought to be limited in its meaning to franchises of such a character as involve the right to incorporeal hereditaments or rights of a similar kind. This rule of construction does not seem to us to apply. It is not the case of a general word following one or more less general terms ejusdem generis, in which it may properly be said that the meaning of the subsequent general word is cut down or governed by the more particular word which precedes it. Here the category of exceptions begins by very general words, and then, after the word "or," adds specific causes of action, and finally closes with "or for any libel or slander, or for seduction or breach of promise of marriage," so that to give proper effect to the language used the legal meaning of each word must be assigned to it. Upon careful consideration of all these grounds of argument we have arrived at the conclusion that the view acted upon by the county court judge was correct, and that this rule must be discharged, with costs.

Landlord and tenant—Compensation to tenant—Tenant for life—Executors of—Executors of landlord paying compensation—Right of executors to a charge on the lands—Agricultural Holdings (England) Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 61), s. 29.

In a petition by the executors of a deceased landlord, a tenant for life, to obtain a charge upon lands under section 29 of the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1883, in respect of a sum paid by them as compensation to an outgoing tenant, such compensation having been fixed by valuation before the death of the landlord, but not paid by him, the county court judge held that the executors were not entitled to have this charge, as the word "landlord" in the section did not include the executors of the landlord.

Held, by Cave, J. (affirming the decision of the county court judge), that the word "landlord" in section 29 of the Act does not include the executors of the landlord, and that, therefore, the executors were not entitled to the charge.

Held, by Vaughan Williams, J., that "landlord" does include executors of the landlord, and that the executors were entitled to the charge.

Appeal from the county court of Somerset, holden at Wells.

A petition was presented in the Wells County Court by the executors of John Gough, deceased, asking for an order charging a sum of £35 upon a certain holding under section 29 of the Agricultural Holdings (England) Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 61).

The late John Gough was tenant for life of a certain farm, and in the year 1886 he let the same to John W. Huggett as tenant from year to year. In March, 1889, Huggett, the tenant, gave his landlord, Gough, notice of his intention to quit the farm at Lady Day, 1890, and in January, 1890, he served on the landlord a notice of claim for £130 for unexhausted improvements on the farm under the provisions of the Agricultural Holdings (England) Act, 1883, and on the 2nd of April the landlord served on the tenant notice of a counter-claim for £80 for dilapidations. On the 5th of April two valuers were appointed, and under the provisions of sections 8 and 42 of the Act they agreed that £90 was the sum due to the tenant, and £55 the sum due to the landlord, leaving a balance due to the tenant of £35, which was to be paid within a fortnight.

On the 8th of April Gough died, having up to that time been in receipt of the lands in question as owner for life. The ownership then passed to the remainderman. On the 24th of April Gough's executors paid the £35 to the tenant, and they claimed a charge upon the holding for that amount. The only question raised was whether, under section 29 of the Act, the petitioners were entitled to ask for an order.

For the petitioners it was contended before the county court judge that the word "landlord" in section 29 meant the "landlord or his executors," and the interpretation clause, section 61, and section 30 were cited in support of that contention. For the remainderman it was contended that "landlord" did not include the executors, inasmuch as "landlord" in the interpretation clause was not defined as including executors, whereas in the same clause "tenant" is expressly said to include executors.

(a.) Reported by Sir SHERSTON BAKER, Barrister-at-Law.

The learned judge held that the order could not be made, as section 29 speaks of the landlord applying for the order, and by the definition clause "landlord" is to mean "any person for the time being entitled to receive the rents and profits of any holding," whereas the "tenant" is defined to be the "tenant or his executors," and section 29 says the "landlord, on paying to the tenant the amount due," &c., that the money was paid on the 24th of April, when John Gough was dead, and when he had, therefore, ceased to be entitled to receive the rents and profits, as he was only the tenant for life, and his right, therefore, ceased with his death; that the executors never were entitled to receive the rents and profits, and that they are not now entitled to charge the £35 paid to the tenant, upon the lands under the 29th section.

The learned judge therefore dismissed the petition.

The petitioners appealed.

Section 29 provides: "A landlord, on paying to the tenant the amount due to him in respect of compensation under this Act, . . . shall be entitled to obtain from the county court a charge on the holding, or any part thereof, to the amount of the sum so paid or expended.

"The court shall, on proof of the payment or expenditure, . . . make an order charging the holding, or any part thereof, with repayment of the amount paid or expended, with such interest, and by such instalments, and with such directions for giving effect to the charge as the court thinks fit."

Cur. adv. vult.

April 14.—VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J., read the following judgment:—

The question in this case is whether the word "landlord" in section 29 of the Agricultural Holdings (England) Act, 1883, includes the executors of the landlord, so as to enable them to obtain from the county court a charge on the holding. I think that the word "landlord" in that section does include the executors of the landlord. The argument against this construction is based entirely on the fact that the definition section—section 61—defines "landlord" as "any person for the time being entitled to receive the rents and profits of any holding," and makes no mention of the personal representatives of the landlord, whereas the definition of a "tenant" expressly includes the executors, administrators, and assigns of, and any person deriving title under, the tenant. This definition clause does certainly primâ facie give rise to the presumption that in this Act "landlord" does not include the executors of the landlord, but it seems to me that if the Act is looked at as a whole, the presumption arising from the words of the definition section is negatived. The right of the tenant to compensation is dealt with in section 1 of the Act, which gives the tenant on quitting his holding at the determination of his tenancy the right to obtain from the landlord as compensation the value of improvements; now it seems impossible to suppose that the word "landlord" in this section does not include the personal representatives of the landlord, or to suppose that if the landlord were tenant for life and died suddenly, a tenant, who had not already given notice of claim under section 7, would lose his statutory right to compensation.

Then take section 6 of the Act, which requires that in the ascertainment of the amount of compensation under this Act payable to the tenant, there shall be taken into account in reduction thereof any sums due to the landlord in respect of rent. It seems clear that in this section "landlord" must include the personal representatives of the landlord; moreover, it seems clear that a tenant—or, at all events, a tenant who has made a claim under section 7—has a right to enforce his claim against the executors of the landlord, for the final clause of section 61 provides that "the designations of landlord and tenant shall continue to apply to the parties until the conclusion of any proceedings taken under or in pursuance of this Act in respect of compensation for improvements."

Now, in my opinion, one ought not, unless the words compel one to do so, to construe the Act, which imposes on landlords this liability, so as not also to extend to them, or those that they represent, the correlative right of charging this compulsory expenditure on the land, and thus on those who have the benefit of the expenditure. It is said that the apparent injustice of so construing the Act, not to give the executors this power, disappears in face of the consideration that the Legislature may not have intended to charge the land unless the landlord, by application to the county court, declared his option so to charge it, because it is said that it might well be that the landlord preferred his heirs-at-law to his next of kin. It seems to me that this improbable event weighs as nothing against the injustice which will be done in the necessarily frequent cases where the landlord either has not the opportunity, or from carelessness neglects the opportunity, of charging the land. Primâ facie it must be supposed that the Legislature intended that those who get the benefit of the expenditure should bear the burden. There is another point of view which seems to me to lead to the same conclusion. The definition of "landlord" is "any person for the time being entitled to receive the rents and profits of any holding." Now it may be that this definition may be so read as to include as persons for the time being entitled to receive the rents and profits of any holding those who are entitled to receive rents and profits in arrear or unpaid at and after the determination of the term. Indeed, the whole scope of the Act goes to show that the final account is not to be taken till after the determination of the term, for there are items of charge and deduction in section 6 which can hardly be arrived at until after the determination of the term. Moreover, it can hardly be that the Legislature intended that a tenant who had suffered the term to expire without making a claim under section 7 should lose the benefit of that section, or, indeed, of any part of the Act; and it is to be observed that, if the term "landlord" is only to apply so long as the term subsists, the determination of the term, as well by the death of the tenant for life or cestui que vie, as by effluxion of time, will oust the jurisdiction of the statute.

I have only to add that in the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1883 (Scotland), which, except that it substitutes "sheriff" for "county court judge," and Scotch law terms for English law terms, seems generally couched in the very words of the English Act, "landlord" is made by the definition clause to include executor and administrator. In my opinion this is done not to differentiate the Scotch Act from the English Act, which was passed in Parliament on the same day, but to clear up a possible doubt which might arise on the wording of the English Act. I think this because it is difficult to conceive any reason why it should be just in Scotland that the executors should have this power of charging the land with money which they are compelled to spend out of their testator's estate for the benefit of the land, and not just in England that they should have the same power.

CAVE, J., read the following judgment:—This is an appeal from an order of a county court judge, refusing to give the appellant a charge under section 29 of the Agricultural Holdings (England) Act, 1883.

At the commencement of 1890 a Mr. Gough was tenant for life of the property in question, which was then in the possession of a tenant whose tenancy was about to expire at Lady Day of that year. The tenant had duly given notice to Mr. Gough, his landlord, of his intention to make a claim for compensation under the Act, and on the 5th of April, 1890, by a valuation made by consent, the amount of the compensation was assessed at £35. On the 8th of April the landlord died, leaving the £35 unpaid. On the 24th of April his executors paid the amount, and then applied to the county court for a charge on the holding, which the county court refused to give, on the ground that the executors could not bring themselves within the Act. Section 29 of the Act, omitting immaterial parts, provides that "a landlord on paying to the tenant the amount due to him in respect of compensation under this Act . . . shall be entitled to obtain from the county court a charge on the holding to the amount of the sum so paid." Now, in this case the applicants were not the "landlord," but his executors, and it is necessary, therefore, to turn to the interpretation clause to see if that throws any light on the question. Section 61 enacts, that "landlord" in relation to a holding means "any person for the time being entitled to receive the rents and profits of any holding." Now the applicants never were entitled to receive the rents and profits of this holding, for on the death of Mr. Gough on the 8th of April the person for the time being entitled to receive the rents of this holding was his granddaughter, who became tenant in fee on his death. At the end of section 61 it is provided that the designations of landlord and tenant shall continue to apply to the parties until the conclusion of any proceedings taken under or in pursuance of this Act in respect of compensation for improvemonts. In my judgment this part of the interpretation clause made Gough the landlord, and his tenant the tenant after the 25th of March, notwithstanding that the tenancy determined on that day.

I do not see how it can possibly apply to the executors, and it seems to me to afford an argument against them, as tending to show that Mr. Gough himself might have ceased to be within the definition of the word "landlord" given in the earlier part of the section if this clause had not been inserted. If but for this clause Mr. Gough would not after the 25th of March have been within the definition of landlord merely because he still remained entitled to receive the rent which accrued due on that day, then à fortiori his executors would not come within that definition. If this is the natural meaning of the language of the statute, is there anything so repugnant to natural justice in the result as to force us to the conclusion that this could not have been the intention of the Legislature? Before the passing of the Act of 1883 the executors of a tenant for life who had been compelled to pay compensation to the tenant according to the terms of the lease or the custom of the country, under such circumstances as existed here, could not have recovered any part of that sum from the remainderman, but the whole must have come out of the personal estate of the tenant for life. It is true that the Act gives the tenant more ample compensation than he could have obtained before, and makes that compensation payable by the landlord who may be only a tenant for life, but in return it gives the landlord power to obtain a charge, if in his discretion he thinks fit to do so, not only for that compensation which he is compelled by the Act to pay, but also for that which he would, even before the Act, have had to pay under the terms of the lease or the custom of the country.

Is there anything unreasonable or contrary to natural justice in confining the option to take a charge to the landlord himself, and in not extending it to his executors, who would be bound, or might naturally be expected to decide in favour of taking a charge, while the landlord himself might be quite as likely to decide in favour of the heir or remainderman as not? I do not say it would be unreasonable to extend the option to the executors; it is enough for my purpose that it is not so repugnant to natural justice to confine it to the landlord personally as to compel us to put a non-natural interpretation on the words of the statute. Whether the one view should be adopted or the other might very well depend on the prior history of the nation, and of its dealings with landed property, and also on the economical views generally prevalent in the nation. It is remarkable that in another Act passed on the same day, but confined to Scotland, the opposite view of extending the option to the executors of the landlord did prevail; and the very fact that the Legislature, when it was minded so to extend the option, knew how to express that meaning, is a strong argument against giving to quite different language in the English Act the same interpretation as would be given to the language of the Scotch Act. Nor can it be said that the matter was passed over per incuriam, for when, in section 61, the Legislature comes to define the word "tenant," it expressly includes the executors, and to show that this right to compensation extends to the tenant's executors, and to preclude the contention that the general inclusion of executors would not extend to such a right, it expressly provides that the right to receive compensation in respect of any improvement made by a tenant shall enure to the benefit of such executors, administrators, assigns, and other persons as aforesaid.

It may be said that this construction prevents the landlord from exercising his option if he should die just after the determination of the tenancy, and before he has time to apply to the county court for a charge; but I should wish to guard against any such construction being inferred from my judgment. It is not necessary to decide the point here, but I should like it to be understood that I am not at present prepared to hold that the executors could not succeed in obtaining a charge, if they could show that their testator in his lifetime had unequivocally declared his intention of applying for one—as, for instance, by giving the remainderman notice of the tenant's claim, with the view to the remainderman's being represented on the arbitration provided by the Act, and protecting his interests against the claim of the tenant. Nothing of the kind is suggested to have taken place here, and, for the reasons above set forth, I am of opinion that the learned county court judge was right, and that this appeal should be dismissed.

Costs—Taxation after payment—Solicitor—Special circumstances—Pressure—Payment "under protest"—Client abroad—Discretion of judge—Attorneys and Solicitors Act, 1843 (6 & 7 Vict. c. 73), ss. 37, 38, 41.

In October, 1890, house property which was subject to a mortgage was sold by the mortgagor, the 8th of November being, as the mortgagee's solicitor was aware, the date fixed for completion. On the 24th of November, when the purchaser was pressing for completion of the contract, and threatening an action for specific performance, the mortgagee's solicitor delivered a bill of costs for £45, and three weeks afterwards a small supplementary bill for £3 16s. The mortgagor himself was in Australia, but on the 23rd of December his solicitor, acting as his agent, in order to get the purchase completed, paid "under protest" the sum of £42, which the mortgagee's solicitor had offered to accept in full discharge of the bills, and a receipt was given which stated that the amount was "paid under protest."

The mortgagor's solicitor having taken out a summons for taxation after payment, alleging as "special circumstances" within sections 38 and 41 of 6 & 7 Vict. c. 73 —(1) the mortgagor's absence, (2) the payment having been made "under protest," and (3) the "pressure" arising from the necessity under which he lay of obtaining the mortgagee's concurrence in order to complete the contract for sale, Kekewich, J., acceded to the application.

Held, on appeal, that, though there might be some doubt whether the grounds alleged were sufficient to constitute a clear case of "special circumstances" within the meaning of the Act, yet, as some grounds for holding such special circumstances had been shown, and the judge had exercised his discretion, his decision ought not, under the circumstances of this case, to be interfered with, and that appeals in cases of this kind ought not to be encouraged where the amount in question was so trifling.

Decision of Kekewich, J., affirmed.

Appeal from Kekewich, J.

This was an appeal by a solicitor, from an order made by Kekewich, J., at chambers, directing taxation of certain bills of costs, after payment, on the ground of "special circumstances."

Walter Liberty Vernon, who was now residing at Sydney, New South Wales, had mortgaged some houses at St. Leonard's-on-Sea in 1880 for £3,000, and Mr. Cheesman, the appellant, who had then acted for both parties, was now solicitor to the mortgagee.

On the 6th of October, 1890, the property was put up for sale by order of the mortgagor, and was sold, the 8th of November then next being fixed by the conditions of sale as the date for the completion of the contract, a fact of which the mortgagee's solicitor was admitted to be aware.

Sixteen days after the date so fixed for completion —that is to say, on the 24th of November—the mortgagee's solicitor delivered three bills of costs, amounting together to £42, to the mortgagor's solicitors, and three or four weeks later, on the 18th of December, a supplementary bill for a further sum of £3 16s. 2d. The purchaser was then pressing for the completion of the contract, and had actually threatened to bring an action to enforce specific performance of it.

On the 23rd of December a meeting for the purpose of completing the purchase took place between the mortgagor's solicitor (as agent for the mortgagor, who was still in Australia), the mortgagee's solicitor, and the purchaser's solicitor; and the mortgagee's solicitor offering to accept £42 in discharge of the bills (to the amount of which the mortgagor's solicitor had objected), the latter paid that sum "under protest" in order to procure the completion of the purchase. The receipt expressly stated that the amount was "paid under protest."

In the following month the solicitor to the mortgagor took out a summons on his behalf for taxation of the bills of costs, notwithstanding payment.

On the 16th of February, 1891, Kekewich, J., sitting at chambers, held that a sufficient case of "special circumstances" had been made out, and accordingly referred the bills for taxation.

The judge having certified that he did not require to hear further argument, the mortgagee's solicitor, Mr. W. Cheesman, appealed direct to the Court of Appeal.

Everitt, Q.C., and Gaselee, for the appellant.—There were no "special circumstances" here sufficient to justify taxation after payment. There was no pressure by the mortgagee or his solicitor. The only pressure was by the mortgagor's own vendee. As to the payment having been made "under protest," that amounts to nothing. The only other circumstance alleged was the absence of the mortgagor in Australia, but that made no real difference. There was no overcharge. The mortgagor simply objected to every item in the bill without any reason. We exercised no pressure. [KAY, L.J.—Is it not pressure if you take advantage of the exigencies of a client's position?] The circumstances here were not sufficient to authorize taxation after payment; there were no apparent overcharges: In re Wells, 8 Beav. 416, at p. 418; In re Harrison, 10 Beav. 57. In In re Norman, 34 W. R. 313, 16 Q. B. D. 673, there were very gross overcharges. If this taxation is allowed, it will open the door to a great many taxations. [LINDLEY, L.J.—Would that be a great evil?] We submit that it would.

They also referred to In re Browne, 1 De G. M. & G. 322.

McSwinney, for the respondent.—All the old cases are immaterial in face of the decisions in In re Boycott, 34 W. R. 26, 29 Ch. D. 571, and In re Norman, which really throw us back on the Act of Parliament itself. What constitute "special circumstances" within the Act is a matter for the discretion of the judge in each case, and no fixed rule should be laid down: In re Norman. Here the judge has exercised his discretion, and his decision ought not to be interfered with. The special circumstances here were three. First, the mortgagor was at the time the bill was paid, and for many months before, residing in Australia. Secondly, the bills were paid "under protest," and those words actually formed part of the transaction of payment, which shows that neither party considered the transaction finally concluded. Thirdly, there was pressure because the mortgagee's solicitor took advantage of the exigencies of the mortgagor's position arising from the fact that the purchaser was pressing for completion. In In re Browne, 1 De G. M. & G., at p. 331, Knight-Bruce, L.J., said:—"If the question is simply whether the payment is made of the client's free will, does not collateral pressure bear upon it as much as direct pressure?" Lastly, the judge has exercised his discretion, and it cannot be said he has exercised it unfairly. Moreover, what has the solicitor to fear if his charges are fair, as he says?

(a.) Reported by R. H. DEANE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Gaselee, in reply.—The words "under protest" are "nugatory." A solicitor does not like his bill taxed. Even a solicitor has some legal rights.

LINDLEY, L.J.—This is an appeal from Kekewich, J., ordering taxation of a solicitor's bill of costs after payment, partly on the ground that the payment had been made "under protest." The bill of costs was that of the solicitor of the mortgagee, and the payment was made by, or on behalf of, the mortgagor. Section 38 of the Attorneys and Solicitors Act, 1843, therefore applies, and under that section there must be sufficient special circumstances to justify an order for taxation of a bill after payment at the instance of a third party, just in the same way as there must in the case of an application made under section 37 at the instance of the client himself. That was decided in In re Dickson, 5 W. R. 108, 8 De G. M. & G. 655, at p. 660. We must, therefore, see if there were present in this case circumstances such as could justly be called "special." This court has recently considered the principles upon which taxation ought to be ordered after payment in the case of In re Norman, and has succeeded in getting out of the narrow groove into which the Court of Chancery had fallen. In that case it was laid down that each case must depend on its own circumstances, and that it would not be right to substitute any other standard for that fixed by the Legislature. With that view I entirely agree. The special circumstances referred to here are, that the property was in mortgage, the mortgagees had called in their money, the mortgagor had agreed to sell the property, and the time fixed for completion was the 8th of November, 1890. The mortgagee's solicitor knew of the sale and the time fixed for completion. The purchasers were pressing for completion. The bills (there were three of them) were delivered after the time for completion had passed, and when the purchasers were still pressing. The last bill, which was a small one, was not delivered till the 18th of December. The total aggregate amounted to somewhere about £50. They were paid on the 23rd of December, 1890. Mr. Douglas, a solicitor acting for the mortgagor, ran his eye through the bills, and struck off six or eight pounds, and a receipt was given in this form:—"Received this 23rd day of December, 1890, of W. L. Vernon, Esq., the sum of £42, being in discharge of the annexed bills of costs. Paid under protest." That was in the actual handwriting of Bailey, Mr. Cheesman's clerk. Now I am not prepared to say that those words "under protest" mean nothing at all, but I think they only rebut the inference of contentment or satisfaction on the part of the person who paid the bill, and that they amount to saying "if we can tax, we will." They do not amount to reserving the right to tax, but the meaning was to reserve the right (if there was any) so far as it could be reserved. The learned judge below thought that this was a case of "special circumstances." I do not know whether I should have come to the same conclusion, but I am not prepared to differ from him. What weighs with me much is—the entire amount of the bills being so small—the insignificance of the amount involved in this appeal, and I think, therefore, it would be a very bad example to encourage appeals in cases like this, where the amount in question is so trivial.

BOWEN, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. I doubt if I should myself have ordered taxation in this case, but it does not follow that it would be right to overrule the judge in the exercise of the discretion given him by the Act. I concur in the view that it would be a bad thing to encourage appeals like this in small cases. Section 41 says that payment of the bill of costs is not to preclude the judge from ordering taxation "if the special circumstances of the case shall," not "require," but "shall, in the opinion of such court or judge, appear to require the same." If there were no special circumstances which could reasonably appear to require taxation there would be no jurisdiction to order taxation. But it would be difficult to say that in the present case there were no special circumstances which might not reasonably appear to Kekewich, J., to require taxation. I think, therefore, that, in a case like this, we ought not lightly to interfere with the way in which the judge of first instance has exercised his discretion.

KAY, L.J.—I quite agree, and I feel very strongly the impolicy of encouraging appeals in small matters of this kind. Where there is a certain amount of doubt whether the special circumstances alleged are strong enough to justify an order for taxation, it would be bad policy for this court to interfere with the order made by the judge below in the exercise of his discretion under the Act unless a very strong case were made out for doing so.

LINDLEY, L.J.—It is not worth an appeal, that is what it comes to.

ANGUS v. CLIFFORD. (a.)

Misrepresentation—Action of deceit—Fraud—Company—Directors—Prospectus.

An action of deceit will not lie in respect of a negligent, as distinguished from a fraudulent, misrepresentation.

Derry v. Peek, 38 W. R. 33, 14 App. Cas. 337, followed.

The directors of a gold mining company issued a prospectus containing a statement that "full reports of the property have been prepared for the directors by eminent engineers" (naming four). None of the reports in question had in fact been prepared on the instructions of the directors or on their behalf, and, although one of the reports was addressed to the directors, it had been in fact prepared, before the formation of the company, on behalf of a vendor of the property.

At the trial of an action for damages for misrepresentation, brought against the directors by a person who had taken shares in the belief, induced by the prospectus, that the reports had been prepared on behalf of the directors, the judge, in effect, found, (1) that the above statement was untrue in any fair sense of the words used, (2) that none of the defendants gave any satisfactory explanation of the meaning they attributed to the statement, and (3) that they were not justified in allowing the statement to be inserted in the prospectus. There was, however, no finding that the defendants, or any of them, had been guilty of fraud.

Held, by the Court of Appeal, on these findings, and on investigation of the evidence with respect to each defendant separately (which the court held to be necessary in an action of deceit), that fraudulent, as distinguished from negligent, misrepresentation had not been proved, and consequently that the action could not be supported, against any of the defendants.

(a.) Reported by M. J. BLAKE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Decision of Romer, J. (ante, p. 252), reversed.

Quære, whether the misstatement in the prospectus could be held material in the absence of proof that the reports themselves were in fact untrue.

Appeal from the decision of Romer, J., reported ante, p. 252.

The action was brought against Sir Charles Clifford, and Messrs. Meates, Nelson, and Lloyd, the directors of the Valley Gold Co., for damages for fraudulent misrepresentation by reason of a statement contained in a prospectus, issued admittedly by the defendants, on the faith of which the plaintiff had admittedly applied for and taken shares in the company.

The company was registered on October 25, 1886, and the prospectus was issued two days afterwards. The statement chiefly complained of in the prospectus was as follows: "Full reports of the property had been prepared for the directors by the following eminent engineers, Mr. Jackson, Mr. Pearson, Mr. Rodda, and Mr. Del Mar." The reports of the engineers had, in fact, been made before the defendants became directors, and had not been prepared on the instructions of the directors or on their behalf. One of the reports (Del Mar's) had in fact been prepared on the instructions of the agent of the vendors to the company, but it was addressed to the directors.

Each of the four defendants were examined and cross-examined at the trial of the action, and none of them was able to give a satisfactory explanation as to what meaning, in fact, he attributed to the words "prepared for the directors," but they all swore they attached no importance to those words. There was no evidence to show that the reports themselves were, in fact, untrue, beyond the fact that the shares in the company had greatly decreased in value, which fact, however, might be attributable to a want by the company of sufficient capital to work the mines.

Romer, J., at the trial of the action found that the statement in the prospectus that the reports were "prepared for the directors" was untrue in the ordinary fair construction attributable to those words, that the directors gave no satisfactory explanation as to what meaning they attributed to them, and that they were not justified in allowing the words to be inserted in the prospectus; and although he did not find as a fact that the directors or any of them were guilty of fraud or dishonesty in allowing the words to be so inserted, he nevertheless held that the defendants were liable in damages for the misrepresentation.

The defendants appealed.

Rigby, Q.C., Asquith, Q.C., and Grosvenor Woods, for the appellants.—The real question is whether the defendants were guilty of fraud in allowing this statement to appear in the prospectus: Smith v. Chadwick, 32 W. R. 687, 9 App. Cas. 187; Derry v. Peek, 38 W. R. 33, 14 App. Cas. 337; Glazier v. Rills, 38 W. R. 113, 42 Ch. D. 436. There is no proof of fraud on the part of the directors. The expression "for the directors" would cover a great many things; it might mean merely "addressed to the directors," and Del Mar's report was in fact addressed to the directors.

Sir Horace Davey, Q.C., and T. R. Hughes, for the plaintiff, the respondent.—Derry v. Peek only overruled the doctrine that directors issuing a prospectus had a duty towards the public to take reasonable care to see that the statements contained in the prospectus were correct, and that, if they did not do so, they would be liable, even although the statements were not made fraudulently; but it does not overrule the doctrine (laid down in many previous cases) that a person making a statement with a view to induce another to act on it must be taken to represent that he has formed a belief on the subject-matter of the statement, and if he has in fact formed no belief, that he is liable in an action for deceit just as much as if knew the statement to be false, for he is in fact thereby committing a fraud; see the remarks of Lord Selborne, L.C., at the beginning of his judgment in Smith v. Chadwick, of Lord Bramwell in Derry v. Peek, 38 W. R., at p. 35, 14 App. Cas., at p. 350, and of Lord Herschell in the same case, 38 W. R., at pp. 38, 42, 14 App. Cas., at pp. 361, 374. The evidence here shows that the directors adopted this statement in the prospectus as to the reports, recklessly without caring whether it was true or false. [LINDLEY, L.J.—The directors may not have had present to their minds the meaning attributable to the words "for the directors."] It is just possible the statement might be ambiguous as to Del Mar's report, but the statement applies to all the reports and no meaning other than the natural meaning of the words used, can be suggested with respect to the other three reports. Even in the case of a director there must be some limit to his simplicity. The person who drafted the prospectus was not called to give evidence by the defendants. The absence of any reasonable ground for belief is evidence of the absence of any belief. Then as to the materiality of the statement; it put the plaintiff off inquiry as to the nature of the property; the shares are now practically unsaleable. If the directors had formed no belief on the subject-matter of the statement, then there is a material misstatement.

Arnison v. Smith, 37 W. R. 739, 41 Ch. D. 348, and Bishop v. Balkis Consolidated Co., ante, p. 99, 25 Q. B. D. 512, were also referred to.

Rigby, Q.C., in reply.—Although for purposes of contract a person must be held to intend the natural consequences of the language he has used, yet that doctrine is not applicable when it is sought to make him liable, not on contract, but for deceit. The remarks of Lord Selborne in Smith v. Chadwick, that "actual fraud . . . is to be judged of by the nature of the representations made considered with reference to the object for which they were made . . . and the intention which the law justly imputes to every man to produce those consequences which are the natural result of his acts," cannot, since the decision in Derry v. Peek, be held applicable to an action for deceit.

Cur. adv. vult.

April 18.—LINDLEY, L.J.—No question arises on this appeal as to several matters which are very often in controversy in cases of this description. For example, it is conceded that the plaintiff applied to the company for his shares and got them direct from the company; again, it is conceded that the four directors named are responsible for the issue of the prospectus; neither is there any controversy that the plaintiff applied for, and took, his shares on the faith of the prospectus.

The Valley Gold Co. was registered on the 25th of October, 1886, and the prospectus was issued on the 27th of October, two days after the registration of the company. Certain reports are referred to in the prospectus, and the evidence shows that these reports were made at various dates. Pearson's report was made as early as 1884, and was made for, and addressed to, the vendors of this gold mine, and not to the Valley Gold Co., or to its directors. Jackson's and Rodda's reports were made respectively on the 4th and 16th of January, 1886. The two most important reports, however, were made by Del Mar, and were dated respectively the 14th and 25th of August, 1886, and these two were addressed to the directors.

The statement, contained in the prospectus, which is relied upon as entitling the plaintiff to relief is as follows: "Valley Gold Co. This company has been formed to purchase and develop a gold property situated in San Barnardino, County California"; it then describes the nature of the property, and proceeds as follows: "Full reports of the property have been prepared for the directors by the following eminent engineers, Mr. Jackson, Mr. Pearson, Mr. Rodda, and Mr. Del Mar. These gentlemen have personally inspected the property, and Mr. Del Mar has advised the board as to the means to be adopted for working and developing the same to the best advantage. These reports have convinced the directors that the estate is a rich one, and they have no hesitation in recommending the shares to the public as a genuine investment."

Now the plaintiff says that he was induced to buy shares in this company upon the faith of the statement (amongst others) that, "full reports of the property have been prepared for the directors"; that that statement was untrue; and that he is entitled to relief upon the ground that these directors issued this prospectus containing that untrue statement, and which they knew to be untrue. The plaintiff therefore puts it that he is entitled to relief on the ground of fraud on the part of those gentlemen.

Now Romer, J., in his judgment, curiously enough, does not find, as a fact, that these directors, or any of them, were guilty of fraud. His judgment proceeds upon the following footing:—First of all, he comes to the conclusion that the words "prepared for the directors," upon the true construction of the clause, mean prepared for the directors in the sense that they were the persons employing the engineers to make the reports, and that in that sense the statement is untrue. Then he comes to the conclusion that that statement, being untrue, was material; and then he rather appears to have inferred from that, and to have proceeded upon the theory, that that alone would be enough to make these directors liable, without addressing his mind to the further question whether these gentlemen would be liable supposing that they did make this untrue statement, but made it carelessly as distinguished from fraudulently. His judgment, when carefully read, shows upon the face of it, I think, that his mind was not addressed to that particular point, which was the point mainly argued before us. His judgment seems to me quite consistent with his having proceeded upon the view that the case of Derry v. Peek, as it was decided in the Court of Appeal, was law; whereas, as we all know, the decision of the Court of Appeal was reversed by the House of Lords. I have spoken to the learned judge about it, and the inference which I draw from his judgment is, I think, warranted by the fact that he says that his attention was drawn to the other points of the case rather than to this. That explains why there is no distinct finding of fraud on the part of these directors. But it is important to bear in mind that the judge, who saw these directors as witnesses and heard their evidence, has not found them, in terms, guilty of fraud. That raises a question of very considerable importance. Before Derry v. Peek was reversed in the House of Lords I should have thought there would have been no doubt, and could have been no doubt, that this action might have been supported, and would have been supported, upon the evidence adduced in the course of these proceedings. But the decision of the Court of Appeal in Derry v. Peek having been reversed by the House of Lords, it becomes important to see what the final decision in Derry v. Peek is.

Speaking of Derry v. Peek broadly, I take it that it has finally settled the controversy (which was well known to have given rise to very considerable difference of opinion) as to whether an action for damages for negligent misrepresentation, as distinguished from fraudulent misrepresentation, could be maintained. There was considerable authority to the effect that it could, and there was considerable authority to the effect that it could not; and as I understand Derry v. Peek, it settles the question in this way—viz., that an action of deceit for a negligent, as distinguished from a fraudulent, misrepresentation cannot be supported. I think it is perfectly impossible to read the judgments which were delivered by the lords in that case—especially Lord Herschell's, to which I will allude presently—without seeing that that is the broad proposition of law which Derry v. Peek has finally settled.

That being the case, it becomes necessary, of course, to examine the evidence and see whether this misstatement (for misstatement it obviously was) is to be regarded as fraudulent, or is to be regarded as only negligent. If the conclusion is that this was a case of negligence, as distinguished from fraud, the action will not lie. If the evidence is that there was a fraudulent, as distinguished from a negligent, misrepresentation the action will lie.

Now the case put forward on behalf of the plaintiff is based upon a passage in the judgment of Lord Herschell in Derry v. Peek; and I will, therefore, read those parts of that judgment which appear to me to contain the pith of the decision. Lord Herschell says, 38 W. R., at p. 42, 14 App. Cas., at p. 374:—"I think the authorities establish the following propositions:—First, in order to sustain an action of deceit there must be proof of fraud, and nothing short of that will suffice. Secondly, fraud is proved when it is shown that a false representation has been made (1) knowingly, or (2) without belief in its truth, or (3) recklessly, careless whether it be true or false. Although I have treated the second and third as distinct cases, I think the third is but an instance of the second; for one who makes a statement under such circumstances can have no real belief in the truth of what he states. To prevent a false statement being fraudulent there must, I think, always be an honest belief in its truth, and this probably covers the whole ground, for one who knowingly alleges that which is false has obviously no such honest belief. Thirdly, if fraud be proved, the motive of the person guilty of it is immaterial. It matters not that there was no intention to cheat or injure the person to whom the statement was made."

The plaintiff's counsel naturally relied upon that passage, and particularly upon that part of it which says that fraud is proved—not merely that there is evidence of it, but that it is proved—when it is shown that a false representation has been made knowingly, or without belief in its truth. The plaintiff says that the defendants in this case made this false statement knowingly; that they knew what the facts were; and that they made it without any belief in its truth. If the above passage were the whole of the judgment of Lord Herschell I do not think it would be easy to answer that argument. But one must look a little further and see what Lord Herschell says in other parts of his judgment. The following passage (38 W. R., at p. 42, 14 App. Cas., at p. 375), to my mind, qualifies in a most material manner the former statement:—"In my opinion, making a false statement through want of care falls far short of, and is a very different thing from, fraud, and the same may be said of a false representation honestly believed, though on insufficient grounds." Therefore, as I understand it, a false statement may be made, but made without the matter being present to the mind of the person making it, and made carelessly; and if that be the fact, that is not fraud, but carelessness, for which an action of deceit will not lie. Then, again, the learned lord, pursuing the same line of thought, says, 38 W. R., at p. 43, 14 App. Cas., at p. 376: "I think there is much to be said for the view that this moral duty" (that is, to be vigilant in preparing these prospectuses, and in stating no more than is believed to be true) "ought to some extent to be converted into a legal obligation, and that the want of reasonable care to see that statements made under such circumstances are true, should be made an actionable wrong. But this is not a matter fit for discussion on the present occasion. If it is to be done the Legislature must intervene and expressly give a right of action in respect of such a departure from duty. It ought not, I think, be done by straining the law, and holding that to be fraudulent which the tribunal feels cannot properly be so described. I think mischief is likely to result from blurring the distinction between carelessness and fraud, and equally holding a man fraudulent whether his acts can or cannot justly be so designated."

Now my observation upon these latter passages of the judgment is, that what was said, in the passage which I first read, about proof of fraud, must be taken as subject to this, that the matter to be inquired into is fraud or carelessness. If it is fraud, it is actionable; if it be not fraud, but merely carelessness, it is not actionable. The remarks about knowledge—knowingly making a statement and making a statement without believing its truth—are based upon the supposition that the matter was really before the mind of the person making the statement; and if the evidence really is that the person making the statement never really intended to mislead, that he did not see or dream that the effect of what he was saying could mislead, and that the particular part complained of, of what he was saying was not present to his mind at all, then that, in my opinion, is proof of carelessness rather than of fraud.

These directors read this prospectus, that is plain enough. I do not gather that any point is made with reference to that part of the prospectus which states that "these reports have convinced the directors that the estate is a rich one." There is no evidence to show that the reports of these engineers are false in fact. The evidence, I think, is simply this, that the gold mine has not been worked, and that the shares are now worth very much less than the plaintiff gave for them—not an uncommon result. When we look at the balance-sheet that was handed up, I think we can see the reason of that. So much was paid by way of purchase-money, that capital enough to work the mine could not be got, and in fact the mine has not yet been worked. Whether it ever will, I do not know; but in the meantime the shares have gone down. I merely mention this as showing that I do not think any reliance was really placed on that part of the prospectus which says that the reports convinced the directors of the goodness of this speculation. They were convinced of it.

One must look at the evidence, therefore, to see whether the statement that these reports had been "prepared for the directors" was made by them fraudulently or carelessly. In order to investigate that question, the four directors cannot be all lumped together. We must take each of them separately, and see what each of them said in his evidence about it. Without reading the evidence at any length, it appears to me that as Romer, J., who saw each of them as witnesses, has not found them guilty of fraud, it would not be right for us to find them guilty of fraud. The conclusion at which I have arrived, and the inference I have drawn from their evidence, is this, that they really did not put that statement into the prospectus with the idea that it was likely to mislead; that it was a blundering statement; that their attention never was called to it—I mean specifically called to it. It was not that they shut their eyes and did not care whether it was true or false, but they did not see the effect of what they were saying, or the construction which would be put upon it, when those words "for the directors" were passed by them. If those words had been out, I doubt very much whether it would have made any difference. I can easily understand that a man might read this prospectus and not observe the importance of those words. The careless reader would be just as likely to overlook them, as to see the force of them and give his mind to them. If that is the result, if they passed them over without seeing that they were of any importance at all, that appears to me to be carelessness, and not fraud within the legal definition of fraud.

As regards the evidence, one must, as I have said, take the case of each of them separately. As to Mr. Nelson, he says, in his evidence, that he attached no importance to it. I believe him. I believe it because, as I have said before, a man might very well read this prospectus, and be convinced by the reports if he trusted the men who made the reports, and not see the importance of the words "for the directors," on which the plaintiff has fastened in order to throw the responsibility on the directors. As regards Mr. Meates, some part of his evidence is unsatisfactory, and in fact the learned judge said so. But Meates also says that he did not consider the meaning of the passage very materially; and my impression is that, notwithstanding the unsatisfactory answers given by him to some of the questions put to him, he never gave his attention to the passage. I do not think it is right to say he wilfully shut his eyes; I do not think he observed it any more than Nelson did. Mr. Lloyd says, as I understand his evidence, that he read "prepared for" as equivalent to "adopted by," that that was the view he took of it. He did not attach any importance to the particular phrase "prepared for." The real truth was that the reports were laid before the directors; there is some evidence that one of them gave some directions, and that Del Mar's report might have been said to have been prepared for the directors, but it is utterly impossible to say that, of Pearson's, Jackson's, or Rhodda's, therefore I pass that by. But Lloyd did not see that that expression could mislead, and never dreamed that it might mislead. Then there was the defendant Sir Charles Clifford. His evidence, I should think, would show that he was not particularly clear headed. I do not know whether he is an old or a young man, or what age he is; I have not had the advantage of seeing him. But he also says that he attached no importance to these words. His evidence convinces me that there was not the slightest intention on his part to deceive, he never dreamt of such a thing.

The conclusion at which I have arrived is that none of these directors saw the importance of that phrase at all; their attention was never directed to it. It is not that they adopted the prospectus, saying, "I do not care what you put in it; put in what you like"; that would be recklessness. There was no moral obliquity in what they did; it was pure blundering, pure carelessness; and, that being the case, it appears to me that, after Derry v. Peek, this action cannot be sustained. It is a case of negligent, as distinguished from fraudulent, conduct.

That entitles the defendants to our judgment. But as regards costs the matter is rather different. I am bound to say I think that this was grossly careless, and I think it was such a statement as to invite an action, and therefore I think that the defendants a considerable amount of importance will be attached, is that, by the special Act of Parliament obtained, the company has the right to use steam or mechanical motive power instead of horses"; in fact, however, the consent of the Board of Trade had not then been obtained, but Lord Bramwell says, 38 W. R., at p. 35, 14 App. Cas., at p. 349, that the learned judge in the court of first instance in that case "held as I do," that the directors or the persons who issued that prospectus "thought that the company had the right, as put in the prospectus, to use steam." And again, in another of the speeches delivered in that case it was stated that the learned judge in the court of first instance had found that the statement had been honestly made, believing it to be true, and that the Court of Appeal, though not differing from that conclusion, had held that nevertheless it must be treated as fraudulent because the directors had no reasonable ground for that belief. The question of whether a statement honestly made, and believed to be true, could nevertheless be treated as fraudulent because those who made it had no reasonable ground for the belief which they said they had, was the main question discussed by the noble lords in the House of Lords. I will not read again those passages which have been read by Lindley, L.J., but I wish also to observe this. That case of Derry v. Peek was argued in the House of Lords some time before the judgment of the Court of Appeal in Arnison v. Smith was delivered, and the Lord Chancellor, who was one of the noble lords before whom Derry v. Peek was argued, was also one of the judges in the case of Arnison v. Smith, and he, after having heard the arguments in Derry v. Peek, made this observation in Arnison v. Smith, 41 Ch. D., at p. 368: "A deliberate statement was made, and the defendants cannot be heard to say that they did not know the popular meaning of the words they used; if they had said 'We do not know what was in the prospectus and hastily put our names to it without reading it,' the case would be open to different considerations." Therefore, it was quite present to his lordship's mind, and he seems to have quite concurred with Lord Herschell's speech upon the general doctrine, that making a false statement by mere carelessness does not necessarily amount to fraud. The carelessness must come up to that which was described in Lord Herschell's speech, and in many other judgments before, as recklessness, that is, according to the definition given in this speech, an indifference in the mind of the man who makes the statement whether the statement was true or false, without knowing whether it was true or false, and without caring. Lord Halsbury also, in his speech in the House of Lords in Derry v. Peek, 38 W. R., at p. 34, 14 App. Cas., at p. 343, says the same: "I think such a statement, if wilfully made with a consciousness of its inaccuracy, would give rise to an action for deceit provided that damage had been sustained if a person had acted upon a belief induced by such a prospectus."

Now the real question in this case is one which has involved the Court of Appeal—at least, speaking for myself, has involved me—in very considerable difficulty indeed. The learned judge before whom this case was tried in the court below does not seem to have had the speeches of the learned lords in Derry v. Peek brought to his attention very carefully, if, indeed, at all, when this question was argued. The distinction between a statement which was not true made carelessly and a statement which was not true made fraudulently does not seem to have been pressed upon him. I have read his judgment more than once with attention, and I do not find that that distinction was present to the mind of the learned judge when he gave the judgment in the present case. There is no finding, as has been pointed out, that this statement, if untrue, was made fraudulently. There is no distinct finding of that kind. There is no finding that in making the statement the directors acted dishonestly. There is no finding, as it is termed in Lord Halsbury's speech in the House of Lords, of the existence of the mens rea in all or some of these defendants. Therefore the findings of the learned judge certainly do not amount to such a decision as would justify the maintenance of the judgment against them for deceit according to the doctrine laid down in Derry v. Peek.

Then, of course, that puts this court in this very great difficulty. The learned judge has not in so many words found fraud, but he has found they were liable, and that may or may not have involved a finding that they had acted fraudulently. Then, again, that depends on what, in the judgment of the learned judge, amounted to fraud in such a case; and if he adopted, what is now overruled, the decision of the Court of Appeal in Peek v. Derry, he might consider it to be laid down that the making of a statement of this kind, believing it to be true, although there was no reasonable ground for such belief, would amount to fraud; whereas that was a doctrine which was unhesitatingly overruled in the House of Lords' decision in that very case. Accordingly we are driven, not having the witnesses before us, to go through the evidence and try to make out if we can whether this statement was or was not dishonestly made by the defendants. I cannot help saying that it impressed my mind very much that the statement, taken in the sense in which it would be read by a person who read the prospectus with care for the purpose of determining whether he should take shares in the company or not, would or might to that person have the meaning that the directors of this company had intended these reports to be made for their own information, they being in the position of the purchasers of the property in question, which was a mine. I think that is quite possible and probable. I think most likely that any careful intending shareholder reading this prospectus would attribute that meaning to these words, and if that were so, no doubt that is a very different thing from what was actually the fact—namely, that the reports had been made before any directors were consulted at all, and had been made on the instruction not of any director, but of the agents in England of the vendors of the mine—in short, that the reports had been made for or on behalf of the vendors rather than for or on behalf of the purchasers. That is, unquestionably, a serious thing, and I agree that that should, or probably would, be the primâ facie meaning of those words if read by a careful man who was considering whether he should take shares in the company or not.

But then I should think it quite possible, and I cannot find anything in this evidence which convinces me to the contrary, that the persons who made this statement either did not attribute that meaning to the words or did not clearly see that an intending shareholder who read that prospectus would attribute that meaning to them. I quite believe, and I think it is the fair result of the evidence, that the importance of the words was not present to the mind of any one of these directors. You may say that it is the grossest possible carelessness that that should be so. I quite agree; I think it is. I think they ought to have examined the words very carefully indeed, and that they were guilty of very gross negligence in allowing such words to go forth to the public when the fact was not literally as described by those words. But I am not convinced that we ought to say upon such evidence as was given in this case that any one of these directors in issuing that prospectus to the public had a dishonest purpose—that his mind was in the attitude or condition of what is described as mens rea, in short, that he was guilty of fraud; and although it should, or ought to be, involved in the finding of the learned judge in the court below that these defendants were guilty of fraud, we are not aware of the mode at which he arrived at that, and, looking at the evidence after canvassing it with considerable care, I am not satisfied that this evidence does prove such a condition of mental dishonesty on the part of the defendants as would be necessary to support an action of deceit against them according to the decision in Derry v. Peek.

On this, the main point of the case, I have very imperfectly expressed my own view, as I say, rather out of respect to the learned judge than because I have anything material to add to what the other members of the Court of Appeal have said in this case. But I am also struck, and more forcibly I think than the other members of the Court of Appeal, with the question of materiality. There is no proof whatever that the reports mentioned in this prospectus are, or that any one of them is untrue, or exaggerated or inaccurate in any respect. The statement of claim alleges that the estimates formed by one of the persons who made the reports, Del Mar, were grossly exaggerated, and I think that is the only statement made in the statement of claim as to the untruth of these reports. But, assuming it to be sufficiently raised by the statement of claim, there is no proof, and no attempt at proof, that the reports were in fact untrue. It seems to me that it is impossible for any court to assume anything to assist a plaintiff to make out his case of fraud. Every step, every material step in the evidence which makes out a case of fraud, it is incumbent on the plaintiff who alleges fraud to prove by sufficient evidence. If it is a necessary part of his case to make out that the reports were untrue, then all I can say is, there is not only no proof of that, but there is no evidence of it. It was said, "Oh, yes, but there is some evidence of it, because if the reports had been true, if the mine had been such a rich one, the probability is the shares would not have gone down." But, as Lindley, L.J., has said, we have had the balance-sheet handed up to us, and it was quite plain from the balance-sheet that there was another and very sufficient reason why the shares had depreciated without assuming the reports to be untrue, for it appears quite clearly from that balance-sheet that, after paying out of the capital which was raised the price which had to be paid for the mine, and after paying other incidental expenses, there was not left—and there is evidence to assist this part of the case—sufficient capital properly to develop and work the mine; and that would by itself be, and probably was, a sufficient reason, and for anything I know, and as far as appears from the evidence, was the only reason, why the mine was not properly developed and the shares considerably depreciated.

Now, I should like to put, in order to illustrate my own view of this case, what seems to me a parallel case. Supposing a person was selling a real estate, and he represented that he had been assured by A. B. (I assume A. B. to be a well-known mining engineer, a man whose assurance would carry very great weight) that there existed beneath that estate a particular seam of coal, which was known in the neighbourhood, and was of great value; and it turned out afterwards that he had not had any such assurance from that individual at all, but that the mine was there. Could an action of deceit be maintained in that case? Could the plaintiff come into court and say, "I admit the mine is there; I admit the estate is quite as valuable as it was represented to be, but I was told that it was said by A. B. that the mine was there, and I relied very much on that, and A. B. did not say it." Well, I will not give any definite opinion on the subject, but it seems to my mind that the fact that the mine did exist would be a thing that ought to be very carefully considered in determining whether the statement that A. B. had given that assurance was material or not for the purpose of an action of deceit. You may easily put many cases of the same kind. I will content myself with that as an illustration of what I mean. Now, if the falsehood or exaggeration of these reports is not made out at all, as it certainly is not made out here, I cannot see that this statement would necessarily be an extremely material one. To treat this case in the way I have just treated the case I put by way of illustration—suppose the plaintiff had come here and said, "I admit that all these reports are perfectly true, that they are not in any degree exaggerated; there is nothing in them of which I could at all complain, but I say they were not made for the directors; they were made for somebody else." Could he succeed in an action of deceit? I doubt it very much, and, therefore, I am not satisfied that in this case the statement is proved to be sufficiently material. Again, that goes to another point on which I do not profess to give any decided opinion. It is well established, as Lord Halsbury says in Derry v. Peek, that in dealing with actions of this character fraud without damage, or damage without fraud, does not give rise to such an action, and certainly the considerations I last alluded to must have some weight in determining whether this misstatement has caused damage. I can quite conceive it might, by way of argument, be made a part of the case. It might be said, "True, I do not prove these reports to be false—I cannot ask that it should be assumed in my favour that they are false; but I took my shares in this company on the faith of this statement that they were made for the directors; damage has resulted to me, perhaps not from the falsehood of the reports, but I should not have taken the shares at all if it had not been for this statement, and, having taken the shares, now those shares have gone down in value, and damage has resulted to me, and, therefore, I have a right to maintain an action of deceit."

I am not quite convinced in my own mind at present, and I will not give any decided opinion upon it, that this is a damage which results directly from the false statement. If the reports were true, and the only falsehood, or the only inaccuracy of the statement, was that they were made for the directors instead of being made for the promoters, for whom they were actually made, I am not quite sure that that damage would result sufficiently from the false statement to enable the plaintiff to maintain his action of deceit. However, as I say, I merely express this as a doubt existing in my mind, I do not wish to give any decided opinion upon it.

For the reasons I have given, I agree entirely with the other Lords Justices, and I also entirely agree on the question of costs. It seems to me that although fraud is not made out to our satisfaction, there was an amount of carelessness so gross as almost to invite an action of this kind, and although the defendants have escaped, they have escaped in such a way that we ought not to say they are entitled to have any of their costs of this action.

SALOMONS v. KNIGHT. (a.)

Libel—Interlocutory injunction to restrain publication—Annoyance—Proof of immediate injury.

An interlocutory injunction will not be granted to restrain the publication of statements not shown to be likely to cause immediate injury to the person or property of the party seeking the injunction, notwithstanding that such statements are calculated to cause him extreme annoyance; that they appear primâ facie to be wholly unjustifiable; that, unless justified, they are grossly libellous; and that the plaintiff had previously obtained a verdict for £1,000 damages (which had not been paid) for the publication by the defendant of similar, or practically identical, statements.

Appeal from North, J.

It appeared that Mr. Salomons, the plaintiff, had in June, 1883, contracted to purchase the interest of Mr. Knight, the defendant, in some property in the City for £4,000. Some difficulty arose as to the defendant's title, and subsequently there was a dispute as to the amount of the balance due to the defendant, and the matters in difference were referred to arbitration. The award found that a small balance of £368 15s. was due to the defendant (who had claimed a very much larger sum), and that on payment thereof the contract should be completed. That was done, and the property was conveyed to the plaintiff. The defendant, as it was alleged, then commenced to threaten, abuse, and annoy the plaintiff, and accused him of perjury and fraudulent conduct in regard to the arbitration. In the result there was a further arbitration, and the umpire found in favour of the plaintiff, and that no damages ought to be paid to the defendant, who had claimed a very large sum as such. The defendant, however, continued to circulate statements about the plaintiff, referring to his alleged "criminal acts," "villainy," "fraud," and so forth. In one circular the defendant used the expression "I repeat the charges of fraud." In another, headed "A Public Challenge," he charged the plaintiff with "deliberate and determined fraud." Another spoke of "your plausible and persistent false swearing."

Several manifestoes, notices, or circulars containing statements of this kind having been sent or addressed to the plaintiff, he brought an action for libel against the defendant, and obtained a verdict and judgment for £1,000 damages (which it was stated had never been paid), a counter-claim by the defendant being at the same time dismissed with costs. The defendant subsequently sent a letter containing a résumé of his statements to the chairman of a company of which the plaintiff was a deputy chairman, and expressing his intention to circulate his "manifesto" "unless my just rights are satisfied, and my just demands complied with."

In consequence of that expression of intention by the defendant the plaintiff applied for an interlocutory injunction to restrain the publication of the statements.

North, J., refused to grant an interlocutory injunction, on the ground that the statements were of such a character that no one would pay any attention to them, and that there was no probability of injury accruing to the plaintiff from their circulation.

The plaintiff appealed.

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., and Frank Watson, for the appellant.—The statements are grossly libellous, and can admit of no justification under the circumstances. They reflect injuriously on the plaintiff's character, and ought to be restrained by interlocutory injunction. [BOWEN, L.J.—What immediate injury do you allege? KAY, L.J.—How can you get an interlocutory injunction in such a case after the decision in Bonnard v. Perryman, ante, p. 435? LINDLEY, L.J.—No sensible man who read this stuff would pay the slightest attention to it.] There is no difficulty in exercising the jurisdiction here, as there is no reasonable probability that any plea of justification can be put forward, especially in view of the fact that the appellant has already obtained a verdict for £1,000 in respect of the circulation of substantially the same statements.

John Black, for the defendant, was not called upon.

LINDLEY, L.J.—The judgment of North, J., in this case is very short, and I will read it. He says:—"In this case I see no reason to interfere by way of interlocutory injunction. I have not heard the defendant, and therefore I do not form any opinion about his case, and I will not say more than this, that, after reading the documents that have been published by the defendant, they seem to be, so far as I can form an opinion without hearing him, unjustifiable to a degree; but then, on the other hand, I do not find anything which shows the slightest suggestion by any person, the plaintiff or any other person, that anyone who saw these documents would pay the slightest attention to them, or attach the slightest weight to them. Under those circumstances it is open to the plaintiff, if the charges are such as he says, and he says he cannot recover pecuniary damages from the defendant, to take proceedings by indictment against the defendant; but I do not see any such immediate and pressing injury to person or to property threatened by the defendant's proceedings as to make it desirable or right that I, sitting in the Chancery Division, should interfere to stop by interlocutory injunction the steps the defendant has thought proper to take."

Now I agree with those observations. So far as I can judge the conduct of the defendant is entirely without justification and without excuse, and if he does not take care he will find himself in gaol, I have no doubt. But I agree with North, J., and I think our decision is perfectly consistent with what we said yesterday (in Bonnard v. Perryman)—there is no reason whatever to suppose that there is any injury being done to the plaintiff, either in person or in property. For these reasons I think an interlocutory injunction ought not to be granted, not because we have the slightest sympathy with the defendant, or think his conduct justifiable, but because of the reasons we have given.

BOWEN, and KAY, L.JJ., concurred.

Appeal dismissed.

In re AN ARBITRATION BETWEEN KNIGHT AND THE TABERNACLE PERMANENT BUILDING SOCIETY. (a.)

Building society—Arbitration—Power to direct arbitrators to state a case—Building Societies Act, 1874 (37 & 38 Vict. c. 42), s. 36—Arbitration Act, 1889 (52 & 53 Vict. c. 49), ss. 19, 24.

By section 36 of the Building Societies Act, 1874, the decision of arbitrators appointed under the Act is to be final, but power is given to them, at the request of either party, to state a special case for the opinion of the court on any question of law.

By section 19 of the Arbitration Act, 1889, power is given to the court to direct arbitrators to state a case on any question of law arising in the course of the reference; and, by section 24, the provisions of the Act are made applicable to all arbitrations under any Act passed before the Act, "except in so far as this Act is inconsistent with the Act regulating the arbitration."

Held (reversing the decision of the Queen's Bench Division), that the two Acts are not inconsistent, and that there is, therefore, power under section 19 of the Arbitration Act, 1889, to order arbitrators appointed under the Building Societies Act, 1874, to state a special case for the opinion of the court on a question of law.

Appeal from a decision of A. L. Smith, J., in chambers, affirming the order of a master which directed arbitrators appointed under the Building Societies Act, 1874, for the determination of a dispute, to state a case for the opinion of the court.

A dispute having arisen between Knight and the appellant society (a building society subject to the Act of 1874), of which he was a member, a reference was made to arbitration, pursuant to rule 26 of the society, which was as follows:—"In case of disputes arising between the society and any members thereof, or the legal representatives of any member, or other persons claiming through or under the rules, reference shall be made to arbitration pursuant to 37 & 38 Vict. c. 42." The rule went on to provide for the method of appointing the arbitrators, and directed that their decision should be "final and binding on all parties."

During the progress of the arbitration Knight applied to the arbitrators to state a special case for the opinion of the court upon a question of law. The arbitrators declined, and at the close of the reference made their award. Knight then obtained the order from which the society now appealed.

The Building Societies Act, 1874, provides, by section 34, for the election of arbitrators in the manner the rules of the society provide, or, if there be no such provision, then in the manner provided by that section, "and whatever award shall be made by the arbitrators, or the major part of them, according to the true purport and meaning of the rules of the society, shall determine the dispute."

Section 36 enacts that "every determination by arbitrators, or by the court, or by the registrar under this Act of a dispute, shall be binding and conclusive on all parties, and shall be final to all intents and purposes, and shall not be subject to appeal, and shall not be removed or removable into any court of law, or restrained or restrainable by the injunction of any court of equity; provided always, that the arbitrators, or the registrar, or the court, as the case may be, may, at the request of either party, state a case for the opinion of the Supreme Court of Judicature on any question of law."

(a.) Reported by T. R. COLQUHOUN DILL and A. P. PERCEVAL KEEP, Esqs., Barristers-at-Law.

The Arbitration Act, 1889, enacts as follows:—Section 19.—"Any referee, arbitrator, or umpire may at any stage of the proceedings under a reference, and shall, if so directed by the court or a judge, state in the form of a special case for the opinion of the court any question of law arising in the course of the reference."

Section 24.—"This Act shall apply to every arbitration under any Act passed before or after the commencement of this Act as if the arbitration were pursuant to a submission, except in so far as this Act is inconsistent with the Act regulating the arbitration or with any rules or procedure authorized or recognized by that Act."

It was assumed for the purposes of this case that a point of law had arisen in the course of the reference. The main question argued was whether the provision of section 19 of the Arbitration Act was inconsistent with section 36 of the Building Societies Act, "the Act regulating the arbitration," and therefore, by virtue of section 24 of the Arbitration Act, not applicable to arbitrations under the Building Societies Act.

Macoun, for the appellant society.

Fillan, for the respondent Knight.

WILLS, J.—This case raises a question of some importance, but I think that when it is thoroughly argued it is free from doubt. I have little doubt that if the case could have had the full argument in chambers which it has had here the learned judge would have come to the same conclusion as we have arrived at. The powers of arbitrators under the Building Societies Act, 1874, are dealt with in section 36 of that Act; they are to have complete jurisdiction over the subject-matter of the reference beyond the control of any court unless they choose to state a special case. I am quite aware that there is no verbal inconsistency between the Arbitration Act and that section, but it is clear to anyone who knows what these societies and their arbitrations, are that the intention of the Legislature was to provide an inexpensive tribunal for the settlement of disputes, with the decision of which the parties were to be satisfied; the tribunal is the arbitrators and their decision is to be final—the only exceptions being cases in which they themselves wish to have the opinion of the court. Then, if we turn to the Act of 1889, it appears that section 19 is sufficient to enable the court to interfere in the way desired in this case. But then there is section 24. [His lordship read the section.] Now, in my opinion, the substance of section 36 of the Act of 1874 being that the only case in which this court is to have jurisdiction is where its interference is invoked by the arbitrators themselves, to say that they "shall" state a case is inconsistent with that section. I am therefore of opinion that the Act of 1889 does not apply to these arbitrations, and that the appeal must be allowed.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, J.—I am of the same opinion. I will only add a few words. It was argued by Mr. Fillan that section 19 of the Act of 1889 is not inconsistent with the provisions as to arbitration contained in sections 34-36 of the Act of 1874. I think it is entirely inconsistent. In the cases of Hack v. London Provident Society, 31 W. R. 392, 23 Ch. D. 103, and Municipal Building Society v. Kent, 32 W. R. 681, 9 App. Cas. 260, the question was raised whether this Act gave to the statutory tribunal created by it a jurisdiction which excluded the jurisdiction of the ordinary courts, and it was held that that was so. It was argued in those cases, as it was here, that it was unlikely that the Legislature intended to give to such tribunals power to finally

The husband's covenant does not bind the property, for by section 2 of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, the wife alone is entitled to it, and this is not modified by section 19; In re Queade's Trusts, 33 W. Holland King, for the children.—The wife's covenant is binding: Flower v. Buller, 28 W. R. 948, 15 Ch. D. 665; In re Clarke, 36 W. R. 293, 36 Ch. D. 348. The Act of 1855 deals with the infant, not the property of the infant: Seaton v. Seaton, 36 W. R. 865, 13 App. Cas. 61; Tailby v. Official Receiver, 37 W. R. 513, 13 App. Cas. 523.

NORTH, J.—In my opinion this property is bound by the wife's covenant, and is within the words of the Infants' Settlement Act, an Act passed in order to enable infants to make settlements as valid as those of adults, and in which it is clearly usual to bind all after-acquired property. In general, if a person has property which it is not desired to settle, that property is expressly mentioned.

Now the words of the Act, "it shall be lawful for any infant upon or in contemplation of his or her marriage with the sanction of the Court of Chancery to make a valid and binding settlement or contract for a settlement of all or any part of his or her property over which he or she has any power of appointment, whether real or personal, and whether in possession, reversion, remainder, or expectancy," sweep in all after-acquired property, and these words are large.

It is said that the property in question is missed, being property to which, at the time of the settlement, the infant had no title, and which she could only have a mere hope of obtaining, so that it could not be held to be her property at all at the time of the settlement within the meaning of the Act. This is not accurate, for the Act is not addressed to property only, but covers anything over which the infant has a power of appointment, and, therefore, expressly includes what is not the infant's property. Again, it is said it does not come within the terms of the Act. I do not agree with this, as I consider the reference to "property in expectancy" quite sufficient. The effect given to "expectancy" in the judgment of Kay, J., in In re Parsons confirms this. My decision is in accordance with the usual custom of settlements, and I decline to say that the property is not within the covenant. With regard to the second point, whether the property is bound by the husband's covenant, while I think section 19 of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, does apply to settlements made after the passing of that Act, it is not now necessary to express an opinion.

JONES v. FOLEY. (a.)

Landlord and tenant—Ejectment order by magistrates—Entry by landlord at the expiration of tenancy—Trespass—1 & 2 Vict. c. 72.

A landlord's common law right of entry is not affected by an ejectment order obtained from justices; so that, in the absence of force, a landlord who enters and pulls down a house at the end of a term, after an ejectment order has been obtained, but before it comes into operation, is not guilty of trespass.

This was an appeal from a county court by the defendant in an action for trespass.

The plaintiff was tenant to the defendant, and the action was brought to recover damage for trespass and injury to the plaintiff's furniture. The plaintiff had refused to leave the premises which he was occupying after the term of his tenancy had expired, and the defendant had obtained an ejectment order from justices under 1 & 2 Vict. c. 72. Before the ejectment order came into force the defendant, who had made a contract for that purpose, permitted his builder to enter upon the premises and pull down the house. In doing so the builder had injured some of the plaintiff's furniture, which had not been removed. The plaintiff thereupon brought his action in the county court, and obtained a verdict.

The defendant appealed.

Amphlett, for the appellant.—There was no evidence of forcible entry, and the defendant had a perfect right at the end of the tenancy to re-enter and take possession of the premises. The magistrate's order was intended to serve the same purpose if entry could not be peaceably effected. The plaintiff cannot complain of injury to his furniture, for he had no right to leave it there.

A. T. Lawrence, for the respondent.—The pulling down of the house while the plaintiff's furniture was there is sufficient evidence of forcible entry. The landlord cannot invoke the assistance of the law and at the same time take the law into his own hands. Until the expiration of the time limited by the magistrate's order the landlord's right of entry was suspended: Newton v. Harland, 1 Man. & G. 644; Lows v. Telford, 1 App. Cas. 414, 24 W. R. Dig. 157.

DAY, J.—I om of opinion that the justices' order for ejectment in no way affected the common law rights of the defendant. He was clearly entitled at the expiration of the tenancy to retake possession of his own property. The injury to the plaintiff's furniture was entirely due to its being left in the house, where it had no right whatever to be. There was no evidence whatever of forcible entry. The defendant's appeal must be allowed, and judgment entered for the defendant, with costs.

BOURNE v. WALL.

Bill of sale—Validity—Power to sell on or off the premises—Whether such power invalidates bill of sale—"Necessary for the maintenance of the security"—Form in the schedule to Bills of Sale Act, 1882.

(a.) Reported by Sir SHERSTON BAKER, Barrister-at-Law.

the premises" is a clause necessary for the maintenance of the security, and does not vitiate the bill of sale.

Appeal from Croydon County Court in an interpleader issue.

In December, 1887, the defendant Wall gave a bill of sale on his furniture to the Mutual Loan Association. In December, 1889, the loan association pressed the defendant for the balance of £42 then remaining due upon this bill of sale. The defendant was unable to pay this sum, but his wife, the present claimant, paid this sum to the grantees of the bill of sale, the Mutual Loan Association, and she so paid it with moneys which were her own separate estate, and which she had recently received under the will of her father.

Mrs. Wall, the claimant, having paid out the loan association, took from them an assignment of the bill of sale in the month of January, 1890, so that she became the holder of the bill of sale granted by her husband over his furniture to the loan association.

The plaintiff had recovered a judgment against the defendant, and proceeded to levy execution against the goods of the defendant which were comprised in the bill of sale, as well as against some other goods which were the separate property of the wife purchased by her with her own money.

When the plaintiff proceeded to levy against the goods comprised under the bill of sale, Mrs. Wall, the claimant, set up the bill of sale, under which she claimed to be entitled to the goods seized.

The question now was whether this bill of sale was a valid bill of sale, containing, as it did, a clause giving the grantee "power to sell the goods by private treaty or public auction on or off the premises."

Before the learned county court judge it was contended for the plaintiff, the execution creditor, that this clause in the bill of sale, giving the grantee power to enter and sell the goods on the premises, was not in accordance with the form in the schedule and was bad accordingly, and that although the statute gives a power of sale, it does not give a right to sell on the premises; and in support of this contention the following cases were cited before the learned judge: In re Morritt, 35 W. R. 277, 18 Q. B. D. 222; Watkins v. Evans, 35 W. R. 313, 18 Q. B. D. 386; Furber v. Cobb, 35 W. R. 398, 18 Q. B. D. 494; Ex parte Stanford, 34 W. R. 507, 17 Q. B. D. 259; and it was also contended that the clause was not necessary for the maintenance of the security: Lyon v. Morris, 35 W. R. 707, 19 Q. B. D. 139; Bardell v. Daykin (Jarvis, Claimant), 3 Times L. R. 526.

The learned judge held that the bill of sale was bad by reason of the clause giving the grantee the power to sell the goods on the premises, and he so held on the authority of Bardell v. Daykin, a report of which case however was not before him at the time.

In Bardell v. Daykin it was held that a clause that the grantee might "at any time during the subsistence of the security affix such bills and placards having reference to the said chattels and things as he might think fit on any premises for the time being in the occupation of the grantor," was not a covenant necessary for the maintenance of the security, and that the bill of sale was therefore bad.

The learned judge, therefore, held that the bill of sale was bad, and gave judgment for the plaintiff, the execution creditor.

The claimant, the holder of the bill of sale, appealed.

Colam, for the appellant.

Carrington, for the respondent.

A. L. SMITH, J.—This is an appeal from the learned county court judge at Croydon, who held that this bill of sale was bad, as it gave power to the grantee to enter and seize the goods and sell them on the premises. He held that that power was not in accordance with the form in the schedule. Although that form is more or less a hard and fast one there is some latitude given, as the parties may insert in their own terms matters which are necessary for the maintenance of the security—that is, what the court may think necessary for the maintenance of the security.

I think the clause in the present case is one necessary for the maintenance of the security. A clause giving power to seize and sell on the premises by private sale is, in my judgment, a clause necessary for the maintenance of the security. There is direct authority for this in the judgment of Day, J., in Lyon v. Morris. Then, does the clause become unreasonable by reason of the power given to sell by public auction? I think not, and if that be so, we have it that a covenant to seize and sell on the premises by public auction is a clause necessary for the maintenance of the security. So, as to the other part of the clause that is objected to, I think the bill of sale is not vitiated by that part. The learned judge was led astray by the case of Bardell v. Daykin, but that was a very different case from the present, as the court there merely held that a clause giving the grantee power to affix bills and placards on any premises for the time being in occupation of the grantor was not a clause necessary for the maintenance of the security.

It seems to me that this bill of sale does not sin against the form in the schedule, and we think, therefore, that the judgment of the learned judge was erroneous, and that this appeal ought to be allowed.

GRANTHAM, J.—I am of the same opinion.

Appeal allowed.

In re LOUIS.

Ex parte INCORPORATED LAW SOCIETY. (a.)

Solicitor—Person not duly qualified—Affidavit prepared by process-server—Contempt of court—6 & 7 Vict. c. 73, s. 2—23 & 24 Vict. c. 127, s. 26.

A person who was employed by a firm of solicitors as a process-server prepared the usual affidavit with reference to a failure to effect service, whereupon an application was made to attach him for contempt of court in having acted as a solicitor contrary to section 2 of 6 & 7 Vict. c. 73.

Held, that he had not acted as a solicitor, and that no contempt of court had been committed.

This was an application by the Incorporated Law Society for an attachment against one A. H. Louis for contempt of court under section 26 of 23 & 24 Vict. c. 127. Louis had been employed by a firm of solicitors as confidential agent and process-server, and in that capacity had himself employed others. He had been in the habit of settling the usual affidavits upon an application for substituted service which were used by the persons actually employed in attempting to effect service.

(a.) Reported by CECIL CHAPMAN, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The charge now made against him was that in preparing one of these affidavits he had acted as a solicitor within section 2 of 6 & 7 Vict. c. 73, although he was not duly qualified.

Channell, Q.C. (Hollams with him), in support of the application.—The defendant has been guilty of contempt of court within section 26 of 23 & 24 Vict. c. 127 because he has presumed to act as a solicitor. It is not necessary that he should do any of the particular acts specified in section 2 of 6 & 7 Vict. c. 73 if he does such an act as only a solicitor or his clerk ought to do. His conduct comes within the general words "act as a solicitor in any cause, matter, or suit." The preparation of an affidavit is a responsible act, for which a solicitor ought to be liable to the court. The court has a right to presume that the statements contained in the affidavit have been tested by a solicitor, and it has been pointed out in Law Society v. Shaw and Waterlow, 30 W. R. 820, 9 Q. B. D. 1, that the preparation of an affidavit is essentially the work of a solicitor. In the Stamp Act of 1870 it is enacted in section 60 that any unqualified person "who draws or prepares any instrument . . . relating to any proceedings in law or equity" is liable to a penalty, and an affidavit is clearly such an instrument.

Finlay, Q.C. (Pollard and E. C. Robinson with him), for the defendant.—It is admitted that the defendant has been guilty of no specific offence, but it is contended that he comes within the general words at the conclusion of section 2 of 6 & 7 Vict. c. 73. Those general words were not intended to enlarge, but merely to sum up, the specific offences before described. The defendant in settling the affidavit was doing no more than a solicitor's clerk might do any day, and was acting for the solicitor, not as a solicitor. It would be absurd to contend that a solicitor's clerk who prepares instruments relating to law proceedings is guilty of a breach of section 60 of the Stamp Act, and the defendant is in exactly the same position. If, instead of the affidavit, oral evidence had been given of the facts contained in it, the defendant could have been guilty of no offence. He has acted either as a clerk or as a witness, but not as a solicitor.

MATHEW, J.—I am of opinion that this motion must be dismissed, as the defendant has not been shown to have been guilty of any contempt of court. It is said that he has "acted as a solicitor" within the meaning of 6 & 7 Vict. c. 73, s. 2. That section specifies certain acts which no one is to be permitted to do unless he be a solicitor, and adds "or act as an attorney or solicitor in any cause, matter, or suit." It is not contended that the defendant has committed any of the specific acts which are prohibited by the section, but it is contended that he has "acted as a solicitor" within the general words. It appears that he has been carrying on the business of a process-server—we are not concerned with his transactions in any other capacity—and that he has carried on this business in entire good faith and has been employed by solicitors of undoubted respectability. It appears also that it has been part of his duty in his employment as a process-server, when a writ has been served, and when there has been a failure to effect service of a writ, to prepare in each case the usual affidavit for the use of the solicitor by whom he has been employed. This has been the course of business. Now, in the preparation of the affidavits of service where service has been effected, can it be said that the defendant has acted as a solicitor? The learned counsel for the Law Society hesitated as to this, and with reason, because, as regards this affidavit, it is plain that the defendant has acted, not as a solicitor, but for a solicitor and as a witness. Then, can any reasonable distinction be drawn between the case where an affidavit of service is made and the case where an affidavit is made of facts showing why personal service was not effected? The learned counsel for the Law Society urged that in the latter case it is necessary to have the assistance of a solicitor in order that there may be a proper cross-examination of the person who states the facts with respect to the failure to effect personal service. But how could there be any effective cross-examination in such a case? The solicitor could only act upon the statement of the person employed to serve the process, and here in place of the old process-server, with his strange proceedings, we have a person of undoubted respectability and character, who may be expected to employ only persons on whom reliance can be placed. In this case, therefore, as in the other, as it appears to me, the defendant has acted for a solicitor, and in the capacity of a witness. It was not disputed that if in place of the affidavit being produced the person employed to effect service were himself to state at chambers what had occurred, there could be no pretence for saying that in so doing he was acting as a solicitor. I think that the defendant in settling this affidavit did no more than make such a statement, and I cannot think that any additional security would have been afforded by his having had the assistance of a solicitor in the preparation of the affidavit. No single case has been referred to in which an affidavit prepared by the defendant has been used at chambers otherwise than by, or on behalf of, a solicitor, and the solicitor who makes use of such an affidavit is responsible for doing so, and is bound to satisfy himself before he uses it that the statements which it contains are, so far as he knows, true. I think, therefore, that no contempt of court has been committed. The result is that the motion will be dismissed, with costs.

TAWES v. KNOWLES. (a.)

Easement — Grant of adjoining tenements — Implied reservation—Mortgage.

The grantor of two adjoining tenements possessed a right of way from one tenement through another. Previous to the grant of these tenements to two respective grantees, the grantor had conveyed the servient tenement by way of mortgage without any reservation of the right of way. Subsequently, by her will, the grantor devised the two tenements to the predecessors in title of the respective plaintiff and defendant. The defendant's predecessor took the equity of redemption to the original servient tenement, and the mortgage was subsequently paid off.

Held, that, in an action by the plaintiff to secure the original right of way, the ordinary principles applicable to a conveyance in fee without any reservation of a right of way must apply to the mortgage, and that the defendant, as successor to the mortgagee, took the tenement without any such reservation.

castle-on-Tyne, in favour of the plaintiff. The facts are stated in the judgment.

Baker, for the appellant, the defendant, argued that, there being no reservation of the right of way claimed by the plaintiff in the mortgage to the plaintiff's predecessor in title, the plaintiff was estopped from any user of the right of way.

He cited Wheeldon v. Burrows, 28 W. R. 196, 12 Ch. D. 36, per Thesiger, L.J., 48-9; Suffield v. Brown, 12 W. R. 356, 4 De G. J. & S. 185; Brett v. Clowser, 5 C. P. D. 376, 29 W. R. Dig. 234; Pearson v. Spencer, 11 W. R. 471, 3 B. & S. 761; Polden v. Bastard, 14 W. R. 198, L. R. 1 Q. B. 156.

Warrington, for the respondent, the plaintiff, argued that the mortgage, having been paid off, amounted to a complete extinction of the security, and that the plaintiff resumed all the rights, including that of this right of way originally possessed by the original predecessor in title of both properties before they were divided.

He cited Brown v. Alabaster, 36 W. R. 155, 37 Ch. D. 490; Bolton v. Bolton, 11 Ch. D. 968, 27 W. R. Dig. 230.

April 15.—A. L. SMITH, J., delivered the following written judgment of the COURT.—This is an appeal from the learned county court judge at Newcastle-on-Tyne, who found for the plaintiff. The plaintiff sued the defendant for trespass for removing a door, the point raised being whether the plaintiff was entitled to a right of way through the premises of the defendant. The defendant counter-claimed for an injunction restraining the plaintiff from trespassing upon the way. The houses of the plaintiff and defendant stand back to back, the plaintiff's house facing on to Church-way and the defendant's house on to Bedford-street. The plaintiff asserts that he has a right of way over and along the side of defendant's premises so as to enable him to pass from his Church-way premises into Bedford-street, and this the defendant denies. The plaintiff and defendant both claim title to their respective properties under the will of the late Mrs. Bell, who died in August, 1886, having made her will in January of that year.

In the year 1855 Mrs. Bell became possessed of the land upon which the plaintiff's and defendant's houses now stand. The Church-way house was first built and occupied by Mrs. Bell. In the year 1866 she built the Bedford-street house upon the vacant plot in rear of her Church-way house, according to a plan which unquestionably left a walled passage which passed across the Bedford-street house premises, so that she or other the occupier of the Church-way house might pass and repass from and to its rear to and from Bedford-street. There was a door placed at each end of this passage. It appears from the evidence that this passage had been intermittently used by the occupier of the Church-way house principally in order to get rid of the ashes without taking them through that house. On the 30th of May, 1882, Mrs. Bell conveyed the Bedford-street premises to Miss Davidson, the predecessor in title to the defendant, subject to Mrs. Bell's equity of redemption. By this conveyance she conveyed the whole of the Bedford-street premises, including the passage in question, and reserved no right of way whatever over it from the Church-way house to Bedford-street.

The question is, What is the effect of this conveyance upon the passage in question? It is, I think, clear that if this had been a conveyance in fee to the predecessor in title of the defendant, the defendant would have taken the Bedford-street premises, including the passage, freed from any right of way over which theretofore had existed in favour of the grantor. The case would have fallen directly within the second proposition laid down by the Court of Appeal in the case of Wheeldon v. Burrows, which is as follows:—"The second proposition is that if the grantor intends to reserve any right over the tenement granted, it is his duty to reserve it expressly in the grant. This rule is subject to certain exceptions, one of which is the exception which attaches to cases which are called ways of necessity."

This passage was not a way of necessity, nor does it fall within any of the exceptions mentioned in this case. After this conveyance in 1882, as before mentioned, Mrs. Bell made her will in January, 1886, and then died. By it she devised the Church-way premises to her husband for his natural life, and after his decease to her nephew Robert Johnson, the predecessor in title of the plaintiff; the Bedford-street premises she devised to her domestic servant Mary Neil, now Mrs. Knowles, the present defendant. At the date of her will and of her death the Bedford-street premises remained so conveyed to Miss Davidson. It is said that, inasmuch as the premises were only conveyed by way of mortgage, the rule above stated did not apply. I had considerable difficulty in following this argument, or the principle upon which it was formed, but it seems to me that the right of the plaintiff and the defendant must be ascertained as of the date of the death of Mrs. Bell; each party then took what her will gave them, no more and no less, and their respective estates do not depend upon what may subsequently have taken place. At this date Mrs. Bell, the testatrix, had conveyed, by way of mortgage, to the defendant's predecessor in title the Bedford-street premises, without any reservation of any right of way from the Church-way premises. At that date the sole interest Mrs. Bell had was an equity of redemption. It seems to me that whether the mortgage was subsequently paid off or foreclosed cannot determine what it was the defendant took under the will. In my judgment this case is to be decided upon the same principle as if the conveyance had been in fee, and on this ground the defendant is entitled to succeed. It is further argued for the defendant that even if this was not so the will did not give to the plaintiff's predecessor in title any right of way over the defendant's close, and that he had no cause of action. The law applicable to this point is settled by Erle, L.C.J., in delivering the judgment of the Exchequer Chamber in Polden v. Bastard. "There is a distinction," he says, "between easements such as a right of way or easements used from time to time and easements of necessity or continuous easements. The cases recognize this distinction, and it is clear law that, upon a severance of tenements, easements used as of necessity, or in their nature continuous, will pass by implication of law without any words of grant; but with regard to easements which are used from time to time only, they do not pass unless the owner, by appropriate language, shows an intention that they should pass." The right of way now claimed by the plaintiff is an easement used from time to time only, and is not a continuous easement, and, inasmuch as there are no appropriate words in the will, or, indeed, no words at all, to show an intention that it should pass, in our judgment upon this point also the defendant's contention is correct. The Conveyancing Act, in our opinion, does not apply.

This appeal must, therefore, be allowed, and judgment be entered for the defendant, with an injunction as claimed.

In re LACON.
LACON v. LACON. (a.)

Ademption—Double portions—Presumption—Legacy to testator's three sons of all testator's shares in a partnership—Gift inter vivos to one son, of two out of the testator's twenty-one shares—Difference in character of gifts—Gift inter vivos in lieu of salary for services rendered—How presumption may be rebutted.

A testator by his will gave to his three sons equally as tenants in common all his shares and interest in a brewery business in which he was the principal partner, being at the date of the will the owner of twenty-one out of twenty-four shares in the business. Between that date and his death he made E. (one of the three sons), a partner, and assigned him two of his twenty-one shares, which were to be in lieu of a salary as manager. The two shares thus given carried with them certain powers which did not attach to those devolving under the will. E., at the time he was so made a partner, had had many years' experience in the business, and was at the time in fact a paid manager of an important branch of the business, and had been pressing for an increase of his salary as such.

Held (reversing the decision of Romer, J., ante, p. 299), that, even assuming that the gift inter vivos to E. came within the definition of a "portion," which was doubtful, there was amply sufficient in the circumstances of the case to rebut the presumption that such gift was intended as an advancement pro tanto of the shares given him by the will, and accordingly there was no ademption.

Whether the gift inter vivos to E. was a gift in the way of a "portion," quære.

Appeal from Romer, J.

The facts appear by the report of the case below, ante, p. 299, and from the judgments of the Court of Appeal.

It may be mentioned as a matter on which some argument turned in the Court of Appeal that the deed of partnership of December 19, 1887, referred to in the report below, contained a clause providing that, if any partner should die during the continuance of the partnership, his executors or legatees should be at liberty within four months to give notice in writing of their intention to discontinue the partnership; but that if the executors, administrators, or legatees of a deceased partner should desire to continue in the partnership, or should not give notice to discontinue, they "shall be, and be considered as, partners, and be admitted into the partnership in the place of the deceased partner, and in respect of his share and interest therein upon the terms of these presents, so far as the same shall be applicable to the altered circumstances then existing, and so that the new partners or partner admitted under this clause shall have all the rights and powers of the deceased partner in whose place they or he shall be substituted (save and except that they or he shall not be acting partners or partner without the consent of the other partners or partner) and the share and interest of the deceased partner, and the share of profits coming to such new partners (if more than one) shall be divided amongst such new partners in shares and proportions as they may be entitled thereto or may mutually agree upon."

The defendant, Ernest Lacon, appealed from the judgment of Romer, J.

(a.) Reported by R. H. DEANE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Rigby, Q.C., Neville, Q.C., and D. G. Begg, for the appellant.—The doctrine of presumption against double portions is, under the circumstances of this case, excluded: Ex parte Pye, 18 Ves. 140; Lawes v. Lawes, 30 W. R. 33, 20 Ch. D. 81; Bengough v. Walker, 15 Ves. 507; In re Vickers, Vickers v. Vickers, 36 W. R. 545, 37 Ch. D. 525. The two twenty-fourth shares passed to the appellant as increased remuneration in lieu of a salary, and it cannot be argued that he received these shares as a benefit in anticipation of that which he was to take under the will. The appellant was bound down, and in consideration of this was to receive this benefit as a gift. The term "portion" is defined in Ex parte Pye and in Taylor v. Taylor, 23 W. R. 719, L. R. 20 Eq. 155. This is not really a case which raises a presumption against double portions. The doctrine of ademption does not apply in the case of a specific legacy or in the case of a gift of residue. The doctrine does not apply in cases of real estate: Davys v. Boucher, 3 Y. & Coll. 397, 411, and it does not apply to the case of a specific gift like the present: Backwell v. Child, 1 Ambl. 260. In order to effect ademption the advance must be for the same purpose as the legacy: Roome v. Roome, 3 Atk. 181.

They also referred to In re Pollock, 28 Ch. D. 552, 33 W. R. Dig. 242, and to Chichester v. Coventry, 15 W. R. 849, L. R. 2 H. L. 71.

Sir H. Davey Q.C., and Borthwick, for the respondent, T. B. U. Lacon.—The appellant gave no consideration for the benefit; the only point on which any such argument could be founded is the alteration in the salary. It was really a gift, and a valuable one. Any doubt as to whether the doctrine of double portions would apply to a share of residue has long been set at rest. The questions really are (1) of fact, Was it a portion or not? (2) What is the meaning of a portion? Lord Cottenham, in Pym v. Lockyer, 5 My. & Cr. 29, at p. 46, &c., and the late Master of the Rolls in Taylor v. Taylor, laid down the rule thus: that at the time he makes his will the father is to be taken as making a scheme for the distribution of his property, and if, between the dates of his will and of his death, he makes a gift to a child, he is presumed to have anticipated the date of his own death. This may possibly be rebutted, but the presumption is that every gift is an anticipation of the testator's death, and is in part performance of his scheme, and not to be taken as altering or disturbing that scheme. If double portions are allowed the original scheme is disturbed and the shares of the other children diminished. [BOWEN, L.J.—How does the Wills Act affect this presumption, providing, as it does, that every will is to be read as speaking from the date of the testator's death?] This is a matter outside the will, and not affected by that provision. It is a presumption which the court raises from the facts. Thynne v. Glengall, 2 H. L. Cas. 131, was a case of satisfaction. Montefiore v. Guedalla, 8 W. R. 53, 1 De G. F. & J. 93, shows that a gift of residue may be adeemed. The facts are not such as will rebut the presumption of intended equality, and the differences between the two provisions are not sufficient to rebut the legal presumption against double portions: Weall v. Rice, 2 Russ. & Myl. 251; Russell v. St. Aubyn, 2 Ch. D. 398, 24 W. R. Dig. 258. There is no difference really in the character of the two gifts—that given by the will and that given by the testator in his lifetime. By the clause in the partnership deed as to the representatives or legatees of a deceased partner coming in, we have no option as to being acting partners or not—it rests with the surviving partners to exclude us from acting if they think fit. As far as we are concerned, if we come in at all we come in as acting partners, and on precisely the same footing as the surviving partners. [BOWEN, L.J.—Does not the fact that the testator puts the appellant in a position of greater power than the other two brothers make the gift in his lifetime a gift of a different character from that given by the will?] Surely not. What is given in substance is the capital of the shares—that is the same in both cases. Chichester v. Coventry was a case of satisfaction, not ademption, and all the lords pointed out that the court will much more readily presume ademption than satisfaction.

P. S. Gregory (Haldane, Q.C., with him), for H. S. H. Lacon, the third brother, supported the contention of the respondent.

E. S. Ford, for the trustee, took no part in the argument.

Rigby, Q.C., in reply.—There is amply sufficient here to rebut any presumption that the gift of the two shares to the appellant was intended to be in part substitution for what he would take under the will. He had already been thirteen years in the business, and it was contemplated that he would be in it another ten years before his father's death. That is twenty-three years of his adult life. He was doing the work of the firm. It may be naturally supposed that the testator intended to place the appellant, who knew the business and had been so many years in it, in practically the same position as regards remuneration as Mr. Nightingale, who occupied an analogous position in the business, and whose remuneration was very nearly the same, as upon our contention that of the appellant, would be. [KAY, L.J.—I think you are entitled to say that it was worth the father's while to keep the appellant in the business for the sake of enhancing the value of all the shares.] Yes. It is only a presumption that there is ademption, and a presumption that requires a very slight indication of a contrary intention to rebut it. [BOWEN, L.J.—Is there any case in which the doctrine of double portions has been applied when the son was performing services for his father?] Yes, Lawes v. Lawes. The whole burthen of the business now falls on the appellant. One of the two other brothers is ill, and the appellant does not consider him capable of managing the business as an acting partner.

LINDLEY, L.J.—The question here is both important and difficult. It is in form an appeal from a decision of Romer, J., making a declaration to the effect that certain shares in a brewery are divisible in sevenths, whereas the appellant, Mr. Ernest Lacon, contends that he is entitled to eight and a third shares, and his brothers to six and a third shares each.

The point depends upon what is called the presumption against double portions; and before going into the facts I may state at once what the doctrine is, and for that purpose I cannot do better than read the judgment of Lord Eldon in Ex parte Pye. He says (in 18 Ves., on p. 150), "Without going through all the cases that were cited, and those referred to in them, having compared the case in Atkyns with manuscript notes of that case, and looked into some other cases, one in Ambler, and some earlier, I may state as the unquestionable doctrine of the court, that, where a parent gives a legacy to a child, not stating the purpose with reference to which he gives it, the court understands him as giving a portion; and, by a sort of artificial rule, in the application of which legitimate children have been very harshly treated, upon an artificial notion that the father is paying a debt of nature, and a sort of feeling upon what is called a leaning against double portions, if the father afterwards advances a portion on the marriage of that child, though of less amount, it is a satisfaction of the whole or in part;" and then he goes on to say what has been done in some of the cases.

Now, what we have to consider is, first of all, the will of the late Sir Edmund Lacon, and, secondly, some partnership articles which were entered into by him after the date of his will, and the circumstances under which those articles were entered into; and what we have to see is, first of all, whether this is a case in which there are two portions, and, secondly, assuming that there are two portions, and assuming therefore that the presumption to which I have referred arises, whether there are or are not circumstances in this case which rebut that presumption.

The will fortunately is plain enough, and nothing turns upon the construction of it. The testator had four sons and two daughters. He had two businesses. He had a banking business at Norwich and at Yarmouth, and he had a brewery business at Yarmouth. He leaves his banking business (besides other property to which I need not refer) to his eldest son, the present baronet, of whom we need say nothing more. He leaves his interest in the brewery business, in which he had twenty-one out of twenty-four shares, to his younger children, Thomas, Henry, and Ernest. He then, after making various bequests in favour of his daughters and so on (which I pass over), bequeaths the residue of his property amongst all his children. That is the general scheme of the will. To use Lord Eldon's language in Ex parte Pye, there is nothing in the will which enables us to state the purpose for which these brewery shares were given to the three sons.

In 1884 the position of affairs (in addition to what I have already stated) included this factor, that the fourth son, Ernest, was then being brought up to the brewery business. He was being trained by his father to attend to that business, with a view ultimately, no doubt, of his becoming a partner in it. The same observation is not true of the eldest son, or of the two intermediate sons. It was the youngest son, and he alone, who was brought up to this business. Having, I suppose, become useful, he was paid a salary of £500, and later on, in 1887, of £1,000, a year. In that year it was considered desirable that some modification should be made in the terms of the partnership in the brewery business. Some modifications had become necessary as regards the provision for Mr. Nightingale, one of the partners, and it appears from the evidence that the son, Ernest, was urging his father to increase his salary, which was then, as I have said, £1,000 a year. That salary, as I understand, was not paid by the father, but by the firm, though of course the father, as having so large a share in the concern, was the principal paymaster. It seems from the evidence, which is that of Mr. Ernest Lacon and Mr. Waters, that there was a discussion, if it can be called such, in which the father, being a very reticent man, seems to have held his tongue, and merely listened to what was said by his son; but he so far acquiesced that upon one occasion when Ernest was pressing him for an increase of his salary, he said, "Oh, I have made you a partner"; and the evidence of Mr. Waters, the solicitor, tends to show, I think, conclusively, that what the father was doing, amongst other things—I do not say the whole of what he was doing, because that would be begging the question—unquestionably was for the purpose of increasing the allowance to his son Ernest. That was part of his object. The evidence of the solicitor goes to show that the testator thought at one time he would do that sufficiently by giving him one share, but then he changed his mind and told Mr. Waters that he would give Ernest two shares. Then there was a question as to what the effect of that would be upon the allowance. That question arose by reason of a query put into the draft by Mr. Nightingale's solicitor as to Mr. Nightingale's allowance. The question as to Mr. Ernest Lacon's allowance was brought to his father's attention, and he said at once: "The allowance will have to be given up. The shares are in substitution for that." And so it came about that in 1887 Mr. Ernest Lacon ceased to be a salaried clerk or assistant, or whatever his position was in the concern, and became a partner in respect of two twenty-fourth shares, which of course were given him by his father, and were not contributed by the other partners.

The partnership articles recite the fact that the father has assigned or made over to his son Ernest two of his twenty-fourth shares in the partnership assets and property, and then they state the capital value of these two shares at £21,500. That, I suppose, is the sum at which they are to be taken in the books. Then follow the usual partnership articles. The son who is taken in, is to be bound to attend to the business and devote his whole time to it. Then, passing over unimportant matter, the 28th clause is addressed to the introduction by the father of his sons or legatees as partners under his will. It runs thus:—[His lordship here read the clause set out in the statement of the case, and proceeded:—] Then there is a proviso that "every partner admitted under this clause shall execute a deed covenanting with the other partners or partner for the time being jointly and separately to perform and observe the provisions of these presents so far as the same shall be applicable." And then there is a further proviso that "if the surviving partners or partner refuse to admit into partnership as acting partners or partner the executors, administrators, or legatees of the deceased partner claiming admission under this clause, then the said executors, administrators, or legatees shall have the option, to be exercised in manner hereinafter mentioned, within two calendar months after such refusal, of purchasing the shares and interest of the surviving partners or partner in the capital and assets (including the goodwill of the partnership)"—it is a very curious clause.

Now, what is the effect of that? The effect of that, as I understand it, is this, that it was competent for the testator to bequeath his shares to anybody he liked—to sons or to anybody else, and that the legatees should thereupon be at liberty to become partners, and if they become partners they would be bound to attend to the business, unless the survivors said that they should not. It is not, as I thought at one period of the argument, that these legatees could become partners, and escape the duty and burden of working as acting partners. The option of their working or not working would not rest with them, but with the survivors, and that is important with reference to a discussion which took place yesterday, and it displaces the force of the observation which fell from me, and, I think, from the court generally, that it would be reasonable to give Mr. Ernest Lacon two extra shares in consideration of his doing work, considering that his brothers did nothing. I think that observation falls to the ground. However, the position certainly is this: that it does give him rights under this deed as a partner admitted under the deed, which he would not have, and which his brothers would not have, if they were claiming simply under the will.

Not many months after these transactions took place the testator died without having altered his will. Now upon the will and the deed Mr. Ernest Lacon's position is unassailable. He has got two shares under the deed. He has got, under the will, one-third of all the remaining shares of his father. As a matter of construction there is no difficulty and no controversy about it. But then comes in the presumption against double portions, and his brothers say that by reason of that doctrine "you must treat the two shares which our father gave you in 1887 as given you in anticipation of, and on account of, and in part satisfaction of the same shares which you would have taken and which we should all have taken if no provision had been made for you." That rests upon the presumption I have mentioned.

Now upon the question whether these two provisions, the one by the will and the one by the deed, are portions, it appears to me that there is very considerable difficulty in saying that they are not. Certainly the purpose for which a provision is given is important, as appears from the language of Lord Eldon himself. I think that what the learned lord said about "purpose" in considering the nature of a provision by will is a point reasonably applicable to a provision made either by a deed, instrument, or will. But assuming that these two provisions are both portions—and having regard, as I have said, to the language of the cases upon this subject, and especially of the late Master of the Rolls in Taylor v. Taylor, I shall assume that they are portions — the question still arises whether there is or is not, under the circumstances of this case, enough to rebut the presumption that these shares are to be taken as given on account of, and in anticipation of, and in part satisfaction of what otherwise would have been taken under the will if they had not been given by the testator in his lifetime. Now here we differ from Romer, J. We think that the circumstances of this case are peculiar; and we think that there are circumstances sufficient to indicate an intention on the part of the father, not simply to anticipate as to one son the provision which he had made for all his sons, but an intention and desire to prefer that one son to the others, not only in point of time, but in point of the amount and nature of the provision which he was making.

It is to my mind very significant that this son alone had been brought up in the business. It is to my mind very significant that this provision was made for that son when he was asking for a further advance of salary, and Mr. Waters's evidence and his own evidence (though, of course, that must be taken as interested evidence) goes to show it was one method of increasing his allowance. It was not simply giving him now what he would have when his father died; it was something very different. I do not say it was not that, but it was that and a great deal more: and when we consider that it was to the advantage of the family that one son, at all events, should be brought up in the business, and be there, when his father died, as a partner, it appears to me that there is amply enough for us to say, under these circumstances, that the presumption (which is not a very strong one) is rebutted, and that, looking at what was done in 1887, and the reasons which brought about what was done, the purpose which the testator apparently had in his mind when he recast the partnership articles in 1887 was deliberately to prefer Ernest, not only in point of time, but in point of amount also.

I think, therefore, that the appeal ought to be allowed, and that, there being no controversy except this in the action, judgment ought to be given for the appellant both here and below.

BOWEN, L.J.—The question we have to decide is whether it was the intention of the father that the two shares which were received by the appellant during his father's lifetime should be received by him as an advancement against the shares which the appellant was to receive under the will on the father's death. In order to establish that intention the respondent has invoked what is called the doctrine of double portions—a doctrine which is no doubt originally judge-made, and which is established by this court, but against which I should be the last person to endeavour to introduce any subtle or frivolous distinction.

The doctrine, so far as it applies to a case of this peculiar character, seems to me to have been made clear to the world by the judgment of Lord Cottenham in Pym v. Lockyer, 5 My. & Cr., at p. 46, which was read during the argument, and which I will read again, because it will make the few remarks which I am about to offer perhaps clearer than they otherwise would be. Lord Cottenham says:—"A father who makes his will dividing his property amongst his children must be supposed to have decided what, under the then existing circumstances, ought to be the portion of each child, not with reference to the wants of each, but attributing to each the share of the whole which, with reference to the wants of all, each ought to possess. If, subsequently, upon the marriage of any of them, it becomes necessary or expedient to advance a portion for such child, what reason is there for assuming that the apportionment between all ought therefore to be disturbed? The advancement must naturally be supposed to be of the particular child's portion, and so the rule assumes, as it precludes the child advanced from claiming the sum given by the will as well as the sum advanced."

Now, in order to establish a case for the application of this rule as to double portions, there must be two matters, I think, made out, and it will be seen upon analysis that there are two presumptions really which are applied, and not one. In the first place both of the gifts or donations must be gifts, and gifts in the nature of a portion. The first presumption here arises—it is said, that whatever gifts are made by the father, which it may be supposed will have to be distributed among the children, or are given by the father to one child with a view to establishing him in life, are presumed to be portions within the meaning of the rule. We have here to ask ourselves, in the first place, Were these two shares, which were received during the lifetime of the father, received under such circumstances as to justify their being treated and considered as a portion? But supposing both gifts are gifts in the nature of portions, then comes a further question, for the solution of which a further presumption is invoked. The question is whether it is intended that the former gift or portion is to take the place of an advancement of the gift which is given by the will, and there the presumption, which is invoked to answer the question, applies, which is that the former gift, the gift inter vivos, is intended as an advancement pro tanto of the gift under the bequest—a presumption, it is said, which is made in favour of equality amongst children—it being the view of the law that equality is what the father in dealing with his children would in most cases presumably intend.

This is a presumption which may be rebutted. The circumstances may show that a gift given during the lifetime is not intended as an advancement of the bequest. Circumstances may show (to put it in a slightly different way) that equality was not the intention of the father. The two questions, first, whether the gifts are both given in the way of portions, and, secondly, whether it was intended by the father that the first gift should be an advancement in satisfaction of the second, may well run together, and be blended together; and in my opinion this is just the case in which they do. I myself am not satisfied, to begin with, that the gift of the two shares—I call it a gift, although, perhaps, that expression "a gift" is not exactly an appropriate term—which was made by the father in his lifetime to the appellant, was in the nature of a portion within the meaning of the rule. To my mind the circumstances of the case displace the notion that the father here was giving them simply by way of advancement to the son. And, secondly, I think (for reasons which I will give in a moment) that here in every view the presumption in favour of equality is rebutted by the circumstances of the case. The circumstances show that the gift given during the lifetime was not intended as an advancement or anticipation of the bequest. The son had been thirteen years in the firm, at first in a subordinate position, and afterwards as the manager of the London business, receiving a salary of £1,000 a year. He had acquired experience, and he had earned confidence. He had in 1887 become a person unquestionably of use and value to the firm. He was a person who, if he had not been a son, might not unreasonably have dreamed of being in time, and at no very distant time, promoted to a share in the business of the firm. In 1887 he wished for an increase of salary, and was in such a position that he could press it upon his father. Doubless he would also look to be a partner at some time or another in the house.

Now a person in that position, who in the house of his father has done service, and substantial service, might well, if a favourable view was taken of it, be rewarded with a share or shares. When he receives the shares from his father, he receives, perhaps, what his father would have given with much more hesitation, or which, perhaps, he would not have given at all, if the relationship of father and son had not, indeed, existed. He receives what can hardly be characterized as mere bounty—it is bounty, but something else too. It is not a pure gift, although the element of free liberality enters into it. He is given, perhaps, more than he deserves, but he deserves something. It is a portion, perhaps, in one sense—that it is a provision which the father would not have made if the recipient had not been his son, but it is a portion which has in part been earned by previous services, and which is intended, of course, to be justified by services in the future. I doubt whether, under such circumstances, it would be safe to say that the two shares which are bestowed upon the son are simply a portion.

But the further question remains whether, assuming the two shares to be a gift in the way of a portion, we can see reason sufficient to displace the presumption of double portions; or, in other words, whether there is not a reason here from which we may safely infer that the gift of the two shares was not intended as an advancement pro tanto of the bequest? These shares were active shares; they were shares which actually gave the son a veto upon the introduction at a later date, the period of which was perfectly uncertain, and which might be delayed for years, of his other brothers. He had a grant of power and place given to him in the firm of a kind wholly incommensurate with the gift which he was to receive under the will. That grant and gift to him, treating it as a grant and gift, to my mind being wholly incommensurate with the gift under the will, is coloured with such a difference as to render it impossible for us to presume with safety that the gift of the shares was intended in any way to be an advancement towards the bequest.

It seems to me to be exactly upon that kind of reasoning that the courts have abstained, when there is a substantial and material difference between gifts inter vivos and gifts under the will, from treating one as an advancement towards the other. The doctrine of double portions must be applied faithfully wherever it is found to be applicable, but, on the other hand, it is not to be extended.

The circumstances of this case convince me that the dealing between the father and the son in the year 1887 was not intended in any way by the father to be an advancement towards what the son was to receive under the will, and that it was not intended as a part performance of the distribution which the will was intended by the father to make of what the father should leave behind him at his death.

Upon these grounds I agree that the judgment of the learned judge of the court below ought to be displaced, although I agree with Lindley, L.J., in thinking that this is a very delicate and difficult case, and I am not surprised that judges should not be of one mind upon the subject.

KAY, L.J.—I will add a very few words. The question after all is, What was the intention of the father in this case? Did he intend when he made this gift (if it is to be called a gift) to his youngest son in his lifetime that it should be taken as an anticipation of the provision, which he at that time had made by the will, which ultimately became operative on his death.

There is a rule, which has been referred to, which is a guide where you can have no other guide to find out what the intention was. The rule is this, that if there are two provisions, or what in equity are ordinarily called portions, the one made by the will and the other in the lifetime of the testator, then the presumption arises that one portion is made in part satisfaction of the other; and then, if that presumption arises and is not rebutted, the donee has to bring into hotchpot that portion which he received in the testator's lifetime, and in that way deduct it from that which he otherwise would take under the will. Now by this will it is quite clear, I think, that the provision which was made for this and the other younger sons by dividing among them the testator's share and interest which he might have at his death in his brewery business was in the nature of a portion for each of those children. I take it that, for the purpose of determining that question, a "portion" means such a share of the father's personal property as he intends to be a provision for that son, or (as in this case) a substantial part of the provision for that son. The will was conceived in this way, as far as these younger sons are concerned. The shares which the testator might have at his death in the brewery business and in the property comprised in that business were to be divided equally among them; but besides that there was a certain share of the residue of the testator's property given to each, and also their names came in with a series of limitations of strict settlement of the testator's real estate. Still I do not doubt myself that the shares of the business (which seems to have been a valuable and extensive one) were such a substantial part of the provision made for the younger sons that a gift among them may properly be considered as coming within the definition of "portions" for those children.

Then the next question is, Was the gift made of two twenty-fourth shares in that same business by the testator in his lifetime to this, his youngest son, Ernest, a provision by way of portion? Now, on that subject I confess I have the same doubt which the other members of the court have expressed. One must look carefully at the circumstances under which that provision was made, and what presses very much upon my mind is this. This youngest son had been for thirteen years engaged as a clerk, and ultimately as a salaried manager, of an important branch—the London branch—of that brewery business. Before this gift—if it be a gift—of the shares was made to him, he went to his father and pressed him, not for a share in the partnership, but for an increase in his salary. The father, it is said, was a very reticent man, and this application was renewed at different times, and on one occasion when the conversation took place he asked his son to visit him at his country house, evidently for the purpose of renewing the conversation, and that he might have an interval to make up his mind what he should do. The son did visit his father at his country house, and he details (and there is no attempt at contradiction of what he says) what took place between him and his father; and, according to his description, his father certainly on that occasion maintained his character for reticence, but the son pressed him very much that his salary should be increased, and the father told him that he had come to the determination (I am not attempting to give the very words), instead of increasing his salary, to give him two twenty-fourth shares in the business, to make him an acting partner, and he indicated that that should take effect as from a date which had passed some (I think fifteen) months before, and that he was to bring into account the salary which he had received in the meantime, taking a share of the profits from that back date. Now, that was the arrangement which the father made with the son in answer to repeated pressure from the son that he should have a larger remuneration from his work as manager of the business. To my mind, that indicates plainly this, that the father was satisfied that the son had become a valuable manager of a part of the business; that he evidently desired to comply with the son's request, and something more, because the profits of the shares which he gave amounted to a larger sum than the son expected, or was asking for, and that he did so for the purpose of encouraging the son to carry on the management of the business, and to be an acting partner in it. The father evidently considered that that was very much for the advantage of the business.

Now just consider what the effect of that was. What was done in fact was this. A new deed was executed, and the other partners made no kind of objection upon the same, and these two twenty-fourth shares were given to the son by diminishing to that extent the shares which the father had in the business. So that practically they came out of the father's own shares; and there was an advantage to the other partners in this arrangement, because it relieved them of the payment of the salary which the business up to that time had been paying the son, and from the time when this arrangement was made the remuneration of the son was in fact paid by the father, because the father handed over to him, as I have pointed out, two of his own shares. If the father was right (and I cannot for one moment doubt that he was right) in giving every possible encouragement to this son to continue as an acting partner in the business, then he was doing the best thing he could do for the objects of his bounty mentioned in his will; because he was doing what he thought was the best thing to do to secure that the business should be so carried on that at the time of his death it should be as valuable or more valuable (and probably it was) than it was at the time when he admitted the son into this partnership. Now I am not satisfied that that is fairly to be considered a gift in the nature of a portion. The late Master of the Rolls, as has been pointed out, attempted something like a definition of what amounted to a portion within the meaning of the advancement clause in the Statute of Distributions, and he held in that case that small sums of money did not amount to advancement for that purpose, but whether his definition applies to a case of this kind or not, I confess I think it would be a dangerous thing to say that in a case of this kind such a benefit given to the youngest son of the testator in the testator's lifetime was a gift of such a nature as to raise the presumption of double portions; and without expressing any final opinion, or saying more than that I seriously doubt that being so, I will proceed to the next question.

If by any proper use of language this can be called an advancement by way of portion, then we have to consider whether the presumption that would arise, that it was given in part satisfaction of the provision which had been made by the father's will, is or is not rebutted. As I began by saying, it all comes round to this:—What, on the whole of these facts, must be considered to have been the intention of the testator? Was it his intention to put this son, who was a skilled manager of the business, who had learnt it by some thirteen years' experience when he was admitted as a partner in the father's lifetime? Was it intended to put him, in consideration of that skill which he had shown, in a somewhat better position than the other younger sons of the testator in respect of the business, or not? Which is the more reasonable conclusion to come to? I cannot divest my mind of the conviction that the more reasonable conclusion is, that the testator did intend, in consideration of the experience which he had of the son's capabilities in carrying on an important part of this business, to put him in a somewhat better position in respect of his interest in the business than the other younger children, who had never taken any part in the business at all. It is important to observe that the other younger children are older than this youngest son Ernest; yet they were not admitted into the business during the father's lifetime at all. They were not experienced in the management of the business in any way. Why they were not does not appear. It may have been from some disinclination on their part, or it may have been because the father wished them not to take part in the business. Of that I know nothing, but the fact remains that here you have the one brother who was a skilled manager in the business, and the others who are now seeking to invoke this doctrine of double portions against him, who were not skilled managers in the business at all. It seems to me that in respect of that fact—that he was a skilled manager of the business—it is right and reasonable to suppose that the father intended that he should have this advantage which he gave to him in the father's lifetime, and I cannot help being moved a little by the consideration (though that, of course, by itself would not be enough to rebut the presumption) that the father never attempted to make any alteration in his will, and there is a good deal to be said for the argument that those who are now insisting that the doctrine of double portions applies are trying to introduce it so as to alter the natural effect of this man being brought in as a partner in his father's lifetime, and of the provision made by the will.

For all these reasons I agree with the other Lords Justices. I think that this is a case in which, if that doctrine applied at all (as to which, as I have said, I have considerable doubt), it is completely rebutted when you examine carefully all the circumstances of the case; and that, therefore, Ernest, the son in question, is not bound to bring into hotchpot or account for the two twenty-fourth shares which he took in this partnership during the father's lifetime.

Bill of sale — "Marriage settlement" — Ante-nuptial agreement for a settlement—Bills of Sale Act, 1878 (41 & 42 Vict. c. 31), s. 4.

An agreement for a marriage settlement comes within the term "marriage settlement" in the exception contained in section 4 of the Bills of Sale Act, 1878, and is, therefore, not a bill of sale within the meaning of the Act.

Judgment of the Queen's Bench Division (ante, p. 301, [1891] 1 Q. B. 634) affirmed.

Appeal from the judgment of the Queen's Bench Division, ante, p. 301, [1891] 1 Q. B. 634.

The defendants recovered judgment in an action brought against them by the plaintiff, and issued execution for their costs. Certain furniture in the possession of the plaintiff which was seized was claimed by the trustee of an ante-nuptial agreement for a settlement made upon the plaintiff's marriage. By the agreement, which was not under seal, it was provided that upon the intended marriage taking place all the property of the plaintiff (including the furniture in question) should be assigned to the claimant upon trust for the wife for life for her separate use, with remainders over; and the plaintiff agreed to execute a proper deed of settlement after the solemnization of the marriage. Upon an interpleader issue, which was remitted for trial to the county court, the judge held that the agreement for a settlement came within the term "marriage settlement" in the exception contained in section 4 of the Bills of Sale Act, 1878, and was not, therefore, a bill of sale, and gave judgment for the claimant. The Queen's Bench Division affirmed this judgment. The execution creditor appealed.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—This agreement before marriage for a settlement is clearly a "marriage settlement" within the exception in section 4, and is excluded from the operation of the Act.

LOPES, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. I have no doubt that the term "marriage settlement" in section 4 was intended to include, not only settlements by deed, but also every instrument the intention and effect of which is to create a trust for the purpose of carrying out the provisions for the marriage.

KAY, L.J., concurred.

Friendly society—Misappropriation by officer—Conviction and order for repayment — Imprisonment for default—Remedy by action—Friendly Societies Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 60), s. 16, sub-section 9.

The defendant, an officer of a friendly society, was charged under section 16, sub-section 9, of the Friendly Societies Act, 1875, with misappropriation of certain money. He was convicted and ordered to pay a penalty and to repay the money, and, in default of compliance with this order, he was imprisoned for two months, with hard labour. An action having afterwards been instituted against him to recover the misappropriated money,

Held, that his conviction and punishment under the statute was a bar to the remedy by action.

Appeal from the decision of a divisional court (Pollock, B., and Charles, J.) reported [1891] 1 Q. B. 401.

The action was brought by the trustees of a friendly society in the Derbyshire County Court against the defendant, who was an officer of the society, to recover money misappropriated by him. The defendant had previously been charged, under section 16, sub-section 9, of the Friendly Societies Act, 1875, with the misappropriation of the money, and had been convicted and ordered to pay a penalty and to repay the money. He made default in complying with this order, and was thereupon imprisoned for two months with hard labour, and served his sentence.

The county court judge gave judgment for the plaintiffs, but the Divisional Court, on the authority of Knight v. Whitmore, 33 W. R. 907, held that as the plaintiffs had availed themselves of the remedy provided by statute, and the defendant had been convicted and punished under the proceedings so taken, such conviction and punishment was a bar to the plaintiffs' remedy by action.

The plaintiffs appealed.

By section 16, sub-section 9, of the Friendly Societies Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 60), "If any person obtains possession by false representation or imposition of any property of a society, or, having the same in his possession, withholds or misapplies the same, or wilfully applies any part thereof to purposes other than those expressed or directed in the rules of he society, and authorized by this Act, he shall, ont the complaint of the society, or of any member authorized by the society, or the trustees or committee of management of the same, or by the central office, or of the chief registrar, or any assistant registrar by his authority, be liable on summary conviction to a penalty not exceeding £20 and costs, and to be ordered to deliver up all such property or to repay all moneys applied improperly, and in default of such delivery or repayment, or of the payment of such penalty and costs aforesaid, to be imprisoned, with or without hard labour, for any time not exceeding three months, but nothing herein contained prevents any such person from being proceeded against by way of indictment if not previously convicted of the same offence under the provisions of this Act."

Lord HALSBURY, L.C.—I am of opinion that this appeal must be dismissed. The Legislature has, for reasons of its own, passed a statute which gives a peculiar procedure—a procedure which is not common to our law. It is partly criminal and partly civil. Ordinarily, the mere fact that a person had undergone a punishment for the misappropriation of money would be no answer to an action of civil debt for the money. The old principle, that criminal proceedings must be instituted before suing for the debt, has nothing to do with the present case. That was merely a question as to the priority of procedure.

In the present case the proceedings are mixed by the Legislature. The justices have the power to punish for the misappropriation of the money and to order its repayment, and in default of the payment of the penalty or the repayment of the money to order the defendant to be imprisoned. The Legislature has expressly saved the right to indict the defendant for his offence; but there is no saving of the civil right to sue him for the money which he has misappropriated.

In this case the defendant has been ordered to repay the money, and on his default execution has issued against him in the manner prescribed by the Act—that is to say, he has been imprisoned. It is, I think, impossible to say that, on the true construction of the section, that imprisonment does not amount to execution against him. That execution has been satisfied, and therefore there is no power now to sue for the debt.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—Section 9 makes some offences punishable which were not criminal before the passing of the statute. The magistrates are, I think, bound by it to inflict penalties for those offences in addition to ordering the repayment of the money. It is part of the sentence that the money should be repaid, and the result of non-payment is that the defendant may be sent to prison. That is, therefore, both a punishment and a mode of exection, and it is execution with regard to the repayment of the misappropriated money. Therefore, before a tribunal having jurisdiction, the defendant has been ordered to repay a sum of money, and execution has issued against him for the amount by imprisonment under the section. The plaintiffs were not obliged to proceed under the section, but they might have sued civilly for the money. They have chosen the former remedy, and I do not think a civil action is now open to them.

FRY, L.J.—I agree that this appeal fails. The section inflicts a penalty for certain acts, and enables the justices to order the repayment of money misappropriated. It couples the default in the payment of the penalty with the default in the repayment of the money, and enables the justices to commit the defendant to prison for either default. That imprisonment amounts to execution, and is, therefore, a satisfaction of the judgment. No civil action can, therefore, be afterwards brought for the same cause of action.

BLACKMAN v. FYSH. (a.)

Will—Life estate—Forfeiture—"Taken in execution by any process of law"—Receiver—Equitable execution—Contingent remainder—Executory devise.

The testator by his will of the 28th of November, 1870, devised real estate to his son for life, and after his death to all the children of his said son, whether then or thereafter to be born, who should attain twenty-one, or, being a daughter, should marry under that age, as tenants in common. He declared that his said son should not have any power to sell or dispose of his life estate, and, in case his said son should attempt to sell or dispose of the same, or become bankrupt, or the estate should be taken in execution by any process of law for the benefit of any creditor, then he declared that the devise to such son should immediately become void as if such son were then actually dead, and that the estate so devised to him should thenceforth vest in the persons who, under the devises thereinbefore contained, would be next entitled thereto. The testator died in February, 1879; the son took possession; and on the 9th of December, 1887, a receiver was appointed of the rents of the son's estate. At that date one of the son's children had attained twenty-one, two had not attained that age or married, and one was not yet born.

Held, that by the receivership order the son's estate had been taken in execution within the intention of the testator, and that it had ceased.

Held, further, that, in order to carry out the testator's intention, the gift over must be construed, not as a contingent remainder, but as an executory devise, so as to enable all the son's children in existence at the date of the order, or born or to be born thereafter, to share in the property on their attaining twenty-one or marrying.

By his will, dated the 28th of November, 1870, James Henry Fysh gave and devised certain real estate in the parish or lordship of Tilney All Saints and Tilney St. Lawrence, in the county of Norfolk, in the following terms:—

"I give and devise unto my son James Henry Fysh all my messuages, lands, tenements, and hereditaments situate in the parish or lordship of Tilney All Saints and Tilney St. Lawrence, in the county of Norfolk, as the same are now in the occupation of Stephen Gregory, and of what nature or tenure soever the same may be, to hold the same unto my said son for his natural life, and from and after his decease I give and devise the same estates unto, between, and amongst all and every the child and children of my said son, whether now or hereafter to be born, who shall live to attain the age of twenty-one years, or who, being a daughter, shall marry under that age, to hold the same to such child or children, if more than one, in equal undivided shares as tenants in common, and not as joint tenants, and to his, her, or their several and respective heirs and assigns for ever." And after devising certain other real estates to his daughters and their children, the testator provided as follows:—"And in case my said son or either of my said daughters shall depart this life without leaving lawful issue, or, leaving issue, all such issue shall depart this life under the age of twenty-one years and without leaving issue, then I give and devise the estates hereinbefore given and devised to such son or daughter so dying or whose issue shall so fail unto the survivors or survivor of my said children in equal undivided shares, and to the issue of such survivors or survivor, to hold to them, him, or her and their, his, or her issue for such and the same estates and interests therein, and subject in all respects to the same charges and restrictions as are herein declared with respect to the estates by this my will originally given and devised to such surviving children or child. I hereby expressly declare and direct that neither of them, my said son or daughters, shall have any power to sell, dispose of, mortgage, charge, or otherwise anticipate his or her life estate and interest in the estates hereby given and devised to such son or daughters respectively, or the rents or income arising from the same. And in case my said son or daughters, or any or either of them, shall attempt to sell, dispose of, mortgage, charge, or anticipate the same, or in case such son or daughters shall become bankrupt or insolvent, or the estates hereby given or devised to such son or daughters shall be taken in execution by any process of law for the benefit of any creditors or creditor, then I hereby declare that the gift and devise thereof to such son or daughter shall immediately become absolutely void and cease as if such son or daughters were then actually dead, and that the estates so given and devised to such son or daughter shall thenceforth absolutely vest in and belong to the person or persons who, under the devises and limitations hereinbefore contained, would be next entitled thereto."

On the death of the testator, on the 23rd of February, 1879, J. H. Fysh took possession of the property, and by an order made on the 9th of December, 1887, in an action of Lickorish v. Fysh, J. S. Lickorish was appointed receiver of the rents, profits, and moneys receivable by the said J. H. Fysh in respect of his interests under the will.

By an order of the 2nd of March, 1888, made in an action of Gregory v. Fysh, it was by consent ordered that S. Gregory, who had recovered judgment against J. H. Fysh for £545 3s., should be appointed receiver of the rents and profits of the said real estate at Tilney All Saints and Tilney St. Lawrence.

James Henry Fysh was twice married. By his first marriage, which took place on the 19th of August, 1862, he had two children, the plaintiff, Mary Harper Blackman, who was born on the 7th of October, 1863, and Alice Fysh, born on the 18th of May, 1871, besides others who died as infants. By his second marriage, which was celebrated on the 30th of December, 1887, he had two children, Ernest James Fysh, who was born on the 24th of June, 1888, and Frank Horton Fysh, born on the 20th of September, 1889.

The plaintiff claimed a declaration that the life interest of J. H. Fysh had ceased, and that she and her husband were absolutely entitled to the property.

Methold, for the children born after the receivership order.—The life estate ceased and the limitation over took effect as an executory devise in favour of all the children of J. H. Richings, for the second daughter.—The limitation over takes effect in favour of the plaintiff and the second daughter only.

Swinfen Eady, for J. H. Fysh.—The receivership orders do not amount to a taking in execution. Our life estate was a legal estate, and the creditor ought to have issued an elegit. The orders were therefore improper, as no receiver was necessary. When we consented to the second order that was not an "attempt to dispose" of the estate. It could only be an "attempt" if it would have been effectual but for this clause. Receivership orders are only equitable execution in certain cases, not in all, and they are not a taking in execution by process of law, so the estate was not forfeited: Neate v. The Duke of Marlborough, 3 My. & Cr. 407; Ex parte Charrington, 37 W. Edward Clayton, for the trustee in bankruptcy of the plaintiff's husband.

Renshaw, Q.C., in reply.—The orders are good and made by a court of competent jurisdiction; they cannot be questioned now. The testator intended the estate to go over if the personal enjoyment of it was interfered with. The first part of the will creates a contingent remainder, and a clause accelerating the interests cannot turn it into an executory devise. If it is an executory devise the class was fixed at the date of the first order, when the plaintiff had already attained twenty-one, and no children born after that time can take.

KEKEWICH, J.—This will gives rise to some questions of considerable difficulty, depending, not on the language of the testator, which, if read with reference to what has occurred and the claims set up, is apparently easy, but, in consequence of events which have happened—events which were contemplated by the testator himself—the two questions which call for decision, though intimately connected, are really independent. The first being whether, by reason of the receivership orders, or either of them, the defendant, J. H. Fysh, has forfeited his life interest. Of course, I use the word "forfeited" in the common sense, without reference to the particular language of the will, which does not employ the word "forfeiture." J. H. Fysh is made tenant for life with remainder to his children. To that remainder I shall have to return presently. The testator, after having disposed of the property in that way, and said all that he thought necessary about the remainders, provides against any disposition by his son of that estate for life. In doing so he refers, not only to the son's estate, but to the estates given to the daughters of a like character, and makes one comprehensive clause which, without being otherwise than in ordinary form, is rather a collection of forms than one form. It begins by declaring and directing that his son (reading it as applicable to the son only) shall not have power to sell or otherwise anticipate his life estate. I read that as an introductory paragraph expressing the object of the testator in what he is proceeding to do, and construing what he afterwards proceeds to do. Then he goes on to direct that if his son shall attempt to sell or anticipate his life interest [his lordship here read the clause] it shall go over in the manner which gives rise to the second question. Reading that by the light of his introductory paragraph I cannot doubt that he contemplated and wished to provide against his son being voluntarily or otherwise deprived of what has been called the personal enjoyment of the estate. That is the object of all these clauses, to secure the personal enjoyment to the donee, and to insist on the estate for life not going to a trustee in bankruptcy or other person who would interfere with that enjoyment. Reading it in that way I do not feel so much difficulty in the words "taken in execution by any process of law." On the 9th of December, 1887, a receivership order was made at the instance of Lickorish, a judgment creditor of J. H. Fysh, and he (Lickorish) was appointed receiver of the estate to a limited extent, so that for a time, and to a certain extent, J. H. Fysh was deprived of the estate. As, in my opinion, that order is sufficient to work a forfeiture, I think it unnecessary to say any more about the other order, which has peculiarities of its own not more favourable to the debtor. It is said that the former order is not a taking in execution by any process of law or for the benefit of creditors. The estate is taken, is taken by a process of law; the order stands and must be accepted as good. The estate is taken by a process of law, and it is taken for the benefit of a judgment creditor. The only question that remains is whether it can be strictly said to be "taken in execution." What is the meaning of "taken in execution"? Read irrespectively of authorities it means taken by process of law for the enforcement of a creditor's right in order to give effect to the rights of the creditor. So read there can be no doubt that it was so taken. It is said that the testator has used a technical phrase, and it must be read strictly, and that the appointment of a receiver is not execution. It has been called equitable execution over and over again. In In re Pope it was clearly declared to be a form of execution, and it was explained how that was. In the later case of In re Shephard there are no doubt strong expressions to show that it is not to be regarded as execution. Fry, L.J., says: "The idea that a receivership order is a form of execution is, in my opinion, erroneous"; but he explains this later on when he says: "It has often been spoken of by judges as equitable execution, but I am afraid that this concise expression has led to the erroneous idea that the appointment of a receiver is a form of execution which can be obtained without showing to the court the existence of the circumstances creating the equity, on which alone the jurisdiction arises," and that may be read as meaning that it is a form of execution, but is not execution of the particular character with which the court was then dealing.

It is only right to have regard to the particular case in hand, and not to extend the language of judges to a different state of facts from that before them. There they were determining whether the appointment of a receiver belonged to that class of executions by which a debt is enforced without any notice to the judgment debtor. They held that it was not equitable execution, but something different; equitable relief subject to the rules of equity, one of which is that the party must be summoned before the court and have an opportunity of being heard. That was really the question they had to consider, and I cannot take it that they determined that in an instrument such as this, where one must have regard to the intention of the testator, a receivership order which deprives a tenant for life of the enjoyment of his estate is not a taking in execution by any process of law for the benefit of a creditor. In that very case one of the Lords Justices pointed out that you may have a receivership order even at the instance of a legal mortgagee if circumstances justify it. So here, although apparently the tenant for life had the legal estate and the judgment creditor might and ought to have issued an elegit, I must, as there is the receivership order not touched, take it for granted that the judgment creditor was entitled to the receivership order. That being so, this proviso operates to deprive the tenant for life of his estate as from the date of that order.

The testator has given this property to J. H. Fysh for life, and then, by words which admit of no doubt, any doubt at least that has been suggested in argument, has given the property to the son's children, to sons at twenty-one and to daughters at twenty-one or marriage, in the common form of gift. If, therefore, I can find that the son is dead, I know to whom the estate will go, that is to his children to be ascertained at his death, or within a few months of it, and it is only those who take, and they will take vested interests at twenty-one or marriage. There is no doubt about that. Then, having determined the life estate on an event which he contemplates, and which has happened, the testator says what is to happen to the property in that event. Mr. Renshaw says that he has done so in a form meant to meet the case and avoid difficulties, but I hope there is a more modern and better form. There is a form common in settlements where the wife's property, after failure of her issue, is limited to her next of kin, according to the Statute of Distribution, excluding her husband. The form has often been tested, and is well understood. This form is intended to answer the same purpose. It is not perfect. The difficulty is that it contemplates as an actual event what is not an actual event. That is a necessary element in the case which has to be faced. Then one has to consider that the form ought to tell who are to take, not only in the events contemplated by the earlier part of the will, but at the time mentioned in the latter part, when the estate has determined on the occurrence of the unnatural event. The clause fails to do that with precision. The testator regards his son as actually dead, and says that the estate is to vest in the persons who, under the limitations hereinbefore contained, would be next entitled thereto. He does not say, as in the form I referred to, "to the persons who would have been entitled thereto if he had died at that moment"; but he expressly refers back to the devises hereinbefore contained. Who are the persons who would have been so entitled? All the children who attained twenty-one or married; there is no question about that. The clause seems to me to mean that the son is to be regarded as dead, and the estate is to go over as if he were dead to the persons specified in the will. The question is, Can they take? If this is a contingent remainder they cannot, because there is no estate to support the contingent remainders, and the will is before the late Act. Therefore, the one child who had attained twenty-one, the only child who had attained that age on the 9th of December, 1887, would take the whole in fee. That depends on Festing v. Allen. Both Mr. Renshaw and Mr. Methold relied on the definition of a remainder given by Mr. Jarman, which is also to be found in the same words in other books. It is an "estate which is so limited as to be immediately expectant on the natural determination of a particular estate of freehold limited by the same instrument." I have been referred to the case in Croke's Elizabeth, and to the remarks of Mr. Fearne upon it, and they point to and support the conclusion that you cannot have a remainder by proviso—that is to say, you cannot determine an estate by proviso so as to make the estate which comes in by virtue of the proviso a remainder.

That is the result of the authorities. If you can construe it as a remainder the difficulty is out of the way, but here I cannot do that, and I must rely on the case before the late Master of the Rolls, In re Lechmere and Lloyd, and on Miles v. Jarvis, which show that if you can give effect to the intention of the testator by construing the clause as an executory devise you ought to do so rather than defeat that intention. Here his intention to benefit all the children is clear, and if I construe the proviso as a remainder I exclude some of them and defeat his intention. I therefore come to the conclusion that the proper way to construe the will is to hold that the proviso creates an executory devise and not a remainder. Then who is to take? The plaintiff had attained twenty-one on the 9th of December, 1887, so she undoubtedly takes a share. Another daughter was in esse at that time, so she also takes if she attains twenty-one. Of Mr. Methold's clients one was in esse in the eye of the law and the other was not, but I think they must all be let in, as well as any children of J. H. Fysh who may be born hereafter. If it were a remainder the rule is stated at page 313 of Fearne on Contingent Remainders, "Where a contingent remainder is limited to the use of several who do not all become capable at the same time; notwithstanding it vests in the person first becoming capable, yet shall it devest as to the proportions of the persons afterwards becoming capable before the determination of the preceding estate." So if it were a remainder I should be obliged to let in those coming into being before the date of the order and no more. But construing it as an executory devise I am obliged to let in the whole of the children. That decision is assisted by In re Bedson's Trusts, where there was a bankruptcy, and the Court of Appeal affirmed Pearson, J., and let in the whole class. Pearson, J.'s judgment having been affirmed I do not think it otherwise than right to refer to what he said: "It is said that the words 'as if he was naturally dead' mean that the line is to be drawn at the date of bankruptcy, and that no child born after that date can possibly take any part in the fund. To my mind the proper meaning of the words is this, that the devolution is to take place in the same way as if the son had been then dead—that is to say, the fund is to devolve upon all his children who shall attain twenty-one."

That is what the testator here has intended and has said. So I must hold that not only the plaintiff but all the other children of J. H. Fysh take contingently on their attaining twenty-one or marriage.

KNOWLES v. SCOTT. (a.)

Company—Voluntary winding up—Liquidator, to what extent trustee—Companies Act, 1862, s. 138.

A liquidator in a voluntary winding up is an agent of the company, but not, strictly speaking, a trustee for, nor liable as such to, the creditors or contributories; and an action for damages will not lie against him for delay in handing over to a contributory his proportion of the surplus assets of the company, unless fraud, mala fides, or personal misconduct can be proved against him.

Trial of action.

This action was brought by a shareholder in the Leeds Forge Co. (Limited) against the liquidator under a voluntary winding up of that company with a view to its reconstruction.

(a.) Reported by C. HERBERT BROWN, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The company (hereafter referred to as the old company) had transferred all its business and assets to a new company, incorporated on the 5th of January, 1889, under the name of the New Leeds Forge Co., in consideration of a cash payment and a transfer of fully paid-up shares in the new company.

The plaintiff was entitled, in respect of his holding in the old company, to 400 fully paid-up ordinary shares in the new company, and also to a cash bonus of £6 per share.

The defendant received the cash payment from the new company in the early part of the year 1889, and the shares in the new company, to which he was entitled as liquidator, were held at his disposal as from March in that year, and on the 5th of April, 1889, he made his first transfer and payment to shareholders of the old company of the shares and cash payable to them.

The plaintiff alleged that he, or his solicitors on his behalf, had ever since the 16th of March, 1889, made frequent applications to the defendant for the shares and cash to which he was entitled, as he was desirous of selling them, the shares having risen to a considerable premium; that the liquidator had declined to accede to these applications, on the ground that 200 out of the 400 shares, and the bonus attributable to them, were the subject of a litigation then pending between the plaintiff and a Mr. Fox, and that the defendant could not deal piecemeal with the plaintiff's shares; and, further, that though the plaintiff had insisted on his right to the 200 shares which were unaffected by the litigation, and the bonus attributable to them, and had offered to give the defendant an indemnity in respect of them, the defendant refused either to pay the cash or transfer these shares. The plaintiff accordingly issued his writ on the 8th of November, 1889, claiming a declaration that the defendant was a trustee for the plaintiff of the 200 shares, and of all dividends declared thereon up to that date, and also of the bonus, amounting to £1,200, and an order on the defendant to transfer and pay the shares and cash, and damages.

On the 21st of January, 1890, the plaintiff received from the defendant a certificate for the 200 shares, and also the sum of £1,200, and a further sum of £97 10s. in respect of interim dividend received on the 200 shares; the action was therefore reduced virtually to an action for damages.

The plaintiff brought forward evidence showing that the shares had fallen considerably in value since the summer of 1889.

The defendant by his defence submitted that he was entitled to a reasonable time, after receipt of the shares and cash payable by the new company, within which to distribute the same among the shareholders of the old company, and that he had made the necessary transfers and payments within a reasonable time; and further alleged that he had never held or claimed to hold the shares or bonus, or to have any interest therein, except as liquidator, and that he had acted bonâ fide in the interest of, and as agent for, the old company, and submitted that he was under no personal liability to the plaintiff.

Haldane, Q.C., and W. D. Rawlins, for the plaintiff.—When a person fails to perform a duty undertaken by him in respect of another's property he is liable to the person injured by such failure, though there be no mala fides: Lewin on Trusts, 8th ed., p. 338. The defendant as liquidator was bound to obtain the shares and money from the new company and hand them over to the shareholders in the old company. A liquidator has repeatedly been spoken of as a trustee, and the property of a company in liquidation as trust property: In re Oriental Inland Steam Co., 22 W. R. 810, L. R. 9 Ch. 557, 559, 560, per James and Mellish, L.JJ.; Black & Co.'s case, 21 W. R. 249, L. R. 8 Ch. 254, 262, per Lord Selborne, L.C.; In re London and Caledonian Marine Insurance Co., 27 W. R. 713, 11 Ch. D. 140, per James, L.J. The damages must be assessed as in an action of detinue, to which this action at its commencement bore an analogy; and the plaintiff is entitled, as damages, to the difference in the value of the shares when first distributable and when received by the plaintiff: Williams v. Archer, 5 C. B. 318; Williams v. Peel River Land, and Mineral Co., 55 L. T. N. S. 689, 35 W. R. Dig. 67; to which must be added interest on the bonus and dividends: 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 42, s. 28; Meredith v. Bowen, 1 Keen, 270.

Chadwyck Healey, Q.C., Grosvenor Woods, and W. B. Lindley, for the defendant.—No precedent can be found for this action, because no such action lies against a liquidator. A liquidator is the agent of the company: In re Anglo-Moravian Hungarian Junction Railway Co., 24 W. R. 122, 1 Ch. D. 130, 133; and no action lies against the agent of a disclosed principal for mere negligence or omission, the action being properly brought against the principal, unless there has been some active misfeasance by the agent: Story on Agency, 9th ed., p. 376; Law v. Cotton, 12 Mod. 472, 488, 1 Lord Raym. 646. Assuming that the liquidator was guilty of negligence (for the plaintiff does not charge him with fraud or mala fides) the company should have been made defendant: De Rosaz v. Anglo-Italian Bank, 17 W. R. 724, L. R. 4 Q. B. 462; so a liquidator sues in the name of the company: Companies Act, 1862, s. 95. A liquidator, though subject to certain obligations imposed by statute, is not, strictly speaking, a trustee, and cannot be held to be in the position of a trustee so far as to be liable to creditors and contributories in respect of delay in getting in and distributing the assets. [They distinguished the cases relied on by the plaintiff as to a liquidator being a trustee, and the property of a company in liquidation being trust property.] The plaintiff could have asked for an allotment of the shares under the Companies Act, 1862, s. 138. As to damages, Williams v. Peel River Land and Mineral Co. decides that the difference in value asked for by the plaintiff is the maximum, not that it should be given in all cases. The sums on which the plaintiff asks for interest do not come within the statute.

Haldane, Q.C., replied.

ROMER, J.—In my judgment this action fails. It is an action, brought by a shareholder against the liquidator of a company in process of being wound up voluntarily, for damages arising from delay in delivering up to the plaintiff his proportion of cash and shares forming part of the company's assets, such delay being attributed to the negligence of the liquidator.

It is admitted that it is not a case of dishonesty or fraud, or of the liquidator knowingly and wilfully, in other words malâ fide, declining to hand over to the plaintiff his proportion of the assets. At most it is only a case of a liquidator making an honest mistake in judgment. That being so, I need not consider the exact circumstances of the case on which the defendant relies, as showing that in fact he was justified in what he did, and had been guilty of no negligence. For, in my opinion, even assuming the plaintiff's case as I have stated it to be correct, such an action as this cannot be maintained against a liquidator. The action is certainly novel; admittedly there is no precedent for it. The ground on which it is based is that the defendant as liquidator is a trustee for the plaintiff of his proportion of the assets in the liquidator's hands, and is liable as a trustee for negligence. In my judgment a liquidator is not a trustee in the strict sense of the word, nor is he subject to such liability as is contended for by the plaintiff. The consequences would be very serious if such a doctrine were to be upheld. If a liquidator were held to be a trustee for each creditor or contributory of the company, his liability would indeed be onerous, and would render the position of a liquidator one which few persons would care to accept.

On the plaintiff's behalf reference has been made to the dicta of distinguished judges in various cases, which describe a liquidator as a trustee, or as holding assets of his company in trust. No doubt, in a sense and for certain purposes, a liquidator may fairly enough be described as a trustee; but he is not, in my judgment, a trustee in the strict sense in which the plaintiff must use the term to enable him to succeed in this action. A director is not a trustee for the shareholders of the company, though he is often spoken of as a trustee, and no doubt rightly enough for certain purposes. The cases to which the plaintiff referred were In re Oriental Inland Steam Co.; Black & Co.'s case, and In re London and Caledonian Marine Insurance Co. In the first case James, L.J., used the expression "trust property," but that was with reference to the case then before the court; and, in my opinion, the Lord Justice used that phrase in order to point out that the property of the company had ceased to belong beneficially to the company after it had been wound up. In that case also a liquidator is spoken of as holding the assets fixed by the Act of Parliament, subject to a trust for equal distribution amongst the creditors, and it is said that the 95th section of the Act of 1862 constitutes "a trust for the benefit of all the creditors." These expressions are, however, evidently used, not in a general sense, but, and no doubt correctly, as showing that a liquidator holds the assets with certain obligations resting on him, and are obviously not intended to apply to a case like the present, nor was it intended to describe the liquidator of a company as a trustee for each creditor or contributory of the company.

In Black & Co.'s case the expression used is that the liquidator is "a statutory trustee." That phrase again was, I think, used, not in the sense contended for by the plaintiff, but with reference to the powers of a company and of its directors as distinguished from the powers of a liquidator, and I take it as intended to point out what the duty of the liquidator is. In In re London and Caledonian Marine Insurance Co. James, L.J., in pointing out that possibly a creditor who had not been paid his debt might have his remedy against the liquidator personally, confined his observations to a case where the liquidator had acted "knowingly and wilfully," or to a case where he had been guilty of bad faith or gross or personal misconduct.

In my view a voluntary liquidator is more correctly described as the agent of the company, an agent who has, no doubt, cast upon him, by statute and otherwise, special duties, amongst which may be mentioned the duty of applying the company's assets in paying creditors and distributing the surplus among the shareholders. James, L.J., referred to this as being his true position in the case of In re Anglo-Moravian Hungarian Junction Railway Co. If this be the true position of a liquidator (and I think that agency more nearly defines his true position than trusteeship), it is clear that he cannot as agent be sued by a third party for negligence, apart from misfeasance or personal misconduct.

It is said, if this be so, the plaintiff had no remedy. That is not the case. He certainly could have applied to the court under section 138 of the Companies Act, 1862. All I hold is, that a liquidator is not liable to an action for damages for delay in performing his duty when that delay was not wilful or fraudulent, and in no way arose from mala fides on his part.

The action therefore fails, and must be dismissed, with costs.

FECITT v. WALSH. (a.)

Sale of food—Adulteration of milk—Daily supply of milk under a contract—Samples taken from separate cans—Separate informations in respect of samples found to be adulterated—Evidence as to other samples—Effect of contract—Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 63), s. 9—Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1879 (42 & 43 Vict. c. 30), s. 3.

The appellant entered into a contract with the guardians of a union to furnish a daily supply of milk at a certain price; the milk was to be tested on each delivery, and a reduction was to be made in the price if there should be less than a certain proportion of cream. An inspector of weights and measures, acting under section 3 of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1879, procured a sample from each of five cans in which the daily supply was being delivered. Two of the samples being found to be deficient in cream, two separate informations were laid against the appellant under section 9 of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875, one in respect of each of the two samples.

Held, that it was right to lay separate informations; that the inspector was justified in taking separate samples; that the justices were justified in rejecting evidence as to the three other samples; and that, notwithstanding the contract, an offence had been committed against the statute.

Appeal from a conviction under the Sale of Food and Drugs Acts, by way of a case stated by justices under 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43.

The appellant, who was a contractor for the sale of milk, entered into a contract with the guardians of a poor law union to provide a daily supply of new milk free from adulteration at the price of eightpence per gallon.

By the terms of the contract the milk was to be tested on each delivery, and it was provided that whenever it should contain less than six degrees of cream, one penny per gallon was to be deducted from the price for every degree less than six.

The respondent, who was an inspector of weights and measures, acting under section 3 of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1879, procured samples from each of five cans in which the daily supply was being delivered. The samples having been analyzed two of them were found deficient in cream, and thereupon two informations were laid against the appellant under section 9 of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875, which is as follows:—"No person shall, with the intent that the same may be sold in its altered state without notice, abstract from an article of food any part of it so as to affect injuriously its quality, substance, or nature, and no person shall sell any article so altered without making disclosure of the alteration, under a penalty in each case not exceeding twenty pounds." The appellant desired to give evidence as to the analysis of the three other samples, but the justices refused to admit such evidence, and convicted the appellant, adjudging him to pay a fine of £10 and costs in each case. The questions for the opinion of the court were, first, whether it was right to lay separate informations; secondly, whether it was right to take separate samples from the five cans; thirdly, whether the justices were right in rejecting evidence as to the three other samples; fourthly, whether, having regard to the contract, any offence had been committed against the statute.

Little, for the appellant.

Poland, Q.C., and W. H. Cross, for the respondent.

DAY, J.—The first question which we have to decide is, whether more than one information could properly be laid. The milk, which was in course of delivery to the union under a contract, was in five cans, which was the usual daily supply. As between the appellant and the union, it would seem that each day's transaction constituted one sale. But we have here to deal with section 3 of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1879, which says that an inspector or a constable "may procure at the place of delivery any sample of any milk in course of delivery to the purchaser or consignee in pursuance of any contract for the sale to such purchaser or consignee of such milk." That is what the officer did in this case: he procured several samples, one from each of the five cans.

The section goes on to say that proceedings are to be taken "in like manner in all respects as if such officer, inspector, or constable had purchased the same from the seller or consignor under section 13 of the principal Act." So far as the officer was concerned there were five separate transactions; the effect of the Act is that he is to be deemed to have been the purchaser in each case. Therefore an information would lie in each case. The answer to the first question is, that more than one information could properly be laid.

The second question is, whether the officer was justified in taking separate samples. It is said on the part of the appellant that the milk was only divided into five parts for convenience in delivery, and that if all the milk had been put together, and a sample taken from the whole, it might have been found to contain a sufficient amount of cream; and that by the terms of the contract provision was made for testing each day's supply, and any deficiency in cream was to be met by a reduction in the price. But it is clear that the contract has nothing to do with the matter, and the officer was justified in proceeding on each sample separately.

The third question is, whether the appellant was entitled to give evidence as to the other samples. In my opinion, the result of any analysis of the other samples was quite immaterial, and the justices were right in refusing the evidence.

The fourth question is, whether, having regard to the contract, there was any offence under the statute. It is said that the contract is an answer to the charge that the milk was sold "without making disclosure of the alteration." But, as I have already said, I think we have nothing to do with the contract.

I am of opinion that the appeal must be dismissed.

LAWRANCE, J., concurred.

Appeal dismissed.

KUTNER v. PHILLIPS. (a.)

City of London Court—Jurisdiction—Defendant having "employment" within City—Jurisdiction of court—County Courts Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 43), ss. 74, 185—London (City) Small Debts Extension Act, 1852 (15 & 16 Vict. c. lxxvii.), s. 39.

The City of London Court has jurisdiction to try an action when the defendant has "employment" within the City of London, although he does not dwell or carry on business therein, and although no part of the cause of action arose therein, as section 39 of the London (City) Small Debts Extension Act, 1852, which gave this extended jurisdiction, has not been repealed by any of the subsequent County Court Acts, but is still in force.

Summons for a prohibition referred to the court by Pollock, B.

The summons was taken out, on behalf of the defendant in the action, for a writ of prohibition directed to the judge of the City of London Court and the plaintiff in the action, to prohibit any further proceedings in the action, upon the ground that the City of London Court had no jurisdiction to hear the action.

A default summons had been taken out in the City of London Court for a sum of £38, for money lent and interest.

No part of the cause of action arose within the City.

The plaintiff resided in Manchester, and the defendant resided in Lambs' Conduit-street, Holborn, outside the City of London, but he was "employed" as a clerk to a merchant in the City, so that he had "employment" within the City.

At the trial in the City of London Court objection was taken on behalf of the defendant that the judge had no jurisdiction to hear the action, as the defendant did not dwell or carry on business within the City, and no part of the cause of action arose therein. The learned judge held that he had jurisdiction, inasmuch as the defendant had "employment" within the City, and that was sufficient to give the City of London Court jurisdiction under section 39 of the London (City) Small Debts Extension Act, 1852.

During an adjournment of the hearing the present summons for prohibition was taken out on behalf of the defendant, and the question was whether section 39 of the above Act of 1852 was still in force, or whether that section was not repealed by the later County Courts Acts, and more especially by section 74 of the County Courts Act, 1888.

Section 39 of the London (City) Small Debts Extension Act, 1852 (15 & 16 Vict. c. lxxvii.), provided: "Such summons may issue provided the defendant or one of the defendants shall dwell or carry on business or have employment within the City of London or the liberties thereof at the time of the action brought, or provided the defendant or one of the defendants shall have dwelt or carried on business or shall have had employment therein at some time within six months next before the time of the action brought, or if the cause of action either wholly or in part arose therein."

Section 74 of the County Courts Act, 1888, is substantially the same, except that it does not give jurisdiction where the defendant has employment within the district of the court, but only where he dwells or carries on business within the district, or where the cause of action arose wholly or partly within the district.

The arguments in the case sufficiently appear in the judgment.

Cur. adv. vult.

April 15.—A. L. SMITH, J., read the following judgment:—

This is an application by the defendant for a writ of prohibition, directed to the plaintiff and the judge of the City of London Court, to prohibit further proceedings in this action, which was being prosecuted by means of that which is technically known as a default summons, upon the ground that, inasmuch as the defendant did not dwell or carry on business within the City of London or liberties thereof, but only had employment therein, the court had no jurisdiction to entertain the plaint.

In the year 1847, by the statute 10 & 11 Vict. c. lxxi., s. 40, jurisdiction was given to the court now called the City of London Court over defendants dwelling or carrying on business within the City or the liberties thereof.

In the year 1852 this jurisdiction was expressly enlarged, and by section 39 of the London (City) Small Debts Extension Act, 1852 (15 Vict. c. lxxvii.) it was enacted that a summons upon plaint might issue from the court "provided the defendant or one of the defendants shall dwell or carry on business or have employment within the City of London or the liberties thereof at the time of the action brought, or provided the defendant or one of the defendants shall have dwelt or carried on business or shall have had employment therein at some time within six months next before the time of the action brought, or if the cause of action either wholly or in part arose therein."

It was surmised at the bar that the reason for this extension of jurisdiction was that at this time many persons had ceased as theretofore to reside within the City, and as the court was supported by fees the extended jurisdiction was given to keep up the efficiency of the court; but, be this as it may, this extended jurisdiction was then in fact expressly given by statute. The question for determination is, has it since been taken away, or, in other words, has this section, which gave the extended jurisdiction, been repealed in whole or in part.

It is admitted on the part of the applicant that there has been no express repeal of this section; but it is argued that by reason of the legislation which has since taken place, and especially by reason of the provisions of the County Courts Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 43), it has been repealed by implication. Now a repeal by implication is only effected when the provisions of a later enactment are so inconsistent with, or repugnant to, the provisions of an earlier one, that the two cannot stand together, in which case the maxim "leges posteriores priores contrarias abrogant" applies: 2 Inst. p. 685.

Unless the Acts are so plainly repugnant to each other that effect cannot be given to both at the same time, a repeal will not be implied, and special Acts are not repealed by general Acts unless there is some express reference to the previous legislation, or unless there is a necessary inconsistency in the two Acts standing together: see Thorpe v. Adams, 19 W. R. 352, L. R. 6 C. P. 125.

Lord Coke in Gregory's case, Coke's Rep. Part 6, 19b, lays it down that "a later statute in the affirmative, shall not take away a former Act, and eo potius if the former be particular and the later general." Lord Hardwicke in the case of Middleton v. Crofts, 2 Atk. 650, at p. 674, is to the same effect.

This being the law, it now becomes necessary to examine the legislation which has taken place since 1852, and especially the County Courts Equitable Jurisdiction Act of 1865 (28 & 29 Vict. c. 99), the County Courts Acts Amendment Act of 1867 (30 & 31 Vict. c. 142), the County Courts Act of 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 50), and the last Act relating to county courts, being the Consolidation Act of 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 43).

By the County Courts Equitable Jurisdiction Act, 1865, equitable jurisdiction was granted to the City of London Court, therein called the City Court, in the same way and to the same extent as it was then granted to the county courts. There is nothing in this Act or in the rules framed thereunder in any way to suggest that the jurisdiction of the City Court was in any way altered or affected. By the County Courts Act Amendment Act, 1867, procedure by way of default summons was first given to the county courts and the City Court (see section 2), and the name of the City Court was thereby altered to that of the "City of London Court." By section 35 of this Act it was enacted that "the rules and orders in force for the time being for regulating the practice of and costs in the county courts, and forms or proceedings therein, shall be in force in the City of London Court," to the exclusion of any rules and orders now in force in that court; and the same fees shall be taken for proceedings in which jurisdiction is hereby given to the court as upon similar proceedings in the county courts, and such fees shall be applied in the same manner as the fees taken under the provisions of the said Act of 1852; provided that nothing in this Act, or in any of the Acts specified in Schedule D to this Act, shall take away, lessen, or diminish any of the powers, rights, or privileges of the judge of the said court, or the authority of the mayor, aldermen, and commons of the City of London in common council assembled in relation to such court, or to the judge or officers thereof, or to the fees taken therein, as such powers or authority existed previously to the passing of this Act."

Here I find a recognition of the City of London Court, and, as it seems to me, of its jurisdiction as granted by the Act of 1852. There is nothing in the rules or forms inconsistent with such jurisdiction, but, what is more, I find that by section 33 of the Act of 1867 five of the sections of the Act of 1852, namely, sections 118 to 122 inclusive, are expressly repealed, leaving wholly untouched the 39th section, which gave the extended jurisdiction to the court. There can, I apprehend, be no doubt that up to this date, at any rate, the City of London Court retained its extended jurisdiction unimpaired. The Act of 1875 further dealt with default summons, and left the matters of jurisdiction untouched.

I now come to the Act of 1888, and it was upon this that Mr. Scott mainly relied on behalf of the defendant. He said that section 185 was the section which now regulated the procedure of the City of London Court; that by this section it was provided that "the rules and orders in force for the time being for regulating the practice of and costs in the county courts, and forms of proceedings therein, shall be in force in the City of London Court to the exclusion of any other rules and orders"; that section 74 of the Act only applied to defendants dwelling or carrying on business within the jurisdiction of the county courts, and that the rules and forms—namely, rule 9 of order 5, and form 15, and rule 10 of order 5, and form 14—were only applicable to defendants dwelling or carrying on business within the jurisdiction, and were wholly inapplicable to a defendant who had only employment therein, and consequently, as by section 185 these rules, to the exclusion of all others, were those now in force in the City of London Court, it must be taken that the court had no longer any jurisdiction to proceed against a defendant who only had, or had had, employment within the City, and that the part of section 39 of the Act of 1852, at any rate, which gave jurisdiction over defendants employed within the City, must be held by implication to be repealed. The answer of the Attorney-General to this argument was conclusive. He first pointed out that section 185 in the Act of 1888 was all but identical with section 35 in the Act of 1867, where, as already stated, the jurisdiction was left untouched. He next pointed out that section 185 of the Act of 1888 in terms recognized the Act of 1852 as existing, and not by way of repeal; that section 74 of the Act of 1888 was in a part of the Act relating to "procedure and trial," and not to "jurisdiction"; that the Act of 1888 was a consolidation Act repealing the County Courts Acts from 1846 downwards, and re-enacting the material parts thereof; and that the rules and forms drafted thereunder were drafted to fit the county courts of the kingdom in general, and not the special jurisdiction of the City of London Court; and last, but by no means least, he pointed out that such a point as the present was expressly met by rules 24 and 28 of order 51, which, in my opinion, really concludes the matter.

There is, in my judgment, no foundation for the suggestion that the jurisdiction of the City of London Court, granted by the Act of 1852, has been repealed by implication.

Mr. Scott referred to the case of Blades and another v. Lawrence, 22 W. R. 643, L. R. 9 Q. B. 374, as showing that the City of London Court was now identical with the county courts as to jurisdiction. In my judgment it in no way touches the point now under discussion—namely, the jurisdiction of the City of London Court—and all that case decided, or was intended to decide, was that the judge of that court was to be proceeded against by rule, and not mandamus, since that was the procedure applicable to county courts, the City of London Court amongst the number, and that case is entirely beside the point of what defendants the court has jurisdiction over.

Mr. Danckwerts had also another point; it was this:—By section 22 of the Act of 1852 nineteen-fortieths of the fees were to be the judge's fees, nineteen-fortieths to be the clerk's fees, and two-fortieths were to be the high bailiff's fees, and in certain events the Corporation of London would be entitled to them, having in that event to pay the judge and officers. If, said Mr. Danckwerts, the extended jurisdiction is to be taken away, as the applicant now desires, obviously the fees coming to the corporation would be diminished, and that would be a lessening or diminishing of the rights or privileges or authority of the corporation within the meaning of the proviso to section 185, which are therein expressly reserved, and that, therefore, shows also that by the Act of 1888 it never was intended to curtail the jurisdiction granted by the Act of 1852.

But whether this be so or not, in my judgment this application must be refused, with costs here and below.

GRANTHAM, J., delivered a written judgment to the same effect, basing his judgment upon the broad ground that you cannot take away the jurisdiction given to a court in distinct terms by Acts of Parliament by mere inference or implication from passages in subsequent Acts, unless the language of those Acts makes the continued existence of the jurisdiction absolutely inconsistent with the subsequent legislative enactments.

Application for prohibition refused.

HENDERSON v. UNDERWRITING AND AGENCY ASSOCIATION (LIMITED). (a.)

Practice—Action on marine policy of insurance—Discovery—Part transit over land—Appendix K, No. 19.

In an action on a policy of insurance whereby certain goods were insured during their transit by post from Cadiz to Alexandretta, in Syria, the defendants sought to obtain from the plaintiff, prior to the delivery of the defence, the ordinary affidavit of ships' papers.

Held, that, inasmuch as the policy covered such portion of the transit as was by land as well as the portion which was by sea, the peculiar practice relative to the affidavit of ships' papers was not applicable, but that the defendants were entitled to discovery in the ordinary form under ord. 31, r. 12.

Appeal from chambers.

Action on a policy of insurance whereby the plaintiff insured with the defendant company two title deeds relating to certain houses and land at Aleppo in Syria, on their transit from Cadiz to Alexandretta, against certain perils, including peril of transit and conveyance and thieves. They were sent through the post, and in the course of their transit were lost.

Before delivery of the defence application was made at chambers for the usual order in actions on marine policies, namely, that the plaintiff should make an affidavit disclosing the ships' papers.

The master having refused the application the defendants appealed to Denman, J., at chambers, who referred the question to the court.

Hollams, for the defendants.—The question is whether or not this is a policy of marine insurance. The practice of granting discovery to underwriters on a policy of marine insurance has long been in existence, and has not been superseded by the Judicature Acts: West of England and South Wales District Bank v. Canton Insurance Co., 2 Ex. D. 472, 26 W. R. Dig. 77; China Steamship v. Commercial Assurance Co., 30 W. R. 224, 8 Q. B. D. 145. Grave inconveniences would arise if it is to be held that this was not a marine insurance because part of the transit was over land. When the substantial portion of the transit is by sea carriage the case is clearly one of marine insurance.

Scrutton, for the plaintiff.—The order here asked for would be an extension of the old practice of granting discovery in cases of marine insurance, and the defendants are entitled to nothing more than discovery in the ordinary form.

Hollams replied.

CAVE, J.—I do not think that this is a case to which the peculiar practice which prevails in marine insurance actions can be held to apply. No doubt the risk here is in some respects a marine risk; but that is not enough. It would be proper, however, that the plaintiff should make an affidavit of documents in the ordinary form under ord. 31, r. 12, at once. To that much, I think, the defendants are entitled.

JEUNE, J., concurred.

Order accordingly. The defendants to have fourteen days to deliver defence after affidavit filed.

Costs—Taxation—Solicitor—Negotiation fee—Commission paid by client to estate agent—Solicitors' Remuneration Act, 1881 (44 & 45 Vict. c. 44)—General Order, schedule I., r. 11.

In 1874 *the owner of an estate in Devonshire appointed a local surveyor as the estate agent, with a view to its development as a building estate, and agreed that his remuneration should be two and a half per cent. on the purchase-money of all the land sold during his agency. Held, by the Court of Appeal (Lindley, Bowen, and Fry, L.JJ.), affirming North, J., that this was "a commission paid by the client to an estate agent" within the meaning of rule 11 of the General Order under the Solicitors' Remuneration Act, 1881, and that the vendor's solicitor was not entitled to the scale fee for negotiating the sale under schedule I., part I.

Appeal from North, J.

In 1874 Sir Percy Shelley, the owner of the Boscombe Estate, near Bournemouth, appointed a Mr. Hankinson, a local surveyor, to act in the general management of that estate with a view to its development as a building property, and agreed that his remuneration should be two and a half per cent. on the capitalized value, at twenty-five years' purchase, of the rents reserved by all leases granted during his agency, and two and a half per cent. on the purchase-money of all lands sold during the same period.

Mr. E. C. Withall (now deceased) had, during his life, acted as Sir P. Shelley's solicitor, and in May, 1884, Mr. Hankinson being at the time ill, Mr. Withall was informed by Sir P. Shelley that a proposal for purchase had been made to him, and Mr. Withall was requested to go down to Bournemouth. Mr. Withall accordingly went to Bournemouth and had several interviews with Sir P. Shelley and the solicitor of the intending purchasers, the Conservative Land Society, and also with Mr. Hankinson, and ultimately a part of the property was sold to the Conservative Land Society for £14,400 subject to certain restrictive covenants as to the character of buildings, roads, &c., which were to be defined by Mr. Hankinson.

It appeared from the evidence of Mr. Hankinson, who was cross-examined, that he assisted in the negotiations by preparing plans and advising Sir P. Shelley and Mr. Withall on almost every point that arose, especially as to the price and as to the restrictive covenants to be imposed on the purchasers. When the contract was completed Mr. Hankinson sent in a charge for £360, being two and a half per cent. on the £14,400, which charge Sir P. Shelley paid, on being reminded that the amount, although large, was "a remuneration for work done during the preceding ten years."

After the death of Mr. Withall his executrix sent in his bill of costs to the vendor for negotiating and carrying through the sale above mentioned, and the present litigation arose in respect of an item of £76 which was charged for as the scale fee for negotiating the sale, and which, on taxation, was allowed by the taxing master. Objection was taken by Lady Shelley, the legal personal representative of Sir P. Shelley (who had died), to the allowance of this item, on the ground that, as Mr. Hankinson had been paid a commission on the sale, the solicitor, Mr. Withall, was not entitled to charge a negotiating fee in respect thereof.

The taxing master overruled the objection, and (inter alia) stated the following as his reasons for so doing: "It appeared to me that this (the payment made to Mr. Hankinson) was not a payment in respect of this particular sale, which the surveyor (Mr. Hankinson) neither effected nor negotiated, but for general services rendered as a retained estate agent and manager who, instead of receiving an annual salary, was paid by a percentage, an arrangement calculated to give him a special interest in promoting the development of the estate, and that it was not such a payment as would disentitle the solicitor to his fee for a negotiation which he was specially retained to conduct, and did, in fact, successfully carry into effect, fixing the price and completing the contract. The position of the surveyor with regard to the sale was, in fact, that of a salaried agent, though, instead of an annual salary, he was paid by a commission, and I considered that the circumstances were not such as made the payment to him a payment to an "estate or other agent," within the meaning of rule 11 of the Solicitors' Remuneration Order. The magnitude of the fee paid to Mr. Hankinson, which is so greatly in excess of the ordinary surveyors' fee, is of itself sufficient to show that it was not made in respect of this particular sale, but for general services; and the agreement under which he made and was paid his commission would have equally entitled him to it even if he had never been consulted about the sale or interfered in it."

Rule 11 of the General Order made under the Solicitors' Remuneration Act, 1881, so far as material, provides that "the scale for negotiating shall apply in cases where the solicitor of a vendor or purchaser arranges the sale or purchase, and the price and terms and conditions thereof, and no commission is paid by the client to an auctioneer or estate or other agent."

On an application by Lady Shelley to have the taxing master's certificate varied, the following judgment was delivered by

NORTH, J.—I think in this case the taxing master has made a mistake. The question arises under rule 11, which says:—[His lordship read the rule, and continued:—] Mr. Hankinson in his affidavit says this:—"The original offer was made direct to Sir Percy Shelley, and the negotiations were, in the first instance, conducted by his solicitor, Mr. Charles Withall. I was at the time recovering from an illness and unable to go to my office, but Mr. Withall attended on me on one or two occasions in company with Sir Percy Shelley and Mr. Bazalgette, the solicitor of the purchasers, at my private house, and I assisted in the negotiations by preparation of plans and advising." Then he is cross-examined, and he says:—"I remember the sale in 1884 to the Conservative Land Society. I prepared plans for it in relation to the negotiations, pending the negotiations before the signing of the contract, and gave advice to Sir Percy Shelley and his solicitor in relation to the negotiations on almost every point that arose. For instance, as to what price should be asked, which would require local knowledge which I possessed. I also advised that certain restrictions should be imposed as to building, and saw and had letters from Mr. Bazalgette, solicitor to the purchasers, pending the negotiations, dealing with the points which arose. I also saw and corresponded with Mr. Withall thereon. Mr. Withall brought Mr. Bazalgette with him to my house on one occasion."

(a.) Reported by M. J. BLAKE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

As to that there is no dispute. It is not contradicted. Now Mr. Withall, the solicitor, is dead, but there is not the slightest reason for doubting the accuracy of the statement there made. It seems to me clear that he did take part in what went on with respect to the negotiations. Neither party found the purchaser. I do not think that, in itself, is material. If a vendor takes a proposed purchaser to his solicitor and says, "This man wants to buy my property, you negotiate the terms of it with him for me," the solicitor might earn the scale fee, although he did not find the purchaser in that sense. Mr. Withall, in point of fact, did, to a certain extent, conduct the negotiations, but, in my opinion, he did not do so entirely. There were certain points he could not carry out himself; he was in communication with Mr. Hankinson about them, and some correspondence took place between them. Further than that, the arrangement was only for a sale upon certain terms and conditions which were settled by Mr. Hankinson.

Under these circumstances, in my opinion, Mr. Hankinson was taking part in the negotiations, and he was doing work for which, beyond all question, but for the existing arrangement as to the mode of payment, he would have been entitled to be paid in some way—whether by commission or not, if there had been a special bargain about it, one cannot tell; that is to say, if he had been called in on this occasion he might or might not have been paid by commission. I do not think the commission would have been as large as he got in the present case, but I do not see any reason to doubt that he, at any rate, might have had a commission. Then we find that, although the negotiations are to a certain extent conducted by Mr. Withall, yet he does not conduct them altogether, and they are partly conducted by Mr. Hankinson.

Then it is said that the latter part of rule 11 prevents the scale applying because it says that the solicitor of the vendor is to arrange the terms, and no commission is to be paid to an auctioneer or estate or other agent. In my opinion, the commission was paid in this case in respect of this very matter to Mr. Hankinson because he was the estate agent. It is quite true that if he had not been called in at all he still would have been entitled to this commission in respect of some other work. That is perfectly true, and if he had not been called in or consulted at all on this occasion, the fact that he had received for other work a payment measured by the amount realized by the sale made by the solicitor would not make it a payment of commission within the meaning of the rule. But Mr. Hankinson has done part of the work, he did part of the business in conducting what had to be done between the time of the parties coming together and the time when the contract was completed; he has taken a material and essential part in it. I will not say that Mr. Withall could not have done it without him if it had been left to Mr. Withall alone, but it was not; Mr. Withall was obliged to get the assistance of Mr. Hankinson for the purpose. He was to be paid for that work beyond all question, and the bargain was that he was to be paid by commission on it. It is not the less a commission because the sum paid here covered other work done in respect of other matters as well as what was done on this occasion.

Now, the taxing master, in his answers to the objections, says that no doubt a payment was made to the surveyor, and if it were a payment made entirely in respect of this particular sale no question could arise, and he uses the phrase in two other passages in the answers. I do not think it is essential that the commission which is paid should be paid entirely in respect of the transaction in question. If a commission is paid in respect of that transaction, it is immaterial, in my opinion, whether the commission covers other things done by the same person or not. In my opinion, the taxing master ought not to have allowed the fee which is given as the payment for all the work, when part of the work was not done by the solicitor. It is impossible to say that the whole of the work was done by him without the intervention of an estate agent who was paid a commission. I think the taxing master was wrong in allowing the scale fee. But, on the other hand, I think Mr. Withall was entitled to some payment for what he did. As to that, I understand his right to make out a bill in respect of those matters is not disputed.

Mr. Withall's executrix appealed.

T. Rolls Warrington, for the appellant.—The payment by the client to Hankinson was not a commission paid in respect of the negotiation in the particular sale in question, but it was remuneration for general services; it was calculated, no doubt, as a percentage on the price obtained in this sale, but Hankinson, even if he had done nothing at all in respect of this sale, would nevertheless have still been entitled to receive this payment. The words "commission paid to an estate agent" in rule 11 mean a payment made to the estate agent for negotiating work done by him in respect of the sale for which the solicitor is also claiming the negotiating fee. That appears plain by looking at the earlier part of the same rule, as to payment of a commission to an auctioneer, which must mean payment in respect of the actual auction. [BOWEN, L.J.—The solicitor here utilized the knowledge and obtained the advice of the local agent, who was paid for his services by a payment which included this matter: Re Wilson, 29 Ch. D. 790, 34 W. R. Dig. 185.]

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., and D. L. Alexander, for Lady Shelley, were not called on.

LINDLEY, L.J.—I think the construction put by North, J., on rule 11 is the right construction, and that the taxing master made a mistake in thinking, as he appears to have done, that the commission paid to the agent must be paid entirely in respect of the work done on the occasion of the particular sale. In the present case Mr. Withall obviously could not have got on with the work without the advice and assistance of the local agent, who had the local knowledge; and Hankinson had given advice in the very matter of this purchase, both as to the price to be accepted and also by preparing plans and advising the vendor as to the insertion of restrictive covenants. Hankinson was paid for everything he had done, including this amongst other things.

I therefore think that the case comes within the words as well as the scope and meaning of rule 11, and I adopt the view of North, J., and the reasoning of his judgment in its entirety. The appeal must be dismissed, with costs.

BOWEN, L.J.—I agree.

FRY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion.

A registrar of the Liverpool District Registry has no jurisdiction on a petition of course to make an order on a solicitor for delivery and taxation of his bill of costs.

Decision of Kekewich, J. (ante, p. 333), reversed.

Appeal from the decision of Kekewich, J., reported ante, p. 333.

The question raised by this appeal was whether a registrar of the Liverpool District Registry had power on an originating petition of course to make an order on a solicitor for delivery and taxation of his bill of costs.

The solicitor, D. H. Porrett, who resided in, and had his office at, Sheffield, had been employed by the Animal Products Co., whose registered office was in Liverpool; the costs, in respect of which the order appealed from was made, were incurred in certain bankruptcy proceedings taken by Porrett in London on the instructions of the company.

On a petition of course intituled in the Chancery Division of the High Court, and presented in the Liverpool District Registry by the company, the district registrar made an order directing Porrett to deliver to the company his bill of costs, and referring it to one of the district registrars at Liverpool to tax and settle the same.

A motion by Porrett to discharge the order of the district registrar was refused by Kekewich, J. (see ante, p. 333).

Porrett appealed.

Sir Horace Davey, Q.C., and Bardswell, for the appellant.—The effect of ord. 35, r. 6*a*, and of ord. 62, r. 18, has been misconstrued by the judge below. Sub-rule 2 of ord. 35, r. 6*a*, only applies to petitions requiring an answer, and it is only with respect to such petitions presented in the Liverpool or Manchester district registries that the district registrar has jurisdiction to act as a registrar of the Chancery Division. [They were stopped.]

Warmington, Q.C., and A. Durandu (P. O. Lawrence with them), for the company, the respondents.—Under the present practice (ord. 62, r. 18) every order of course on a petition not requiring an answer is made by a registrar of the Chancery Division. By ord. 35, r. 6*a*, the Liverpool and Manchester district registries are each made a branch of the High Court, and the registrar of each of these districts is put in the same position as a registrar of the Chancery Division, and has also the duties of a taxing master. All causes or matters in these registries in the Chancery Division have been assigned by the Lord Chancellor to Kekewich, J., under ord. 5, r. 9. [KAY, L.J.—Ord. 35, r. 6*a*, only says that the Liverpool District Registrar shall act as taxing master in a cause or matter pending in the Chancery Division and proceeding in that district.] The presentation of the petition makes it a matter pending. It is competent for any person to present any originating petition in the Liverpool or Manchester district registry, subject to the liability of being transferred. We admit, however, that all proceedings in an action, whether by petition or summons, must be taken in the court where the action itself is pending. There is no express provision in the Judicature Act or the rules that an originating petition of course to deliver and tax a solicitor's bill of costs may be presented and dealt with in the Liverpool or Manchester district registries, but such a power is implied from ord. 35, r. 6*a*, sub-rule (2). The words of sub-rule (2), "petitions presented in the district registries of Liverpool and Manchester," imply that all petitions may be presented in those districts, and the other words of sub-rule (2) only contain a limitation with respect to petitions requiring an answer, but do not exclude petitions not requiring to be answered. If there were no implied jurisdiction to present any originating petition at all in the Liverpool and Manchester district registries, why should there have been a practice prescribed for petitions requiring to be answered.

Davey, Q.C., in reply.—District registries were established by the Judicature Act, 1873, ss. 60—66, exclusively for the purpose and object of carrying on proceedings in an action begun by writ of summons. District registrars have only the ordinary jurisdiction to tax in causes commenced by writ of summons or originating summons. The defendant in an action begun in a district registry has an absolute right to have the proceedings carried on in London by appearing there: ord. 12, r. 7. Ord. 35, rr. 1—6*a*, expressly apply only where a cause or matter is proceeding in a district registry, and none of them give jurisdiction to originate a cause or matter there. No originating petition of course brought either under the Companies Acts or under the Solicitors Acts, or any other statutory jurisdiction, can be presented in the Liverpool or Manchester district registries. It lies on the respondents to show that this district registrar had authority to make this order for taxation. The district registrar of Liverpool is only entitled under ord. 35, r. 6a, to act as a registrar of the Chancery Division in certain cases and for certain purposes, and sub-rule (2) expressly limits his jurisdiction to act as such registrar, in the case of petitions, to petitions requiring answer.

LINDLEY, L.J.—This appeal is of some considerable importance to solicitors. In form it is an appeal from an order made by a district registrar of the Liverpool District upon a petition of course. It directs a solicitor, Mr. Porrett, to deliver his bill of costs; then it orders that that bill be referred to one of the district registrars at Liverpool to be taxed; and then there are other directions to which I need not refer.

Now, the costs which are to be so taxed are costs for work done by Mr. Porrett, who is a Sheffield solicitor, with reference to certain proceedings in bankruptcy taken by him in London at the instance of the petitioner, the petitioner being a limited company, having its registered office, as I understand, in Liverpool; so that the case may be put in this way—that the client lives in Liverpool, the solicitor lives in Sheffield, and the work done was done by him in London. The solicitor is not within the limits of the Liverpool District; the work done was not done within the limits of that district. It so happens that the client, the petitioner, lives within the district.

Now Mr. Porrett says, "You, the district registrar, have no authority to make an order upon me for the delivery of my bill, and for the taxation of that bill by the district registrar of Liverpool"; and he further says, "Even if there is any authority which would warrant such an order as that, this is a case in which the order ought to be transmitted to London in order that my bill may be taxed by a London taxing master."

The question, put in that short form, is one of importance, because it affects the power and authority of the Liverpool and Manchester district registrars to tax the bills of solicitors for work done outside the limits of those districts.

Now it is for those who support the order complained of, to show under what authority that order was made. Having attended closely to the Act of Parliament and to the rules (to which I will refer presently), the conclusion at which I have arrived is this, that there is no such authority. It is a negative conclusion which can only be got at by going carefully through the various Acts and rules. Certainly there is nothing in the terms of the Judicature Act of 1873, which created these district registries, which authorizes the district registrar of Manchester or of Liverpool to make such an order as this. There is no rule which authorizes, in terms, any district registrar, except possibly of Liverpool and Manchester, to make any order of the kind at all. It is no part at present of the general law or practice of the High Court that a taxing order such as this can be made by a district registrar. It is said that there is an exception as regards the district registrars of Liverpool and Manchester. We must look further into the matter to see whether that exception is established.

Now the order to tax a solicitor's bill is got in one of two ways. There is either a petition of course or, if there are special circumstances, there is a special petition. We need not deal with special petitions, because this is not a case in which a special petition is required. The order on a special petition, as I understand, is even now always made by the judge. An order on a petition of course used to be got at the Rolls. Under the present practice the order under a petition of course is made by one of the registrars of the Chancery Division, under ord. 62, r. 18. That rule refers both to petitions which require an answer, and to petitions which do not. The difference between the two happens to become of some little importance when we criticize the rules which are relied upon as giving the Liverpool District Registrar the jurisdiction or authority which he claims.

So far, therefore, as the Acts and rules to which I have referred are concerned, there is no power given to make orders for the delivery and taxation of bills to the district registrars, of any sort or kind.

But in 1886 and 1887 certain orders were made which do confer upon the registrars of the Liverpool and Manchester districts powers which are not enjoyed by the registrars of other districts. Order 35 relates to "proceeding in district registries," and rule 1 and the subsequent rules down to 6*a* each contain the words, "where a cause or matter is proceeding in a district registry." That is the language with which rule 6*a* begins. [The Lord Justice read rule 6*a*, and continued:—] The first point to consider is, what is the meaning of the expression "where a cause or matter is proceeding in a district registry"? "Is proceeding" must mean "is proceeding according to the statutory enactments or the rules made by the proper authority." A cause or matter cannot be said to be proceeding in a district registry simply because it has been improperly commenced there; the language is addressed to proceedings which are properly commenced and are properly proceeding.

Is there any authority for the making of an order of this kind by the registrar of the district? He cannot have such authority simply because someone asks him to make the order. When we examine what was done in 1887 we find that the power of the district registrar to make orders on originating summonses is expressly conferred. [The Lord Justice read rules 1 and 2 of the Rules of the Supreme Court, May, 1887, see Annual Practice, 1890—1, at p. 603, and continued:—] The first part of this rule 2, as to petitions requiring to be answered, applies to one portion of ord. 62, r. 18, to which I have already alluded. In the second part of this rule 2 nothing is said about orders of course; its terms contain nothing to confer upon the registrars of the Liverpool and Manchester districts any power to make an order of course.

Now the orders of course which remain according to the present practice are very few. The most important, probably, is the order of course made upon a solicitor to deliver his bill and have it taxed. There are other orders of course which relate to mere procedure. I do not know, and I certainly do not intend to say, that there is no power on the part of these district registrars to make orders of course of that latter sort as to matters which are properly pending before them. I think it very likely there is, because if there is a cause or matter commenced in the Chancery Division, properly proceeding in the district registries of Liverpool or Manchester, then ord. 35, r. 6*a*, would apply, and the registrars of those districts would have all the authority of the Chancery Division in those district registries, and could make those orders. But in the present case we have to deal with an order of a totally different kind—an order made upon originating petition—and I cannot anywhere find in any of the rules any authority whatever on the part of the district registrar to make such an order as this. It is very remarkable that, although in some cases, for anything I know, there may be orders made by the district registrars to tax certain costs relating to matters over which they have jurisdiction under ord. 35, r. 6*a*, yet the directions which Kekewich, J., has given as regards even such matters as these, are as follows:—"Delivery and taxation of bills of costs: On an application against a solicitor for delivery and taxation of a bill of costs, and delivery up of deeds, the district registrar shall hear the application, complete the evidence, and then refer it to the judge" (see Annual Practice, 1890—1, at p. 605); so that even in those cases it is not for the registrar to make the order, it is for the judge to make it. I do not think that that regulation applies to orders such as the one in the present case. I apprehend that it applies to such orders, if any, as can be properly made under ord. 35, r. 6*a*, i.e., orders for taxation in causes or matters commenced in the Chancery Division, properly proceeding in these district registries. This is not a case in which we have to deal with a cause or matter commenced in the Chancery Division which was in any sense properly proceeding in this district registry; and having regard to the nature of the application on which this order was made, no authority whatever can be found, in the Judicature Act or in the rules, for this district registrar to make this order.

Under these circumstances it appears to me that the order must be discharged, with costs both here and below, and if Mr. Porrett has paid the costs he must have them back, and if he has deposited any money, that money must be returned to him.

KAY, L.J.—I also think that the order made by the district registrar in this case is without any vestige of authority. It is an order made on a petition for taxation, which petition need not be answered. It was merely a petition of course; such a one as used, before the orders now in force, to be dealt with by the secretary of the Master of the Rolls. The old practice which is mentioned in ord. 62, r. 18, was, that upon the presentation of such a petition as this the order was "drawn up, passed, and entered in the office of the secretaries of the Master of the Rolls." Ord. 62, r. 18, substituted for that practice in the office of the secretaries of the Master of the Rolls, a power for the senior registrar of the Chancery Division to make the order on the petition. [The Lord Justice read ord. 62, r. 18, and continued:—] The registrar of the local district must show, if he can, how he has got this power, which this rule says must be exercised by a registrar of the Chancery Division. There are only two ways in which it is possible for him to do that. He must somehow or other, find that power in ord. 35, r. 6*a*, or in sub-rules (1) and (2) of that rule; and really the only sub-rule in any way bearing on the point is sub-rule (2), which enables the district registrars of Liverpool or Manchester respectively to answer petitions requiring an answer, and which are presented in these district registries respectively, and says in terms that ord. 62, r. 18, "shall as regards such petitions"—i.e., petitions which require an answer—"be construed as if the district registrars of Liverpool and Manchester respectively were mentioned in place of the registrars of the Chancery Division." It leaves out, however, and I have no doubt designedly leaves out, the other part of rule 18 of order 62, which refers to petitions that do not require an answer, and upon which the order is made by the registrars of the Chancery Division, and it does not give to the registrars of the Liverpool and Manchester district registries any power whatever to make such order. Therefore, rule 35, sub-rule (2), does not help them, but, on the contrary, it seems to me to indicate most clearly that it never was intended that they should have such a power as this to make orders upon petitions of course. I am speaking now of originating petitions of course, like this petition, which is what we have to consider.

Then the only other possible way in which it can be suggested that such a power is vested in the registrars of the districts of Liverpool and Manchester is under rule 6*a* itself of order 35. As Lindley, L.J., has pointed out, that rule begins with the words, "Where a cause or matter . . . is proceeding in the district registry" of Liverpool or Manchester; so that the only power that it gives to the district registrar is to do the things which are contemplated by the rule in a cause or matter which at the time is proceeding in such district registry; and it provides that "the district registrar shall act in respect thereof"—i.e., in respect of the cause or matter then proceeding in the district registry—"as taxing master, according to the directions to be given from time to time" by the judge.

Upon that, a most courageous argument has been advanced. It was said: "This is a proceeding which was at the time pending in the district registry because this is an ex parte petition: this originating petition was presented in the district registry, and, therefore, when the application was made to the district registrar to make the order, there was a proceeding pending in the district registry." Of course, if that were the true construction of the rule, you might make any kind of application you liked in the district registry, and say, "It is pending, because I began it there." It is quite obvious, that is not the meaning of the rule. The meaning of the rule is like the meaning of the previous rules of the same order—i.e., where a proceeding has to be taken in a pending cause or matter—and it will not do to say that an originating proceeding is a pending cause or matter for the purpose of that rule. The light which is thrown upon rule 6*a* by sub-rule (2) makes the matter clear beyond the possibility of doubt. Sub-rule (2) excludes carefully any suggestion of a power to the district registrar to make an order like this upon an ex parte petition not presented in any cause or matter. Reading the two together, it is impossible, to my mind, to have the least doubt that no such power was ever given to the registrars in Liverpool or Manchester, or was intended to be given by these rules. There the matter begins and ends, because it has not and could not have been contended that in any other part of the Judicature Act or rules is there anything with regard to power being given to these district registrars to make an order of this kind.

I think that the district registrar has exceeded his authority entirely, and the order must be discharged, with the consequences which have been indicated by my learned brother.

In re AN ARBITRATION BETWEEN WILLIAMS AND STEPNEY. (a.)

Arbitration—Power of arbitrator to award costs—Submission before, arbitration after, the 1st of January, 1890—Submission silent as to costs—Arbitration Act, 1889 (52 & 53 Vict. c. 49), ss. 2, 25.

Where an arbitration took place after the commencement of the Arbitration Act, 1889, pursuant to a submission which had been entered into before the commencement of that Act, and which contained no power to the arbitrator to deal with the costs of the reference and award,

Held, that the combined effect of sections 2 and 25 of the Act was to give the arbitrator power to deal with them.

Motion to set aside the award of an arbitrator, on the ground that he had exceeded his jurisdiction in giving the successful party the costs of the reference.

The submission to arbitration had been entered into by a clause in a mining lease made in 1839, but the hearing and the award took place in 1890. The submission was silent as to the power of the arbitrator to deal with the costs, but the arbitrator in his award had given the costs to the successful party. The other side appealed.

W. Graham and Glascodine, for Sir E. Stepney, in support of the motion.—The arbitrator has exceeded his powers. He had no power to award costs under the submission, which is silent as to the costs of the reference, but he acted as if the Arbitration Act of 1889 applied to the reference. In that he was wrong, as by section 25 "this Act shall not affect any arbitration pending at the commencement of this Act, but shall apply to any arbitration commenced after the commencement of this Act under any agreement or order made before the commencement of this Act." The commencement, by section 29, was the 1st of January, 1890. Section 25, therefore, applies only to proceedings on an arbitration, and has no reference to submissions entered into before the passing of the Act. The consent of the parties to the submission in this case must be taken to have been made subject to the law as it then was. To hold otherwise would be manifestly unfair.

Blake Odgers, for Mr. Williams, in support of the award.—The award is right, because section 2 of the Arbitration Act, 1889, says that "a submission, unless a contrary intention is expressed therein, shall be deemed to include the provisions set forth in the first schedule of the Act." At the end of the first schedule it is provided that "the costs of the reference and award shall be in the discretion of the umpire or arbitrators, who may direct to and by whom, and in what manner, those costs, or any part of them, shall be paid, and may tax or settle the amount of the costs to be so paid, or any part thereof, and may award costs to be paid between solicitor and client." These provisions apply because of section 25, which makes this Act apply to an arbitration commenced after the commencement of this Act under any agreement or order made before the commencement of the Act. That is exactly the case here, and the party who objected to the application of the Act ought to have given notice of intention to withdraw.

MATHEW, J.—This motion must be allowed. The arbitrator was wrong in supposing that he had power to deal with the costs. To hold otherwise would clearly alter the agreement made between the parties without giving them any opportunity of expressing a contrary intention.

It is clear that up to January 1, 1890, it was competent to the parties to a submission to agree that the arbitrator should have no power to deal with the costs, and it still continues to be competent to the parties to make an agreement to that effect. But it is contended that where the submission is silent as to costs, section 2 of the Arbitration Act, 1889, confers on the arbitrator, whether the submission was entered into before or after the commencement of the Act, a power to award costs. Such a construction is to my mind unreasonable, and contrary to the intention of the statute. I think that the word "submission" in section 2 refers only to submissions subsequent to the Act, and the word "arbitration" in section 25 applies to the procedure in arbitration as distinguished from the submission to arbitration.

DAY, J., concurred.

June 8.—From this decision Mr. Williams appealed.

Blake Odgers, for the appellant.

W. Graham, Gwynne James, and Glascodine, for the respondent.

The arguments were the same as in the court below.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—In the present case the question turns on the construction of sections 2 and 25 of the Arbitration Act, 1889. Section 2, if it stood alone, would no doubt relate only to submissions entered into after the commencement of the Act. That is an ordinary rule of construction—that an Act, unless it is expressly said to be so, is not retrospective. It would apply, therefore, to submissions which were entered into after the Act came into force, but even to those submissions it would add something which they did not already contain. The argument, therefore, that the Legislature would not assume to alter the intention of the parties is fallacious. But in the present case this submission, which was made before the Act came into force, is silent as to the costs of the reference. If section 2 applies to it, therefore, it reads into the submission a power to the arbitrators to deal with those costs, unless a contrary intention is expressed therein. But section 2 of the Act does not stand alone. There is section 25, which says that "this Act" shall apply to arbitrations commenced after the Act in pursuance of an agreement or submission entered into before the Act. "This Act" means the whole of the Act, including section 2, and not merely, as the respondents contend, "so much of this Act as relates to proceedings in arbitrations." There is nothing either in the context or the subject-matter of the Act which compels us so to read it. Therefore if the whole Act applies to arbitrations commenced after the Act in pursuance of submissions before the Act—which is precisely the case here—section 2 applies, and if section 2 applies the arbitrators have power to give costs. When it is remembered that, under the old system, if a submission was silent as to the costs of the reference, neither the arbitrator nor the court had power to award them to the successful party, but each party had to pay his own costs, the justice of such an addition becomes apparent, and it may well have been that the Legislature, knowing this, sought, by section 2, to remedy this injustice, and by section 25 made the whole Act, including the enactments of section 2, applicable to such a case as the present.

I am therefore unable to agree with the decision of the Divisional Court, and I think that this appeal must be allowed.

LOPES, L.J.—In this case all the proceedings in the arbitration took place after the 1st of January, 1890, but the submission, which gave no power to the arbitrator to award costs, was entered into before that date. The Divisional Court have held that the Act gave the arbitrators no power to award costs, and they have therefore set aside the award. I am unable to agree with them. The question entirely depends on the construction of sections 2 and 25 of the Arbitration Act, 1889. The object of section 2 is to bring some useful provisions of general applicability into every submission unless the contrary is expressed in the submission, among them being the power to arbitrators to deal with the costs. I agree that if it stood alone that section would apply only to submissions entered into after the passing of the Act. But then comes section 25, by which "this Act" is made applicable to such a case as the present where the arbitration is after and the submission before the commencement of the Act. Clearly "this Act" means the whole Act, and includes section 2 and the schedule. It is impossible therefore to escape the conclusion that section 2 is intended to apply to such a case as the present, nor is it unreasonable that it should do so, considering, as the Master of the Rolls has pointed out, that if the submission was silent on the subject there was no power under the old rules to award costs to a successful party, however heavy they might be. In my opinion the section was introduced to avoid this hardship. I therefore agree that this appeal must be allowed.

KAY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The Master of the Rolls has so exactly expressed my view of the case that I have nothing to add.

Solicitor—Costs—Common order to tax—Suppression of material facts—Right to obtain second order of course —Solicitors Act, 1843, s. 37.

A client is not entitled to obtain a second common order to tax as of course where he has allowed the first to lapse by effluxion of time, nor may he suppress material facts in obtaining the order.

Motion.

This was an application by a solicitor to discharge a common order to tax his bill of costs.

The client, Peat, issued a writ in the Queen's Bench Division against the solicitor, Webster, on the 27th of June, 1890, for a sum of money alleged to have been received by the solicitor for the client's use. On the 1st of July, 1890, the solicitor delivered his bill of costs, and on the 17th of July he delivered his defence in the action, in which he claimed to be entitled to set off an amount equal to the plaintiff's claim for professional charges and other items. On the 30th of July, 1890, issue was joined and a settled account pleaded. On the 1st of October, 1890, the plaintiff obtained ex parte in the Chancery Division the common order for taxation of the defendant's bill. No mention of the existing action was mentioned on this application.

The order was served on the defendant on the 29th of October, 1890. On the 3rd of December, 1890, the plaintiff commenced a second action in the Queen's Bench Division against the defendant, claiming a further sum in respect of money received by the defendant for the use of the plaintiff. On the 3rd of February, 1891, an order was made consolidating the two actions. On the 5th of February the defendant delivered his defence claiming the same set off as in the other action. Both actions were entered for trial.

On the 11th of February the plaintiff obtained a second common order to tax. No mention of the former order or of the existing actions were made on this application. This order was served on the 16th of February. Notice of motion was given to discharge this order for irregularity upon the grounds of the suppression of material facts in the petition on which the order was made, and that the application for the order ought to have been made to the Queen's Bench Division, in which the consolidated actions were pending, and that the order did not contain any special directions applicable to the case.

Oswald, for the solicitor.—The order of the 11th of February was irregular and should be discharged. The order of the 1st of October to tax exhausted the client's remedy by order of course. The effect of the order is to prevent the solicitor from commencing any proceedings in regard to his bill pending the reference for taxation. The order of the 11th of February was obtained by a suppression of material facts: In re Thompson, 34 W. R. 112, 30 Ch. D. 441; Seton on Decrees, 4th ed., p. 604; In re Farington, 33 Beav. 346, 13 W. R. Ch. Dig. 85; In re Barnard, 2 De G. M. & G. 359. The application should be made to the Queen's Bench Division: In re Pollard, 36 W. R. 515, 20 Q. B. D. 556.

Foa, for the client.—There is nothing in the Solicitors Act to show that a second order of course cannot be obtained. The form of order is the same in both divisions: Lumley v. Brooks, 37 W. R. 454, 41 Ch. D. 323.

Oswald replied.

NORTH, J.—The order of the 1st of October produced an effect, though it was not served on the solicitor until the 29th of October, and on the next day became ineffectual for the future by the lapse of time, as it was always capable of being put in force against the solicitor if he had taken any proceedings against his client to recover his costs. Nothing, however, was done under the order. The first point urged on behalf of the solicitor is that the order of the 1st of October exhausts the client's statutory remedy by order of course, and that he could not afterwards obtain a second order of course to tax the same bill. A further point was that material facts were suppressed when the second order was obtained. I think that when a client has obtained the common order to tax, which prevents the solicitor from suing the client for the bill during the reference, the client ought not to apply for a precisely similar order of course, suppressing the fact that a prior order had been obtained and allowed to become ineffectual. If he could do so it would follow that a client might obtain monthly successive orders of course for taxation, and during a whole year prevent the solicitor from taking any proceedings for the recovery of his bill. I do not think the Act intended him to have this power. A second order upon special grounds he might, of course, be entitled to.

The existence of the action which the client had commenced against the solicitor, and in which the amount of the bill of costs was set off, was a second fact suppressed. The form of order in such a case is in a different form. The order for taxation after action brought provides for the stay of further proceedings against the client in respect of the bill pending the reference, and if anything is due to the solicitor for the taxation of his costs of the action, and the addition of the amount to the sum found due. In the present case other matters than the bill of costs only are involved, and the order was obtained by a suppression of material facts.

The question arises whether I shall discharge the order altogether as having been irregularly obtained, or whether it should be left standing so far as it directs the master to tax and certify the amount due. As a general rule an irregular order should be discharged. In In re Thompson the Court of Appeal, whilst holding that, under the circumstances, the clients ought not to have obtained the common order to tax, but ought to have obtained a special order upon a statement of the facts, yet allowed the order to stand, but not allowing the clients the costs of obtaining it. Following this case, I leave the order which directs the taxation of costs standing, and discharge the part which directs payment of the amount found due.

The question of payment of the costs of this application and of the amount to be certified under the order for taxation I leave to be dealt with by the judge at the trial.

In re CORDOVA UNION GOLD CO. (LIMITED). (a.)

Company—Winding up—Calls—Agreement to pay unpaid capital at future dates—Right of liquidator to immediate call of whole sum—"Liability"—Companies Act, 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 89), ss. 7, 102.

By an agreement made on the reconstruction of a company it was provided that the new company should allot to the shareholders shares in proportion to their paid-up capital in the old company, and that the sums remaining unpaid on such new shares should be paid to the new company on certain fixed dates, the last two of which had not yet arrived. The agreement was confirmed, and, in response to a circular by the new company inviting applications for shares on the terms of the agreement, the respondents applied for and received allotments of shares. In the memorandum of association of the new company it was stated that one of the objects of the company was to carry out the agreement; it was adopted by and scheduled in full to the articles. The new company was now being wound up compulsorily, and the liquidator applied for an order for the immediate payment of all the unpaid instalments.

Held, that the contract had been superseded by the statutory rights of the liquidator, and that he was entitled to an immediate call.

Adjourned summons.

This was an application by the official liquidator of the company that a call to the amount of one shilling per share might be made in respect of two instalments of sixpence per share payable under the terms of the allotment on the 1st of August, 1891, and the 1st of February, 1892, respectively.

The winding-up order was made in March, 1890, and the liquidator now proposed to call up all that remained unpaid on the shares. This was resisted by some of the contributories under the following circumstances.

The company was registered in October, 1888, for the purpose of acquiring the business and property of the Union Gold Co., and to adopt and carry into effect an agreement of the 8th of October, 1888, made between the Union Gold Co. of the one part and Joseph Wace, on behalf of the Cordova Co., of the other part.

By the agreement the new company were, in consideration of the sale, to allot to every member of the old company in respect of each share held by him on which 20s. stood credited on the books of the old company one £1 share in the new company with 15s. credited as paid thereon, and a similar proportion in respect of shares on which less was credited as paid. The sum remaining to be paid up on each share to be allotted by the new company was to be payable to the new company as follows:—1s. per share on allotment; 1s. per share on the 1st of February, 1889; 6d. per share on the 1st of August, 1889; 6d. per share on the 1st of February, 1890; 6d. per share on the 1st of August, 1890; 6d. per share on the 1st of February, 1891; 6d. per share on the 1st of August, 1891; and 6d. per share on the 1st of February, 1892.

This agreement was mentioned in the memorandum of association, where it was stated that one of the objects of the new company was to adopt and carry it out. The articles of association provided for its adoption, and it was scheduled in full to the articles.

The shareholders in the old company passed resolutions confirming the agreement, and the new company then sent them a circular inviting them to take shares on the terms of the agreement.

It was admitted that the respondents had taken their shares on these terms.

Warmington, Q.C., and A. Cross, for the summons.—The court is not bound by the agreement; it can order the shareholders to pay up what remains unpaid on their shares without attending to any contract as to when and how calls shall be paid: Companies Act, 1862, s. 102. The winding-up order has overridden the agreement, and their only remedy is against the company. If that is not the case, still they are not within section 25 of the Act of 1867. The contract is between the shareholders and the company.

W. D. Rawlins, for the shareholders.—The court will not alter the bargain which has been made, adopted in the circular, and stated in the memorandum and articles. The question is within the discretion of the court: Waterhouse v. Jamieson, L. R. 2 H. L. Sc. 29, 18 W. R. H. L. Dig. 8.

KEKEWICH, J.—This company is being wound up by the court, and the application is made by the official liquidator to enable him to discharge his duty to the court and to those whom he represents. That may be important, because there might be a difference on a question of a like character if it arose in a voluntary winding up. The contributories say, in answer to the call, "We stand on our contract, we are prepared to pay what the contract obliges us to pay, and at the time mentioned in the contract; there is no suggestion that we are playing false, but we are not liable to pay, and we decline to pay in advance of the date named in the contract." That contract is found in the agreement under which the present company purchased their assets. True, they purchased under a scheme for the reconstruction of another company, but that is immaterial. The company acquired their property on the terms of issuing shares to certain persons, and, according to clause 6 of the agreement to purchase, the shares which those persons took as part of the purchase-money were to be paid for by certain instalments. Without going through the articles of association, which expressly confirm the contract, I take it that all those articles must be read with reference to the contract, and that, unless the parties bound by the contract are themselves content to vary that clause, they must be construed as preventing the company from demanding payment for the shares except under the contract. The contract is valid and clear, but it seems to me that it is a contract intended to endure only during the life of the company, and to have no application after its dissolution—that is, a dissolution in the sense of a winding up by the court, for the company is still in existence. I say that for this reason. The Legislature has said that not only shall companies have powers of winding up similar to those which every partnership has, but subject to the court, but there shall be also, in the interest of creditors, power to direct a winding up by the court, and then new rights shall intervene. There is no occasion to trace the history of winding up, but if my recollection is right the first Act to introduce the rights of creditors was an Act of 1856. At all events, nearly forty years ago the Legislature interfered in favour of creditors, and since that time, through an officer called a liquidator, the creditors have had a right beyond the ordinary right to insist on the assets of the company being realized and distributed rateably between them. That right having supervened seems to me to be destruction to the contract which no doubt endured during the life of the company. One constantly has to deal with contracts intended to endure to eternity, but limited as I have mentioned. Contracts for the supply of goods and things of that kind, all of which are binding on the company, and are equally binding after the dissolution in the sense that the contracting parties can sue for damages, but it has never been suggested that a company is really bound to accept the goods after an order for its winding up has been made. The necessary breach of contract is an essential element of the case, and damages are assessed on that footing.

Mr. Rawlins says that this contract has this peculiar character, that the company have purchased the property on the faith of it, and issued shares to his clients on certain terms. That is so, but it makes no difference. They must be taken to have sold their property with knowledge of the provisions of the Act of 1862, and that if these provisions defeat the contract they are defeated, notwithstanding the contract. It often happens that a vendor takes his purchase-money in shares, and sometimes these shares are not taken as fully paid-up. He is liable for the amount not paid, although he may have stipulated not to pay for a certain time. However, that is not really an argument, it is the same case, but I point it out to show that if that argument is to prevail it will have an extensive operation.

Section 102 of the Companies Act, 1862, enables the court to make a call and to make an order to enforce it to the extent of the liability of the contributories, and, unless they can show that they are not liable, the call may be made for the money in question. Mr. Rawlins does not say that his clients are not liable, but that they are not liable in præsenti. I turn to section 7, and I find that the liability of a member may be limited to the amount, if any, unpaid on the shares respectively held by them.

I must read those words into section 102, where it is said that a call may be made to the extent of the shareholder's liability. The extent is fixed by the memorandum of association, and may be of the character mentioned in section 7, but of no other, except that by guarantee and so forth. The limitation here of the amount payable is a limitation to the amount unpaid. The liability for the payment remains, so the court may make a call, and, if I am right as to the contract enduring for the life of the company only, their only remedy is in damages. It follows that the liquidator is entitled to call up what remains unpaid on the shares. Mr. Rawlins' last hope lay in the discretion of the court. The court is bound to see that the creditors are paid. If I have such a discretion I shall not exercise it in favour of the respondents, when many of the contributories in a similar position have taken a different view. It would be hard, because the court is merciful, to let off sixteen persons who have fought and failed, and for the same reason I think they must pay the costs of the adjournment.

Annuity—Life annuity charged on land—Power of trustees to sell land and purchase Government annuity—Death of annuitant before completion of sale—Right of representatives to value of annuity.

A testatrix bequeathed life annuities charged on land, and, subject to the annuities, devised the land to trustees on trust for sale. By codicil she empowered the trustees to purchase Government annuities, to be in place of the annuities given by her will, and directed that the purchase-money should be a first charge on the proceeds of sale of the land, and that, upon purchase of the Government annuities, the land should be discharged. The trustees sold the land, and, pursuant to the conditions of sale, a sufficient sum was deposited in a bank for the purchase of the Government annuities, but such annuities were not actually purchased. One of the annuitants died after the date of the contract of sale, but before completion or payment of the purchase-money. Another annuitant died subsequently to completion.

Held, that the representative of the annuitant who died before completion was not entitled to the value of her annuity, but that the representative of the other annuitant was so entitled.

Adjourned summons.

Mary Mabbett by her will, dated the 14th of November, 1889, gave certain annuities, which she charged on specified parts of her real estate, including an annuity of £10 per annum to Mary Reed for her life, an annuity of £20 per annum to John Reed for his life, and annuities to Thomas Hooper and others during their respective lives, and subject to such annuities the testatrix devised the real estates charged therewith to her trustees upon trust to sell the same and divide the proceeds of sale as therein mentioned. The testatrix devised and bequeathed her residuary real and personal estate to her trustees upon trusts for sale and conversion and division of the net proceeds as therein mentioned, and directed that a portion of such net proceeds should be invested, and the income thereof paid to Sarah Pitman during her life, and on her decease the capital should be laid out in the purchase of Government annuities for Frances Pitman and Louisa Pitman, or the survivor of them, as therein mentioned.

By a codicil, dated the 23rd of November, 1889, the testatrix gave an annuity of £10 per annum to Frances Pitman for her life, and charged the same on specified real estate, and gave a like annuity to Louisa Pitman, and charged the same on other real estate, and proceeded:—"I declare that my trustees may purchase Government annuities for the annuitants named in my will or any codicil thereto for the respective amounts of the annuities given to them by my will or any codicil thereto; such Government annuities, if purchased, to be in place of the annuities given by my will or any codicil thereto, and the purchase-money of such Government annuities and the legacy duty thereon, and all charges and expenses connected with the purchase thereof to be provided out of and to be the first charge upon the proceeds of sale of the respective estates upon which the said annuities are respectively charged, and the said estates, upon the purchase of Government annuities, to be respectively discharged from the payment of the annuities respectively charged thereon."

The testatrix died on the 18th of May, 1890. Mary Reed died in September, 1890, and was buried on the 21st of that month. No representation had been taken out to her. Her annuity was paid down to the date of her death.

The real estate charged with the annuities of Mary Reed, John Reed, and Thomas Hooper, and with the annuity given by the codicil to Louisa Pitman, was by direction of the trustees put up for sale by auction in lots, and sold on the 7th of August, 1890. By the conditions of sale it was provided that the vendors should purchase Government annuities in place of the annuities charged on the properties comprised in the sale, thereby discharging such properties from such

Gaming—Bet—Lottery—Prize for naming winners of horse races—Betting Act, 1853 (16 & 17 Vict. c. 119), ss. 1, 3, 4—Betting Act, 1874 (37 Vict. c. 15), s. 3, sub-section (3)—42 Geo. 3, c. 119, s. 2—4 Geo. 4, c. 60, s. 41.

A newspaper proprietor published weekly a book of racing intelligence, which contained a coupon announcing that sums of money would be given to persons who correctly inserted the names of the winning horses in certain races (named on the coupon) which were to take place in the ensuing week. The book, with the coupon, was sold at the price of one penny.

Held, that the transaction was not a bet or a lottery within the Betting Acts, 1853 and 1874, or the Acts 42 Geo. 3, c. 119, and 4 Geo. 4, c. 60.

Case stated by the stipendiary magistrate for the city of Manchester under 42 & 43 Vict. c. 49.

At a court of summary jurisdiction in the city of Manchester four informations were preferred against the respondent, charging him with offences against the Betting Act, 1874, s. 3, sub-section (3), the Betting Act, 1853, ss. 3 and 4, and the Act 4 Geo. 4, c. 60 (for the suppression of illegal lotteries), s. 41.

The material facts were as follows:—

The respondent was the proprietor and publisher of the Sporting Chronicle and other publications, and carried on his business at large offices at Manchester, rated at £375 per annum, and containing plant worth £14,000. He published every Saturday a small book called the Weekly Handicap Book, or Racing Record, the retail price of which was one penny. It contained a variety of information about past and future horse races, and on the last page of each number was a coupon, which was the subject of these charges. This coupon was in the following form:—"The weekly coupon. Eighty pounds for six winners on one coupon, or forty-five pounds for five winners on one coupon. In case of general failure, a consolation award of ten pounds for four winners on one coupon. The following races are selected for the ensuing week:—" Then followed a list of six horse races which were to be run in the ensuing week, with spaces for the insertion opposite the name of each race of the name of a horse to be selected by the holder of the coupon. The coupons, when filled up, were to be sent to the respondent's office by a certain date.

There was evidence that the races named in the coupon were carefully picked out with a view to make the selection of the winning horses very difficult. 27,000 coupons of the Handicap Book published on the 16th of August, 1890, were returned to the offices duly filled up; not one contained six winners, or even five; one contained four winners, and £10 was sent to the person who filled it up.

The Betting Act, 1853, provides (section 1) that "no house, office, room, or other place shall be opened, kept, or used for the purpose of the owner, occupier, or keeper thereof . . . betting with persons resorting thereto; or for the purpose of any money or valuable thing being received by or on behalf of such owner, occupier, keeper, or person as aforesaid, as or for the consideration for any assurance, undertaking, promise, or agreement, express or implied, to pay or give thereafter any money or valuable thing on any event or contingency of or relating to any horse race, or other race, fight, game, sport, or exercise, . . . and every house, &c., opened, kept, or used for the purposes aforesaid, or any of them, is hereby declared to be a common nuisance, and contrary to law."

Section 3 imposes a penalty (on summary conviction) upon the owner or occupier of a house who uses the same, or permits the same to be used, for the purposes above mentioned.

Section 4 imposes a penalty upon such owner or occupier who shall receive money "as a deposit on any bet on condition of paying any sum of money or other valuable thing on the happening of any event or contingency of or relating to a horse race, &c." and upon "any person giving any acknowledgment, note, security, or draft on the receipt of any money or valuable thing so paid or given as aforesaid, purporting or intended to entitle the bearer or any other person to receive any money or valuable thing on the happening of any such event or contingency as aforesaid."

The Betting Act, 1874, s. 3, imposes a penalty on any person sending, exhibiting, or publishing any letter, circular, telegram, placard, handbill, card, or advertisement (3) "inviting any person to make or take any share in or in connexion with any such bet or wager."

42 Geo. 3, c. 119, s. 2, prohibits the keeping of "any office or place to exercise, keep open, show, or expose, to be played, drawn, or thrown at or in, either by dice, lots, cards, balls, or by numbers or figures, or by any other way, contrivance, or device whatsoever, any game or lottery called a little goe, or any other lottery whatsoever not authorized by Parliament."

4 Geo. 4, c. 60, s. 41, imposes a penalty upon any person selling any ticket, chance, or share in any lottery (except such as are authorized by Parliament) or publishing any proposal or scheme for such sale, and enacts that such person shall be deemed to be a rogue and a vagabond.

The magistrate was of opinion that the transaction proved was not a bet or a lottery within the above-mentioned Acts. The question for the court was whether that view was correct.

Poland, Q.C. (Horace Avory with him), for the appellant.—The publication of this Weekly Handicap Book is an invitation of persons by advertisement to take a share in connection with a bet or wager. The penny is paid, not for the book alone, but for a promise to pay money on an event or contingency relating to a horse race. It is, in fact, a bet, and the respondent's offices are used as a betting house within the meaning of section 1 of the Betting Act, 1853, and the respondent has committed offences within sections 3 and 4 of that Act, and section 3, sub-section (3), of the Betting Act, 1874. This is also a lottery: it is a "distribution of prizes by lot or chance" ("Webster's Dictionary"), for the naming of the winning horses is so difficult that skill is useless, and it can only be done by guesswork. The fact that the penny is paid for the book as well as for the chance of a prize makes no difference: Morris v. Blackman, 2 H. & C. 912, 12 W. R. C. L. Dig. 80; Taylor v. Smetten, 11 Q. B. D. 207, 31 W. R. Dig. 115.

Sir Charles Russell, Q.C. (Joseph Walton with him), for the respondent.—In order to make out that this is an offence under the Betting Acts it must be established that the respondent's offices are a gaming house, and it is clear that they are not. The Betting Act, 1853, is intended to put down "ready-money betting," as is shown by the preamble:—"Whereas a kind of gaming has of late sprung up tending to the injury and demoralization of improvident persons by the opening of places called betting houses or offices, and the receiving of money in advance by the owners or occupiers of such houses or offices, or by other persons acting on their behalf on their promises to pay money on events of horse races and the like contingencies." What the respondent does is merely to offer a prize (with a view to increasing the circulation of his weekly racing guide) to persons who are able, whether by skill or chance, to select the winning horses in certain races. This is not a bet, for there is no mutuality in the transaction. [He was stopped.]

Poland, Q.C., replied.

DAY, J.—This is an appeal from the refusal of a magistrate to convict the respondent of offences under the Betting Acts and the Lottery Acts. As to the latter charge I am clearly of opinion that this is not a lottery; it is not a distribution of money by chance; it is not like a lottery or within the mischief of a lottery. It would be difficult also to say that this was a bet, it was argued that it was, because a person who bought one of these books paid a penny by way of backing the six horses whose names they filled in on the coupon. But the person who takes this coupon cannot really lose anything, he receives a prize if he guesses certain winning horses aright. The whole system is evidently a scheme for furthering the respondent's business by increasing the circulation of his publications. The reward is extremely difficult to obtain, the chances being so very great against winning. It is nowhere near a bet. Nor does the transaction come within the words "receiving money as a deposit on any bet on condition of paying any money on the happening of any event or contingency of or relating to a horse race." It is clear from the preamble and from the whole scope of the Act that those words are intended to prevent people who do make bets from making them in such a way as to contravene the statute.

I think, therefore, that the magistrate was perfectly right. If this is a demoralizing practice, as to which I express no opinion, it is for the Legislature to interfere, and not for us to misconstrue Acts of Parliament.

LAWRANCE, J.—I am of the same opinion.

Appeal dismissed.

BISHOP OF BANGOR v. PARRY.

Charity—Lease—Consent of Charity Commissioners—Effect of lease for more than twenty-one years without consent—Charitable Trusts Amendment Act, 1855 (18 & 19 Vict. c. 124), s. 29.

A lease of charity property for more than twenty-one years, made without the consent required by section 29 of the Charitable Trusts Amendment Act, 1855, does not secure for any purpose, but is absolutely void.

Trial of the action before Charles, J., without a jury.

The facts of the case, so far as material for the purposes of this report, were these:—

The plaintiffs were the trustees of Bishop Rowlands's Charity, called the Bottwnog Grammar School, and as such were the owners of Llyslew Farm, in the parish of Llanidan, county of Anglesey.

The farm was occupied by John Hughes up to 1872, and as he had spent a great deal of money upon it in the shape of permanent improvements, the trustees agreed to grant him a lease for forty-five years at a rent of £220 per annum, that being much below the real value of the property.

A lease was accordingly executed by the trustees on the 10th of February, 1872. The trustees were unaware that section 29 of the Charitable Trusts Amendment Act, 1855, rendered it unlawful for them to grant a lease for more than twenty-one years without the consent of the Charity Commissioners, or other authority, and on this being brought to their knowledge they applied to the Charity Commissioners, who for various reasons refused to approve of a lease for so long a period.

In the year 1876 a notice given by the trustees to Hughes with reference to the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1875, treated him as a yearly tenant, and he made no objection. He continued in occupation of the farm till his death intestate in December, 1886, when Mrs. Catherine Parry, the defendant, took out letters of administration to his estate.

On the 12th of November, 1887, the trustees gave her a twelve months' notice to quit. An agreement was subsequently made by the plaintiffs with the defendant in her personal capacity, and not as administratrix, for her occupation of the farm at the yearly rent of £220 for one year certain from the 12th of November, 1888.

At the expiration of that period she refused to quit, and this action was brought to eject her. The defence was that the forty-five years' lease was not absolutely void, but enured for twenty-one years, that being the term for which the plaintiffs had the power to grant a lease without the consent of the Charity Commissioners. The defendant counter-claimed for damages for breach of the covenant in the lease for quiet enjoyment.

Section 29 of the Charitable Trusts Amendment Act, 1855, is as follows:—

"It shall not be lawful for the trustees or persons acting in the administration of any charity to make or grant, otherwise than with the express authority of Parliament, under any Act already passed or which may hereafter be passed, or of a court or judge of competent jurisdiction, or according to a scheme legally established, or with the approval of the board [of Charity Commissioners for England and Wales], any sale, mortgage, or charge of the charity estate, or any lease thereof in reversion after more than three years of any existing term, or for any term of life, or in consideration wholly or in part of any fine, or for any term of years exceeding twenty-one years."

Kemp, Q.C., and Malcolm Douglas, for the plaintiffs.

J. Bryn Roberts, for the defendant.

The following cases were referred to:—Magdalen Hospital v. Knotts, 27 W. R. 602, 4 App. Cas. 324; Attorney-General v. Morgan, 2 Russ. 306; Soprani v. Skurro, Yelv. 18; Watson v. Master of Hemsworth Hospital, 14 Ves., p. 333; Andrew v. Pearce, 1 Bos. & P. New Rep. 158.

CHARLES, J., stated the facts, and proceeded:—The gentleman who advised the trustees about the case appears to have been of opinion at one time at any rate that although the lease was of no use for forty-five years, it was of use for twenty-one years; and if it was of use for twenty-one years it would entitle Mrs. Parry to remain in possession, because the twenty-one years would not expire until the 25th of March, 1893, and her defence before me has been based upon that alternative view. It was not argued before me—it was impossible to argue—that the lease was good for forty-five years. That could not be argued; but it was submitted, although it was not good for forty-five years, in consequence of the provisions of the statute, it was good for twenty-one years, and although the grant for anything in excess is a bad grant under the statute, still that bad grant enures for the benefit of Mrs. Parry to the extent of twenty-one years. I have had an opportunity of listening to the elaborate argument upon this matter, for which I am much indebted, and of considering the various points which were made on behalf of Mrs. Parry with reference to this lease, but I am clearly of opinion that this lease is absolutely void.

Various cases were referred to in which persons who have a limited interest professed to grant more than that limited interest warranted, and in all these cases the grant, though bad for the excess, was held to be good for so much as was within the competence of the lessor to grant; but those authorities are, in my opinion, entirely inapplicable to a case like the present. An analogy to a case like the present is to be found in leases void under the statute of Elizabeth, to one example of which I was referred. In the case of Magdalen Hospital v. Knotts, a question arose as to a lease which had been granted by a charitable body in contravention of the statute of Elizabeth, which had enacted that all these leases should be utterly void to all intents and purposes; and it was argued, although the language of the statute was so strong, still the lease was not utterly void to all intents and purposes, but only in fact a voidable lease. The Lord Chancellor, however, held, and the other noble lords concurred with him, that the statute meant what it said, and that the lease, having been made in contravention of the statute, was utterly void, and was not capable of being supported for any purpose whatever. There is a difference between the language of that statute and the language of this statute, but the difference, such as it is, does not assist the present defendant, in my opinion. All that the statute of Elizabeth said was that the lease with which it dealt was to be utterly void, but this statute says it is contrary to law to grant this lease at all, and, therefore, the trustees in granting it committed an unlawful act—an act, therefore, which I cannot hold to be good for any purpose whatsoever.

Further, I do not, as a matter of fact, feel able to come to the conclusion that Mr. Hughes ever, in fact, occupied in the capacity of a lessee for twenty-one years. On the contrary, I find that he was treated by the landlord, and that he apparently acquiesced in that treatment, as a tenant from year to year. I think that that is the true view of his position. The relation of a yearly tenant was constituted, in my opinion, if not from the very first, as soon as he had paid an instalment of the rent reserved by the document, that is to say, as soon as rent had been paid at the rate of £220 a year he became a tenant from year to year upon such of the terms of that document as were applicable to a yearly tenancy. [His lordship commented on the evidence, and continued:—] That disposes of the defence to the action, and entitles the plaintiffs to recover possession of the farm.

But there is also a counter-claim, as to which it is necessary I should say something. The counter-claim is based upon a covenant for quiet enjoyment which is contained in the void lease of 1872, and it is said that covenant for quiet enjoyment still exists, and has been broken, and the defendant is entitled to damages in respect of the breach of the covenant for quiet enjoyment—entitled to damages if not against all the plaintiffs, at all events against three of the plaintiffs, who are three of the persons who were actually parties to the document of 1872. If damages were recoverable at all, I agree that the measure is what was suggested by the evidence called by Mr. Roberts. The measure of damages would be this. How much would a lease for the residue of the forty-five years be worth at the present time? [His lordship commented on the evidence which had been given on this point, and continued:—] I do not feel it necessary to investigate that matter any further, for I am clearly of opinion that this counter-claim cannot be sustained in point of law. It would be a most extraordinary thing to hold that it could. The lease is an unlawful lease, and therefore should never have been granted. It is worthless; but, although it is worthless, it is said that the persons granting it are bound by the covenants contained in it, and, although the lease is void as a lease, still the covenants contained in it are to be available for the benefit of the lessee. I cannot come to such a conclusion. None of the authorities which have been cited to me go anything like the length of warranting such a conclusion—a conclusion which it seems to me is contrary to—I will not say common sense—but it is contrary to the law which regulates these matters. I think that, therefore, the counterclaim, which claims to recover damages for the loss of the value of the unexpired residue of the forty-five years' lease, cannot be sustained at all. I decide that upon the ground I have mentioned. [His lordship then dealt with other matters not material for the purposes of this report.]

BISHOP v. TAYLOR & CO.
HARRIS (Third party). (a.)

Vendor and purchaser—Lease—"Usual" covenants—Covenant "not to assign or part with possession of premises without consent of lessor, such consent not to be unreasonably withheld"—Rescission—Return of deposit money.

A covenant in a lease that "the lessee is not to assign or part with the possession of the premises without the consent of the lessor, such consent not to be unreasonably withheld," is an "unusual" covenant, and an intending purchaser of the lease, who has signed an agreement for the purchase of the lease from the lessee, and paid a deposit thereunder, is not bound to complete the purchase when such covenant is not disclosed to him before signing the agreement, but such purchaser may refuse to complete the purchase, and may recover back the deposit.

Hampshire v. Wickens, 26 W. R. 491, 7 Ch. D. 555, followed.

Appeal from Wandsworth County Court.

The action was brought to recover a sum of £25, received by the defendant as agent for the plaintiff, under the following circumstances.

The plaintiff was the lessee of certain premises which he wished to dispose of, and with that object he placed the matter in the hands of the defendant Taylor, who was an auctioneer, in order that Taylor might find a purchaser for the lease. Taylor intro-luced the third party Harris, and subsequently an greement was entered into between the plaintiff and Harris, dated the 30th of August, 1890, whereby Harris agreed to purchase the lease from the plaintiff, he sale to be completed by September 29, and Harris ras to pay £25 deposit. This deposit was paid to the lefendant Taylor, but the agreement was silent as to rhen the deposit was to be paid in the event of the urchase and sale not being completed.

The purchase was not completed by the 29th of leptember, and Harris refused to complete the agreeaent and to purchase the lease, because the lease ontained a covenant which was not disclosed to him rior to his signing the agreement of the 30th of August, a covenant which, he alleged, was an onerous ovenant, which entitled him to refuse to complete the greement. The covenant in the lease was that "the essee was not to assign or part with the possession f the premises without the consent of the lessor, uch consent not to be unreasonably withheld." The laintiff was ready and willing to complete the purhase, and had obtained the consent of the lessor to he assignment, but Harris refused to complete.

The plaintiff then brought this action against Taylor for the deposit of £25, which had been placed n his hands. Harris also claimed the return of the £25 from Taylor, who refused to give it to either arty, but who was ready to hand it over to the arty declared to be entitled to the same, as he was a nere stakeholder, and had no interest himself in the £25.

The deputy county court judge distinguished the ase from Reeve v. Berridge, 36 W. R. 517, 20 Q. B. D. 523, as the covenant in that case restrained the lessee from carrying on certain trades, whereas the parties here carried on the same business, and he held that the covenant not to assign or part with the possession of the premises without the conent of the lessor, such consent not to be unreasonably withheld, was not such an onerous covenant as would ntitle Harris to refuse to complete the purchase, nore especially as, if the lessor unreasonably withheld is consent, the lessee might assign without breach of he covenant: Sear v. House Property and Investment Society, 29 W. R. 192, 16 Ch. D. 387; Treloar v. Bigge, 22 W. R. 843, L. R. 9 Ex. 151; and Hyde v. Warden, 26 W. R. 201, 3 Ex. D. 72. He therefore eld that Harris was not justified in refusing to comlete the purchase, and that, consequently, he had orfeited the deposit of £25, and he gave judgment or the plaintiff for the £25, to be paid over to him by Taylor, and taxed costs as against Harris.

Harris appealed.

Ellis J. Davis, for the appellant.—The case of Hampshire v. Wickens, 26 W. R. 491, 7 Ch. D. 555, decided by Jessel, M.R., in 1878, was not cited to the deputy-judge. By that case it was decided that a covenant "not to assign without the lessor's consent," was an "unusual" covenant in a lease, and hat the purchaser of the lease would not be bound o accept the lease containing that covenant, when uch covenant was not disclosed before the agreenent. The present case is absolutely concluded by hat case.

Elliott, for the plaintiff.—The case of Hampshire v. Wickens was somewhat different from the present, as here there was in addition a covenant that the essee would not put up any bills for letting apartnents without the lessor's consent. That would be n onerous covenant, and would entirely distinguish hat case from the present. This covenant could not be an onerous covenant, as, according to the cases cited in the court below, if the lessor unreasonably withheld his consent to an assignment, then the lessee might assign without committing a breach of the covenant. That was the ground of the decision; the covenant is, therefore, not an onerous one within Reeve v. Berridge, and the case is different from Hampshire v. Wickens.

Morton Smith, for the defendant Taylor.

A. L. SMITH, J.—When this lease was tendered to Harris, he refused to complete the agreement and purchase the lease, and he so refused because there was a covenant in the lease that the lessee was not to assign or part with the possession of the premises without the consent of the lessor, "such consent not to be unreasonably withheld," and he said that this was an unusual covenant which entitled him to refuse to purchase the lease, as he had no notice of the same when he signed the agreement.

The case went to trial and several cases were cited, but the case of Hampshire v. Wickens was not cited. In that case Jessel, M.R., laid down what are "usual" covenants and what are "unusual" covenants in a lease, and he lays it down in that case that a covenant in a lease not to assign without the lessor's consent is an "unusual" covenant. It seems to me, therefore, that the claim of Harris was well founded, as he was not bound to purchase the lease with this unusual covenant in it, such covenant not having been disclosed to him at the time of his signing the agreement. Judgment should therefore be entered for the third party, Harris, for the return of the £25 deposit by the defendant, with costs here and below. As Taylor is a mere stake holder, he ought not to have appeared here, and he is not entitled to costs.

GRANTHAM, J.—I am of the same opinion. The case clearly comes within Hampshire v. Wickens, where the late Master of the Rolls, speaking of a similar covenant, says, "I am therefore of opinion that it is not a usual covenant." That case is binding on us here.

Appeal allowed. Judgment for the third party, Harris.

IN BANKRUPTCY.

Q. B. Div. (Cave and Charles, JJ.) May 5, 29.

Ex parte CULLEN.
In re PARROTT. (a.)

Bankruptcy—Proof—Proxy—Attestation of instrument of proxy by person appointed proxy—Validity—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), schedule I., rr. 15, 16—Bankruptcy Rules, 1886, rr. 245, 247—Appendix, Forms 75, 76.

Under the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, a proxy cannot be an attesting witness to the instrument of proxy by which he is appointed.

Appeal from an order of his Honour Judge Hughes in the county court at Macclesfield, by which he reversed the decision of the official receiver admitting a proxy given by the appellant.

On the 12th of November, 1890, the appellant, Mrs. Cullen, who was a creditor in the bankruptcy, made a proof against the estate.

(a.) Reported by C. F. MORRELL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The meeting of creditors was to be held on the 14th of November, 1890, and Mrs. Cullen, being unable to attend the meeting, gave a special proxy to Mr. T. A. Daniels, her solicitor, to vote for a certain person as trustee.

The attesting witness to the instrument of proxy was Mr. T. A. Daniels himself, and an objection was taken on this account at the meeting, which was overruled by the official receiver.

The decision of the official receiver was, however, subsequently reversed by the county court judge.

Mrs. Cullen now appealed.

F. C. Willis, for the appellant.—The simple question is whether the proxy himself can attest the instrument of proxy. All that he has to do is to obey the directions given to him.

He referred to Seal v. Claridge, 29 W. R. 598, 7 Q. B. D. 516; Freshfield v. Reed, 9 M. & W. 404.

Herbert Reed, for the respondent.—No person can be a witness who has to do with the transaction. A party to a deed cannot be a witness, and although a proxy is not a party in the sense of being a party to a deed, he is an attorney to act in the stead of the person giving the proxy. The essence of an attesting witness is that it should be a third person who should attest. It is very important that there should be the evidence of some independent person of the giving of the proxy.

Cur. adv. vult.

May 29.—CAVE, J.—The only question we have to decide in this case is whether, under the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, a proxy can be an attesting witness to the instrument of proxy. By rule 15 of schedule I. to the Act a creditor may vote either in person or by proxy. By rule 16 every instrument of proxy shall be in the prescribed form, and shall be issued by the official receiver, or after the appointment of a trustee by the trustee, and every insertion therein shall be in the handwriting of the person giving the proxy. Form 75 in the appendix to the Bankruptcy Rules, 1886, contains after the words of the instrument of proxy the words "signature of witness," and below that, the word "address." It also contains a form of certificate to be signed by the witness of a creditor blind or incapable of filling up the proxy. Form 76 is similar.

Now it was not disputed that an attesting witness was required to an instrument of proxy, and the only question we have to decide, and do decide, is whether the proxy himself can be such witness. The only authority on the subject that was cited to us is Seal v. Claridge, in which it was held by the Court of Appeal that the grantee of a bill of sale under the Bills of Sale Act, 1878, s. 10, sub-section (1), although he was a solicitor, could not be the attesting witness thereof. That section required that the execution of every bill of sale should be attested by a solicitor of the Supreme Court, and that the attestation should state that before the execution of the bill of sale the effect thereof had been explained to the grantor by the attesting solicitor, and the ground of the decision was that an attestation by the grantee was not sufficient, as he was a party to the transaction, and, consequently, had the greatest possible interest in deceiving the grantor if he was inclined to be fraudulent or to be guilty of malpractice. In that case the case of Freshfield v. Reed was referred to, but that case has not much bearing on the present, as it only decided that a consent in writing, duly attested, means attested by a witness, and that a consent is not attested simply by the consenting party being a party to the deed to which his consent is required if his signature to the deed is not attested by a witness.

Attestation is not necessary, as was observed in Seal v. Claridge, unless it is required by an instrument creating a power or by some statute, and where it is so required the provisions of the instrument or statute, whether express or implied, must be complied with. Obviously, the requirement of an attesting witness is inconsistent with the grantor attesting his own signature, and we have the authority of the Court of Appeal for going a step further and saying that a party to the transaction cannot be an attesting witness. It is true that Lord Selborne, L.C., fortifies his conclusions in that particular case by considerations drawn from the language of the statute, which in that case required an attesting witness, but we think it is impossible to read his judgment without understanding it as laying down the general rule stated above.

It is true that no authority in English law can be found for the proposition, which is probably due to the fact that the far wider rule excluding witnesses on the ground of interest obscured the narrower, but far more reasonable, rule incapacitating a party to the transaction from being an attesting witness. This rule has, however, as it seems to us, a somewhat more definite legal origin than the general consent of mankind. In the Roman law of wills the heir was supposed to buy and the testator to sell the succession and family, and the ceremony was transacted openly, with all the symbols of a sale, in the presence of an officer and of a certain number of witnesses. While the testament per æs et libram continued neither the testator, nor heir, nor any of the families of either could be a witness, because they were supposed to be the parties to the contract. When the symbolical sale ceased, and testaments were in writing and secret, the heir himself was considered to be a competent subscribing witness, and afterwards, when the will was open, the heir was still looked upon as a competent witness though he knew the contents. Gaius, however, reprobated this custom, and Justinian pronounced it illegal (Instit. Lib. 2, Tit. 10, s. 10). Justinian, however, did not interfere with the competency of legatees or persons entrusted with fidicommissa who had always been regarded as strangers to the transaction.

Now this general rule or principle excluding those who are parties to the transaction from being competent attesting witnesses would clearly apply, as in Seal v. Claridge it was held to apply, to the grantee of a bill of sale, and incapacitate him from being an attesting witness to the bill of sale. Does this principle apply to the case of a proxy? There is indeed no contract between the creditor and the proxy such as was supposed originally in the Roman law to exist between the testator and the heir, nor is the proxy a party to the document or required to sign it, nor does he take any beneficial interest under it. But as he is the donee of the power conferred by the instrument, we do not see how it can be said that he is a stranger to the transaction. It must also be remembered that the witness in the case of a blind or illiterate creditor has duties to perform with reference to the proxy beyond that of attesting the mark of the creditor. Such duties seem to require the presence of an independent person other than the donee of the power, and it would be inconvenient to lay down a different rule as to the person who could be an attesting witness in the two cases. With the object or policy of requiring an attesting witness, and if one is required, of limiting his duty to attest the signature of the person executing the document, we have nothing to do; but where an attesting witness is required, we have only to follow the law laid down by the Court of Appeal in Seal v. Claridge and say that at any rate he must not be a party to the transaction.

Some difficulty has, no doubt, been thrown in our way by a decision under the Statute of Frauds. By section 5 of that Act it was required that a devise of lands should be in writing signed by the devisor and attested by three or four credible witnesses. Under that statute difficulties arose in establishing wills because a devisee or legatee was incompetent as a witness to the will, but apparently only on the ground that he took a beneficial interest under it. To remedy this state of things 25 Geo. 2, c. 6, was passed, which, by section 1, enacted that a beneficial devise, legacy, estate, interest, or appointment to an attesting witness should be null and void, and that such person should be admitted as a witness notwithstanding such devise, &c. In the case we refer to a mere executor or trustee who took no beneficial interest under the will was held to be a competent attesting witness: Bettison v. Bromley, 12 East, 250. This decision purported to be based on earlier authorities, but when those authorities are examined they only decide that such an executor or trustee is a competent witness at the trial in a matter concerning the estate, and not that he is competent to be an attesting witness. The decision in East appears to be founded on the assumption that the only objection to the competency of an attesting witness was that of interest. This may be accounted for either by the fact that no general rule rendering a party to the transaction incompetent as an attesting witness was known to the judges who decided that case, or that, following the Roman law, they held it not to apply to persons only intrusted with fidei-commissa. However this may be, we have in Seal v. Claridge an express and recent decision of the Court of Appeal laying down a general principle on the subject, and it is not for us to disregard it or endeavour to whittle it away by one of those fine-drawn and subtle distinctions which are the opprobrium of English law and the despair of all those who seek to evolve from it a rational and intelligible system. The case is one of some difficulty, but for the reasons given above we have come to the conclusion that the learned county court judge was right, and we therefore dismiss the appeal, with costs.

REG. v. JUDGE OF HALIFAX COUNTY COURT AND BAIRSTOWE. (a.)

County court—Jurisdiction—Validity of patent—Patents Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 57), s. 117—County Courts Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 43), s. 56.

A county court has no jurisdiction to entertain an action in which the validity of a patent is in question.

Decision of the Queen's Bench Division (ante, p. 492, [1891] 1 Q. B. 793) affirmed.

The effect of the Patents Act, 1883, is to confine the jurisdiction in patent actions to the High Court.

Appeal from the decision of a divisional court (Pollock, B., and Charles, J.), reported ante, p. 492, [1891] 1 Q. B. 793.

An action was commenced by one Sutcliffe against Bairstowe in the Halifax County Court to recover thirteen guineas damages for the infringement of a patent.

Bairstowe disputed the validity of the patent, and thereupon the county court judge nonsuited the plaintiff, on the ground that he had no jurisdiction to entertain the action.

A rule nisi for a mandamus having been obtained was discharged by the Divisional Court, on the ground that the privileges granted to an inventor by letters patent are a franchise, and that the title to them is, therefore, excluded from the jurisdiction of the county court by section 56 of the County Courts Act, 1888.

Sutcliffe appealed.

Lewis Edmunds and R. A. Dale, for the appellant.

T. Terrell and Malcolm Douglas, for the respondent.

The arguments used and cases cited were the same as in the court below.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—Personally I agree entirely in the decision of the Divisional Court and in the reasons given by them. I think that a grant of letters patent is such a "franchise" as is mentioned in the proviso to section 56 of the County Courts Act, 1888. But when attention is paid to the Patents Act, 1883, it is clear, to my mind, that the jurisdiction of county courts as regards patents is ousted, and that the trial of such actions as the present is confined to the High Court. It was contended that if that were so the jurisdiction of the court of the County Palatine of Lancaster was ousted also, but that is not so. The court of the County Palatine had always the same jurisdiction as the High Court of Chancery. It is only limited as regards area. That is apparent from the Chancery of Lancaster Act, 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 23). Looking, then, at the Patents Act, 1883, it is clear from section 117, which defines court as "her Majesty's High Court of Justice in England," that the trial of such actions is confined to the High Court. Can it be contended that that Act is impliedly repealed by the County Courts Act, 1888? It is perfectly plain that the latter Act does not affect the Patents Act in any way. I am, therefore, of opinion that this appeal must be dismissed.

LOPES, L.J.—I felt some doubt at first—as I now think, wrongly—whether the word "franchise" in section 56 did include a grant of letters patent. But after looking at the definition given in Blackstone Comm., vol. 2, p. 37, that doubt has disappeared. The question, however, becomes immaterial, since it is quite plain from the Patents Act, 1883, that such actions as this can only be tried in the High Court, and cannot be tried in the county court.

KAY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion, and for the same reasons. I agree that a grant of letters patent is included in the word "franchise," and I am also clear that, under the Patents Act, 1883, which is in no way affected by the County Courts Act, 1888, these actions can only be brought in the High Court. It is inconceivable that while the former Act gave a special and carefully-defined jurisdiction to the High Court in such cases, the latter Act should give to county courts a perfectly open jurisdiction over them.

ARMOUR v. BATE. (a.)

Practice—Trial—Plaintiff not appearing—Burden of proof on defendant—Defendant entitled to judgment—Form of judgment—R. S. C., 1883, ord. 36, r. 32.

Where, upon a trial being called on, the defendant appears and the plaintiff does not appear, the defendant, if he has no counter-claim, is entitled to judgment under ord. 36, r. 32, even though, upon the pleadings, the burden of proof lies upon him.

The judgment under the above rule should be a judgment dismissing the action, and not a judgment for the defendant.

Appeal from the judgment of Wills, J., at the trial of the action.

The action was brought to recover £300 deposited by the plaintiff with the defendant. The statement of defence alleged that the plaintiff was formerly employed by the defendant as manager of his business; that the £300 was deposited by the plaintiff with the defendant in lieu of a fidelity guarantee, and upon the terms that the defendant should hold the same as security for the due and faithful performance of the plaintiff's duties, and should indemnify himself thereout for any loss which he might sustain by reason of the plaintiff not duly and faithfully performing his duties; that the plaintiff acted negligently and dishonestly in the management of the business; and that by reason thereof the defendant suffered loss to an extent exceeding £300. The plaintiff, in reply, joined issue upon the defence.

Upon the trial being called on, the plaintiff did not appear, and Wills, J., on the application of the defendant, without any evidence being given, gave judgment for the defendant.

By ord. 36, r. 32, "if, when a trial is called on, the defendant appears, and the plaintiff does not appear, the defendant, if he has no counter-claim, shall be entitled to judgment dismissing the action, but if he has a counter-claim, then he may prove such counter-claim so far as the burden of proof lies on him."

Joseph Walton, for the plaintiff.—Ord. 36, r. 32, does not apply where the burden of proof is on the defendant, as in this case. The deposit was admitted, and the burden of proving the dishonesty of the plaintiff lay upon the defendant. No evidence having been offered, he was not entitled to judgment. Rule 32 only applies where the burden of proof lies upon the plaintiff. Secondly, if ord. 36, r. 32, is applicable, the judgment is wrong in form, the rule only authorizing a judgment dismissing the action, and not a judgment for the defendant. A judgment for the defendant would imply that the charges made against the plaintiff had been proved.

Gully, Q.C., and C. A. Russell, for the defendant.—If the plaintiff does not appear and ask for the relief claimed, he abandons his claim, and the defendant need not give any evidence to show why he should not pay the money claimed. The claim is abandoned, and the defendant is entitled to judgment under ord. 36, r. 32. Secondly, a judgment dismissing the action has the same effect as a judgment for the defendant; it is a bar to any subsequent action for the same cause.

Joseph Walton replied.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—In this case the plaintiff, after his employment by the defendant had terminated, sued to recover the £300 deposited by him with the defendant. The defendant admitted the receipt of the £300, but alleged misbehaviour by the plaintiff, which caused damage to the defendant exceeding the amount of the deposit. The plaintiff's primâ facie case was admitted in the defence. If the action had been tried, the burden of proof would have been upon the defendant. As the plaintiff did not appear, the learned judge gave judgment for the defendant.

It was first argued that rule 32 did not empower the judge to enter any judgment at all in favour of the defendant, inasmuch as the burden of proof was upon the defendant, and the defendant gave no evidence in support of his case. The words of rule 32 are clear. The rule says that if the plaintiff does not appear, and the defendant appears, the defendant shall be entitled to judgment. The judge acted rightly in not inquiring as to the burden of proof on the pleadings; his duty was simply to give judgment.

It was then said that the judgment was wrong in point of form; that the judgment ought to have been one simply dismissing the action; and that a judgment for the defendant was not authorized by rule 32. The plaintiff alleged that the judgment as now entered would imply that the charges against him were proved. Now the schedule to the rules does not contain any form of judgment dismissing an action. As far as I know there was no such judgment known to the common law. In the old Court of Chancery there seems to have been a form of judgment which recited that the cause came on to be heard in the presence of counsel for the defendant, no one attending for the plaintiff, and concluded by ordering that the plaintiff's bill stand dismissed out of court (see Seton on Decrees, 3rd ed., p. 1133). By ord. 23, r. 13, of the Chancery Consolidated Orders such dismissal, unless the court otherwise directed, was equivalent to a dismissal on the merits, and might be pleaded in bar to another suit for the same matter. Those Chancery Orders have been repealed by the Judicature Rules, and ord. 36, r. 19, of the Rules of 1875 was framed for both divisions, and there appears to be a form of order in the Chancery Division, following the old form in use in the Court of Chancery, reciting the appearance of the defendant and the non-appearance of the plaintiff, and ordering the action to be dismissed out of court. Ord. 36, r. 32, of the Rules of 1883, which is a re-enactment of ord. 36, r. 19, is now applicable to both divisions, and one would have expected a form of judgment to be given in the schedule to the rules. No such form is given, and it is therefore advisable to adopt a new form applicable to this new kind of judgment. The form will follow the words of rule 32 by stating that, on the trial being called on, the defendant appeared and the plaintiff did not appear, and ordering that the action be dismissed. The effect of a judgment in that form is the same as the effect of the former judgment in the Court of Chancery dismissing the bill; it has the same effect as if it were a judgment on the merits for the defendant, and that will give the defendant the general costs and the costs of all the issues.

The plaintiff has therefore failed in this appeal. Subject to this alteration in the judgment the appeal must be dismissed.

SALAMAN v. WARNER AND OTHERS. (a.)

Practice—Appeal—Final or interlocutory order—Order dismissing action on point of law raised on pleadings —R. S. C., 1883, ord. 25, rr. 2, 3; ord. 58, rr. 3, 15.

An order is not "final" unless it is made upon an application which must, whatever the result, determine the action.

Hence, an order made under ord. 25, r. 3, dismissing an action upon a point of law raised on the pleadings and argued before the trial is an interlocutory order, and a four days' notice of appeal is sufficient.

Appeal from the Queen's Bench Division upon a point of law raised upon the pleadings.

The defendants having in their defence raised the point of law that the statement of claim showed no cause of action, it was ordered that this point should be argued before the trial under ord. 25, r. 2. Upon the argument the Divisional Court (Day and Lawrance, JJ.) held that the statement of claim disclosed no cause of action, and accordingly dismissed the action under ord. 25, r. 3. The plaintiff appealed, giving a four days' notice of appeal.

Sir Edward Clarke, S.G., and Cock, Q.C. (A. T. Lawrence with them), for one of the defendants, took the preliminary objection that the order of the Divisional Court was a final order, and that fourteen days' notice was necessary under ord. 58, r. 3.

They referred to International Financial Society v. Moscow Gas Co., 26 W. R. 272, 7 Ch. D. 241; Trowell v. Shenton, 26 W. R. 837, 8 Ch. D. 318; Whistler v. Hancock, 26 W. R. 211, 3 Q. B. D. 83.

Moulton, Q.C., and T. W. Chitty (Finlay, Q.C., and R. McKenna with them) for the plaintiff.—An order is not final unless a decision upon the application out of which it arises, given in favour of either party, will determine the matter; per Brett, L.J., in Standard Discount Co. v. La Grange, 26 W. R. 25, 3 C. P. D. 67. Here, if the point taken in the defence had been overruled, the action would have gone on.

They referred to Collins v. Vestry of Paddington, 28 W. R. 588, 5 Q. B. D. 368.

Sir Edward Clarke, S.G., in reply, referred to Hughes v. Little, 35 W. R. 36, 18 Q. B. D. 32.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—I am of opinion that the true test for ascertaining whether an order is final or interlocutory is that suggested by me in Standard Discount Co. v. La Grange. I there said that no order in an action would be found to be final unless a decision upon the application out of which it arose, given in favour of either party, would determine the matter in dispute. If the decision would only determine the matter when given in favour of one of the parties, then the order is not final, but interlocutory. That seems to me to be a test of easy application to each case that arises, and to be free from any difficulties. If the Divisional Court in the present case had decided the other way, the action must have proceeded in the usual course. If this order were taken to be a final order, then the defendants would have a year in which to appeal, and numerous complications might arise in such a case. The order, therefore, is interlocutory, and the notice of appeal is good.

FRY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. Rules 3 and 15 of order 58 use the term "interlocutory order," of which no definition is given in the rules. The courts have frequently experienced a difficulty in applying the term to particular cases. The intention of the framers of the rules in drawing a distinction between interlocutory and final orders was to allow a shorter time for appealing in the former case where the action might, in one event, proceed in its ordinary course. An order seems to me to be final which arises out of an application the result of which must be to determine the action. In the present case it is clear that the result of the application would not necessarily determine the action. If the order had been in favour of the plaintiff the action would have proceeded.

Contract—Agreement to employ for a term certain—Employer's place of business destroyed by fire—Condition of continued existence of place of business, whether implied—Foundation of contract.

The defendant, a manufacturer, entered into a written contract with the plaintiff to employ him as agent, canvasser, and traveller for a term of five years certain, determinable at the end thereof by three months' notice in writing on either side, the plaintiff on his part agreeing to "do his utmost to obtain orders for and sell the various goods manufactured or sold" by the defendant, as should "be from time to time forwarded, or submitted by sample or pattern" to the plaintiff, who was to be remunerated by a commission at a specified rate on all goods sold by him for the defendant. The defendant's manufactory having been burnt down when there were still nearly three years of the five unexpired, he made no attempt to resume his business or carry it on elsewhere, or to afford the plaintiff any further employment.

Held, that a condition that the defendant's manufactory should continue to exist could not be implied in the contract, which was such that the destruction of the manufactory did not render it impossible of performance, and that the plaintiff was entitled to substantial damages.

Decision of Grantham, J., reversed.

Appeal from Grantham, J.

This was an application by the plaintiff to set aside a judgment entered for the defendant at the trial before Grantham, J., with a jury in Middlesex.

On the 31st of January, 1887, Mr. Goldsmith, the defendant, who was a shirt, collar, and cuff manufacturer, entered into a contract in writing with A. S. Turner, the plaintiff.

By the contract, which purported to be between Goldsmith "and any partner he may hereafter take into business, carrying on business as shirt, collar, and cuff manufacturer, under the style of the 'Priory Manufacturing Co.,' and hereafter called the said company, of the one part," and A. S. Turner, of the other part, the said company agreed to employ Turner as their agent, canvasser, and traveller, upon the terms and subject to the stipulations and conditions therein contained, and Turner on his part agreed with the company to serve them diligently, faithfully, and honestly, as their agent, canvasser, and traveller, upon the terms, and subject to the stipulations and conditions therein contained. Those terms, conditions, and stipulations, so far as material, were as follows:—"(1) The agency shall be deemed to have commenced on the 31st day of January, 1887, and shall be determinable either by the company or the said A. S. Turner at the end of five years from the date hereof upon three calendar months' notice in writing being given by the party desiring to determine the said agency to the other or others of them." "(2) The said A. S. Turner shall do his utmost to obtain orders for and sell the various goods manufactured or sold by the said company as shall be from time to time forwarded, or submitted by sample or pattern to him, at list price to good and substantial customers, and shall in no case sell any goods at lower price than may be authorized in writing by the said company." "(5) The said A. S. Turner shall not, either by himself, partner, agent, or other persons whatsoever, sell or offer for sale any shirts, collars, cuffs, fronts, or any goods of the description manufactured or sold by the said company." "(8) The said company shall pay to the said A. S. Turner the sum of 3¾ per cent. commission on all goods sold by him for them. The commission as aforesaid shall be paid on the 20th days of March, June, September, and December, on all goods sold and delivered by the said company through the agency of the said A. S. Turner, and which may have been then actually paid for; but the said company shall not be liable to pay commission on any sums not actually received by them."

The defendant's manufacturing premises were destroyed by fire in March, 1889, and he made no attempt to resume business there or elsewhere, or to furnish employment to Turner, who consequently commenced this action for damages for breach of contract on the 31st day of May in the same year. The damages were assessed by the jury at £125, but the question whether there had been a breach of contract was reserved, and having been afterwards argued before Grantham, J., that judge held that, as there was no express agreement to supply goods, there had been no breach of contract, and accordingly ordered judgment to be entered for the defendant.

The plaintiff appealed.

Winch, Q.C., and H. Kisch, for the appellant.—There has been a breach of the contract to employ the plaintiff for five years, which entitles him to damages, the defendant having no right, in view of that contract, to discontinue the business as he has done: Macintyre v. Belcher, 11 W. R. 889, 14 C. B. N. S. 654. The defendant has discontinued the business wilfully. He made no effort after the fire to find a new place of business; and besides, even if he could not help the discontinuance of the manufacturing, there was nothing to prevent his buying and selling, which would have been just the same to the plaintiff. There was nothing in the contract to limit it to goods manufactured at that particular place which was burnt down. The point taken by the learned judge was that there was no express agreement to supply goods. But it is impossible to give effect to these covenants without reading in an implied covenant to supply goods. [LOPES, L.J.—That implies a covenant to carry on business for the benefit of the agent.] Yes. [KAY, L.J.—If a man sells the future crops of an apple-tree, he cannot cut down the tree.] The defendant has shown no ground for being excused from performing his contract.

E. Bullen, for the respondent.—The agreement was merely that the plaintiff should procure orders for any goods or samples sent him. There was no express agreement by the defendant to send any such goods or samples. The remuneration agreed upon was a mere commission, not a salary. There is, therefore, no implied agreement to continue the business: Rhodes v. Forwood, 24 W. R. 1078, 1 App. Cas. 256; In re English and Scottish Marine Insurance Co., Ex parte Maclure, 18 W. R. 1122, L. R. 5 Ch. App. 737. [LOPES, L.J.—The last case on the point is Reid v. The Explosives Co., 35 W. R. 509, 19 Q. B. D. 264.] The contract here was subject to an implied condition that the defendant's place of business should continue to exist: Taylor v. Caldwell, 11 W. R. 726, 3 B. & S. 826. It would be absurd to contend that when the premises were burnt down the defendant should have to rush about to find new premises immediately, merely in order to enable him to pay the plaintiff 3¾ per cent. on his sales. [LOPES, L.J., referred to In re The Patent Floor Cloth Co., 41 L. J. Ch. 476, 20 W. R. Ch. Dig. 42, and asked how the defendant got rid of the contract to employ the plaintiff for five years.] It has been made impossible of fulfilment by an event over which the defendant had no control. The contract was merely to employ the plaintiff as agent during the continued existence of that house or business, and if rendered impossible it comes under the rule in 3 Com. Dig., "Condition," p. 125: "So the non-performance of a condition shall be excused by impossibility, or the act of God, if there be no default in the party." [KAY, L.J., referred to Cowasjee Nanabhoy v. Lallbhoy Vullubhoy, L. R. 3 Ind. App. Cas. 200. LOPES, L.J.—Is not the covenant to employ here a "positive" covenant?: see Taylor v. Caldwell.] No. Taylor v. Caldwell is in our favour, and has been followed by Appleby v. Myers, L. R. 2 C. P. 651, 15 W. R. C. L. Dig. 128.

Winch, Q.C., in reply.—The only defence put forward is that the carrying out of the contract became impossible. To make that out the defendant has to say that the contract was to employ the plaintiff to sell goods manufactured in a particular spot. Whereabouts in the contract does he find that? There are three years of the term yet to run, which gives ample time to obtain new premises. There is an implied contract to carry on the business in order to employ the plaintiff: Whittle v. Frankland, 31 L. J. M. C. 81, 10 W. R. C. L. Dig. 54. The agreement does not say the goods are to be manufactured in a particular house in Taunton. In Taylor v. Caldwell the contract was to let a particular music hall, but it was burnt down six days before the first of the days for which it was let; and it therefore became impossible to carry out the contract. The impossibility must be a physical one: Lloyd v. Guibert, L. R. 1 Q. B. 115, at p. 121. [LINDLEY, L.J., intimated that the court thought the damages as assessed by the jury too high, but that if the plaintiff agreed to accept the reduced amount at which they should be assessed by the Court of Appeal, there need not be a new trial. The suggestion of the court was assented to.]

LINDLEY, L.J.—In this action, brought by Mr. A. S. Turner for breach of contract by the defendant in not continuing to employ the plaintiff for a period of five years, the controversy depends entirely upon the true construction of the contract. The facts are these. The plaintiff was desirous of being employed as agent and traveller to the defendant, and the defendant wished to employ him as such. A contract was accordingly entered into between the defendant of the one part and the plaintiff of the other part, and there was this recital: "Whereas, in consideration of the agreement of the said A. S. Turner, the said company" (that is, Mr. Goldsmith and any partner he might have) "agree to employ the said A. S. Turner as their agent, canvasser, and traveller upon the terms and subject to the stipulations and conditions hereinafter contained; and in consideration of the premises the said A. S. Turner hereby agrees with the said company that he, the said A. S. Turner, shall and will diligently, faithfully, and honestly serve the said company as their agent, canvasser, and traveller upon the terms and subject to the stipulations and conditions hereinafter contained." There there is a clear agreement by the defendant to employ Turner, and by the plaintiff to serve the defendant, on these conditions:—(1) The agency was to be deemed to have commenced as from January 31, 1887, and was to be determinable either by the company or the plaintiff at the end of five years from the date of the agreement upon the notice therein mentioned. (2) "The said A. S. Turner shall do his utmost to obtain orders for and sell the various goods manufactured or sold by the said company as shall be from time to time forwarded or submitted by sample or pattern to him at list prices to good and substantial customers." The words "manufactured or sold by the said company" are repeated in clause 5, which is not otherwise material. Then follow other clauses, which I need not refer to, and then comes clause (8), which deals with the plaintiff's remuneration, and provides that it shall be by a commission on the goods sold by him for the company.

Now the first question upon this;—it is said, and said truly, by the defendant that there is no express agreement here to send any goods, samples, or patterns to Turner, and that there is no agreement, therefore, to give him any employment at all so as to enable him to earn any commission. This becomes material when we consider the question, How can the defendant employ Turner unless he supplies him to a reasonable extent with goods and samples to enable him to earn a commission? There is no answer to that question as far as I can see. Then it is said there is no undertaking by the company to go on manufacturing. Certainly there is no express, nor, in my opinion, any implied, agreement to manufacture a single shirt; but the company might buy the articles to be supplied to the plaintiff. Well, what happened was this. The defendant's place of business was burnt down, and he has given up the business and made no attempt to procure another place of business in order to supply Turner. The latter then says he is entitled to damages or compensation of some kind for the breach of agreement to employ him for five years. The defendant puts his case in this way. He says the continued existence of the business was an implied condition of the agreement. But there is certainly no implied condition of its continued existence at this particular place. However, it was contended that that proposition was covered by authority, and reliance was placed upon Rhodes v. Forwood, Taylor v. Caldwell, and the Indian case before the Privy Council. In the first of those cases it was held that an action of a similar kind to the present one could not be maintained, on the ground that there was no express contract to employ, and that such a contract ought not to be implied; that was the ratio decidendi. In the present case, however, there is an express and positive contract to employ Turner. In Cowasjee Jinabhoy v. Lallbhoy Vullubhoy, a partnership deed contained a contract that one of the partners should be employed as sole agent during his life to effect purchases and sales for the partnership, and should be paid by a commission upon such sales. The partnership having been dissolved by decree of the High Court of Bombay on the ground that the business could not be carried on at a profit, it was held that the partnership having come to an end, the contract for employment to sell on behalf of it had come to an end too, and that no compensation could be claimed by the agent, because it was impossible that a contract to continue the partnership under all circumstances during his life could be implied. The third case mentioned, Taylor v. Caldwell, 11 W. R. 726, 3 B. & S. 826, seems to be very much in point here. Blackburn, J., at p. 833, says: "There seems no doubt that where there is a positive contract to do a thing not in itself unlawful, the contractor must perform it or pay damages for not doing it, although, in consequence of unforeseen accidents, the performance of his contract has become unexpectedly burdensome or even impossible. . . . But this rule is only applicable when the contract is positive and absolute, and not subject to any condition either express or implied, and there are authorities which we think establish the principle that where, from the nature of the contract, it appears that the parties must from the beginning have known that it could not be fulfilled, unless, when the time for the fulfillment of the contract arrived, some particular specified thing continued to exist, so that when entering into the contract they must have contemplated such continuing existence as the foundation of what was to be done, then in the absence of any express or implied warranty that the thing shall exist, the contract is not to be construed as a positive contract, but as subject to an implied condition that the parties shall be excused in case before breach performance becomes impossible from the perishing of the thing without default of the contractor." The whole substance of that is centred in the principle that the rule that the contract is to be treated as subject to an implied condition that it is to be in force only so long as a certain state of things continues, is to be confined to those cases where the parties must have contemplated the continuing of that state of things as the foundation of what was to be done. In the present case, however, it certainly cannot be said that the parties contemplated the continued existence of the defendant's manufactory as the foundation of what was to be done; because, as I have already pointed out, there is nothing in the contract to limit the employment of the plaintiff to goods manufactured by the defendant. The result of the application of these principles, therefore, to the present case is that the plaintiff is entitled to damages, and I do not think those damages should be merely nominal. The plaintiff's counsel has agreed that the amount of these damages shall be assessed by this court, rather than there should be a new trial of the case. We think that £125 is too much, and we fix the amount at £50, for which judgment must accordingly be entered for the plaintiff.

KAY, L.J.—Lopes, L.J., has desired me to say that he concurs in the conclusion at which we have arrived. For myself, I wish to guard my judgment by saying that if in this case it had been shown that not only the manufactory but the business of the defendant had been destroyed by vis major, without any default of the defendant, I do not think the plaintiff could have recovered damages; but in fact there is an utter absence of any proof to that effect. There was no evidence that it was quite impossible after the fire for the defendant to carry on his business. The contract was a peculiar one. It was a contract to employ the plaintiff for a term of five years certain, determinable at the end of that term by three months' notice on either side. There has, therefore, been a breach by the defendant of a positive contract. The defendant contends that a condition of the continued existence of the manufactory must be implied. It is not the plaintiff who is asking that a condition may be implied in order to support his case. It is the defendant who says: "In order to justify me in putting an end to the contract, I ask the court to import a condition that the business must be carried on in this particular place." If it had been proved that, in consequence of some event over which he had no control, it had become impossible for the defendant to carry out the contract, I should have had no difficulty in holding that there had been no breach. But here it has not become impossible, and this case from that point of view is, therefore, no exception from the well-settled rule that the court will refuse to enforce a contract which it considers was made subject to an implied condition of the continued existence of something which constitutes the foundation of what is to be done, where that has ceased to exist.

For these reasons I entirely concur in the judgment of Lindley, L.J., and I concur also as to the amount of the damages.

Appeal allowed.

CARRIER v. PRICE. (a.)

Trade union—Effect of bequest and devise to—"Benevolent Fund"—Mortmain—Perpetuity—Trade Union Act, 1871 (34 & 35 Vict. c. 31), s. 7—Meaning of "purchase" in.

A testator devised and bequeathed certain freehold and leasehold properties for lives, with a condition that each devisee and legatee should keep the property held by him in repair and pay an annual sum to go to the Benevolent Fund of a registered trade union, for the benefit of distressed members of the society and widows and children of deceased members.

Held, that, the annual sum being a charge connected with land and the nature of the Benevolent Fund being charitable, the gift to it was void as offending against the Statutes of Mortmain.

The word "purchase" in section 7 of the Trade Union Act, 1871, has not the technical meaning of "take otherwise than by descent," and does not include taking by devise.

There is nothing repugnant to the law in an estate being given to a man for the combined periods of his own life and the life of the person who may be his heir.

Adjourned summons.

This was an originating summons taken out by the plaintiffs, who were executors and trustees under the will of the testator in the action, asking (inter alia) that the effect of certain devises and bequests contained in the will in favour of a trade union might be determined.

The testator, James Amos, who died on the 15th of November, 1888, by his will, after appointing the plaintiffs to be his executors, and directing payment of his debts and funeral and testamentary expenses, devised and bequeathed as follows:—"I give, devise, and bequeath unto Thomas Price the property known as 27, Bath-terrace, New Swindon, in the county of Wilts, at present occupied by the said Thomas Price, the conditions to be as follows:—That the property be left to him for his life, and for the life of his heir, after which it becomes the property of the Boiler Makers and Iron Ship Builders' Society. And to Henry Poole the property known as 41, Regent-street, New Swindon, in the county of Wilts, at present occupied by me (James Amos), the conditions to be as follows:—" (the same as in the case of 27, Bath-terrace). "And to Thomas Henry Williams the property known as 40, Regent-street, in the county of Wilts, at present occupied by Henry Poole, the conditions to be as follows:—" (the same as in the cases of 27, Bath-terrace, and 41, Regent-street). "That each of the above keep the property held by them in good repair, and shall pay to the trustees the sum of four shillings per week until the whole mortgage be paid. And that the further sum of three pounds, six shillings, and eightpence each per annum be paid by them to be disposed of as follows:—viz., Five pounds per annum to the Boiler Makers' Benevolent Fund, and five pounds per annum to the executors. Should either of the parties refuse or fail to comply with the foregoing conditions, they shall forfeit all rights to the property, and the executors shall cause the same to be handed over to the Boiler Makers' Society forthwith."

The will did not contain any residuary gift.

The property, 27, Bath-terrace, was leasehold, the other two properties were freehold.

The Boiler Makers and Iron Ship Builders' Society was instituted in 1834, and was subsequently registered as a trade union pursuant to the Trade Union Act, 1871. By its rules it was provided (rule 1) that the objects of the society were "the establishment of a fund for the relief of its members in sickness, with medical and surgical aid, assistance to members out of employment, protection of trade or disputes connected therewith, accidents, old age, for the interment of its deceased members and their wives, and for regulating the relations between workmen and masters"; (rule 2) that the society should be governed by an executive council; (rule 12) that all moneys subscribed by members should be held by the executive council as general trustees "in trust for the members generally"; (rule 20) that no person should be admitted a member who was not "a legal boiler maker or iron ship builder—namely, an angle iron smith, plater, riveter, caulker, and holder-up."

Rule 39 dealt with the Benevolent Fund, and provided (section 1) that "sixpence in the pound, paid per annum, as contributions, should be taken for benevolent purposes, which should be under the control of the executive council"; (section 2) that "the widow of any deceased member who was in need of, and applied for, assistance to the branch of which her deceased husband was a member, within twelve months of his death, the officers of the branch (sic) should send the application to the executive council, with a recommendation or otherwise, when the executive council should have power to grant £5 to the widow and £1 to each child under thirteen years of age, or withhold the same, as they might decide"; (section 4) that "when children were left without any parents at the death of the father, they should (with the approval of the executive council) receive the £5 which the mother would have been entitled to if she had been living, in addition to their own grant," and that "the cases of any other distressed members might be sent to the executive council . . . when they should have power to grant any sums the cases might deserve, if there were funds to meet it."

Section 7 of the Trade Union Act, 1871, provides that "it shall be lawful for any trade union registered under this Act to purchase or take upon lease in the names of the trustees for the time being of such union any land not exceeding one acre, and to sell, exchange, mortgage, or let the same, and no purchaser, assignee, mortgagee, or tenant shall be bound to inquire whether the trustees have authority for any sale, exchange, mortgage, or letting, and the receipt of the trustees shall be a discharge for the money arising therefrom."

The summons asked that a proper construction might be put upon the devises, bequests, and directions in the said will contained of and concerning the properties at New Swindon—viz., No. 27, Bath-terrace, No. 40, Regent-street, and No. 41, Regent-street—and that the rights of the parties interested therein might be ascertained and declared, and that the effect of the gift of £5 per annum to the defendants the Boiler Makers' Benevolent Fund might be determined.

Robertson-Macdonald, for the summons.

Church, for Thomas Price and Thomas Henry Williams.—The gift to the devisee "for his life and the life of his heir" gives him, besides his own life estate, an estate pur autre vie (that of his heir) after his death. Similarly in the case of the leasehold the legatee takes an interest for his own life, and in addition another for the life of his personal representative. The gift of £5 a year to the Benevolent Fund is a rent-charge out of land for a charity, and therefore bad: Pease v. Pattinson, 34 W. R. 361, 32 Ch. D. 154. The Boiler Makers' Society cannot take the properties in remainder, for they cannot hold land at all except so far as they are allowed by section 7 of the Act of 1871—that is, by purchase or lease.

J. C. Gordon, for Henry Poole, with similar interests.—The Benevolent Fund and the Association were separated in the mind of the testator. The gift of £5 a year is a rent-charge, and is void.

Hood, for the testator's heiress-at-law and one of his next of kin.—An estate to a man for his life, followed by another to him during the life of an unascertained person, is a thing unknown to the law. The remainder to the boiler makers subject to the life interests is an offence against the rule of perpetuities. This association, again, can only take land strictly in accordance with the terms of the Act under which it is registered.

Upjohn, for the Boiler Makers' Society and the Benevolent Fund.—(1) This association is not a corporation. (2) Nor is it a charity, as is clear from section 16 of the Trade Union Act Amendment Act, 1876. [NORTH, J.—Is not the Benevolent Fund charitable?] I can hardly contend that it is not. But the association is not charitable: In re Clark's Trust, 24 W. R. 233, 1 Ch. D. 497; it is merely a kind of mutual insurance society; no rule except the Benevolent Fund rule requires a member to be in distress. [NORTH, J.—You do not distinguish Pease v. Pattinson, in which there were rules similar to those you are commenting upon, and there the association was held to be a charity.] That case was not very well considered. In Spiller v. Maude, 32 Ch. D. 158, n. (2), Jessel, M.R., held a society charitable, but on the ground that poverty was a necessary element to entitle a member to the benefits of it; but in In re Clark's Trust poverty was not a necessary element, and the society was held not to be charitable, and here poverty is not a condition, and that case covers the present. (3) The purposes of the Boiler Makers' Society do not involve a perpetuity, they have power to sell under section 7 of the Act of 1871, and so there is no perpetuity: Carne v. Long, 8 W. R. 570, 2 De G. F. & J. 75. That section also gives them the power to "purchase" land, and the word there has its technical meaning of "taking otherwise than by descent," and so includes taking by devise. If the words are to be construed strictly the society may only acquire for valuable consideration, and are precluded from taking a voluntary conveyance from a member or under his will. The person in whom the legal estate is vested is to be called upon to convey to the trustees of the society. The gift of £5 a year to the Benevolent Fund is good; it is not an interest in land, but a mere personal payment out of the pockets of the tenants for life; there is no power to distrain for it nor claim of any kind against the land for it: In re Thompson, Bedford v. Teal, ante, p. 50, 45 Ch. D. 161.

NORTH, J.—The only question is between the heir-at-law and next of kin of the testator on the one hand, and the devisees and legatee of the three properties given by the will on the other. A great deal of time has been taken up in the case, and the total amount in question is very small. The testator by his will appoints two executors, the plaintiffs, and after directing payment of his debts and funeral and testamentary expenses, devises and bequeaths as follows:—[His lordship stated the parts in question of the will as set out above, and proceeded:—] Now what is the effect of the gift of the three properties in remainder to the Boiler Makers and Iron Ship Builders' Society? and what the effect of the gift of £5 per annum to the Boiler Makers' Benevolent Fund, which is merely a fund administered by the Boiler Makers and Iron Ship Builders' Society under rule 39 of the society, so that it is simply a gift to the society for the purposes of the fund? Now the society exists for the purposes of the Act under which it is registered, and, in my opinion, a bequest to it is one which cannot take effect, inasmuch as it is one which tends to a perpetuity on the authority of Carne v. Long and In re Clark's Trust.

Again, this society could not take land at all except under section 7 of the Act. [His lordship read the material part of the section.] It is argued that "purchase" in this section has the technical meaning of taking otherwise than by descent or escheat, and that, accordingly, it includes taking by devise. That, undoubtedly, is the meaning of the word sometimes, but, in my opinion, it is not its meaning here. If it were the succeeding words "or take upon lease" would be so much tautology. I think, however, it might include the purchasing of a lease not taken directly from the landlord. Moreover, the words of the section are "to purchase or take upon lease in the names of the trustees for the time being": how could a devise be a purchase in the names of trustees? Besides, the quantity of land which is allowed to be taken, and which is not to exceed one acre, seems to point rather to the acquisition of a site, for an office for instance, than to the taking of land for general purposes.

I hold, then, that the gifts in remainder of the three properties in question to the Boiler Makers and Iron Ship Builders' Society are void for the reasons I have already given. As to the gift of £5 per annum to the Benevolent Fund, that, in my opinion, is a gift connected with land, and void as an offence against the Statutes of Mortmain.

It remains to say what are the interests of the tenants for life in the three properties. In my opinion there is a gift to each for his own life, which is a good gift, and then there is a further gift, also good, to him for the life of his heir; so that each takes for the combined period of his own life and that of the person who shall be his heir, the life of the heir being superadded to his own. At the end of that period the properties go, the freeholds to the testator's heir-at-law and the leasehold to his legal personal representative.

This may not be what the testator himself intended, but it is the construction I put upon what he has said.

AYLWARD v. LEWIS. (a.)

Mortgage—Foreclosure—Death of mortgagor insolvent and without a personal representative before the time limited for redemption—Representative for purposes of action.

An order for foreclosure was obtained in a foreclosure action, but the defendant mortgagor died insolvent before the expiration of the period limited for redemption of the mortgaged property. There was no personal representative of his estate, and an order was made appointing one of his next of kin to represent his estate for the purposes of the action.

Held, on a motion for foreclosure absolute, that no order would be made in the absence of a properly-constituted representative of the mortgagor's estate.

Motion.

The question for decision was whether an order for foreclosure absolute ought to be made in a foreclosure action in respect of the estate of a mortgagor who had died insolvent and without a legal personal representative after the date of the chief clerk's certificate, but before the time limited for redemption had expired.

The action was brought for foreclosure of certain mortgages of leaseholds made to the plaintiff by the defendant, and a receiver of the rents of the mortgaged property was appointed.

On the 15th of February, 1890, judgment for foreclosure was obtained, the defendant having made default in pleading; and by the judgment the period during which the defendant was entitled to redeem was limited to six months from the date of the chief clerk's certificate.

The 22nd of May, 1890, was the date on which the certificate was made, and the period for redemption expired on the 22nd of November, 1890; but in the interval the defendant died insolvent and there was no legal personal representative.

On the 14th of November, 1890, upon the application of the plaintiff, an order was made in chambers, under ord. 16, r. 46, appointing the defendant's brother, who was one of his next of kin, to represent the defendant's estate for the purposes of the action; and it was ordered that the plaintiff should, on or before the 19th of November, 1890, serve the defendant's brother with this order, and that, on such service being duly effected and on default of payment by the defendant's brother on or before the 24th of November, 1890, of the sum found due to the plaintiff by the chief clerk's certificate, the brother, as representing the defendant's estate, should be absolutely foreclosed.

The order was duly served on the defendant's brother within the prescribed period.

There was in the hands of the receiver a small balance of money received by him, which balance had not been included in the chief clerk's certificate.

This was a motion by the plaintiff that the receiver might be ordered to pay the balance to the plaintiff; that the receiver might then be discharged; that the period of redemption might be enlarged to the 27th of February, 1891, and that unless the brother, as representing the defendant's estate, should on that day pay the sum found due to the plaintiff by the chief clerk's certificate, less the balance in the hands of the receiver, the brother, as representing the defendant's estate, should be absolutely foreclosed.

Vernon Smith, for the motion.—The order asked for is the proper order under the circumstances of the case: Jenner Fust v. Needham, 34 W. R. 709, 32 Ch. D. 582. [NORTH, J.—I am not satisfied that the order I made in chambers was right, and that there is a proper representative of the mortgagor's estate before the court.] The order appointing the defendant's brother to represent his estate was right: ord. 16, r. 46; Peat v. Gott, W. N., 1885, p. 46; Neal v. Barrett, W. N., 1887, p. 88.

NORTH, J.—I am not satisfied that the order I made in chambers was right; but if it was properly made, it does not follow that the estate can now be foreclosed. I have not got the mortgagor's estate here in any way, except in so far that a person has been appointed to represent it who may have no interest in it. I am not satisfied with the order appointing him, which may be a right order as a step in the right direction. I have decided following a decision of the Court of Appeal that an insolvent trustee is not a sufficient party to a suit so that the cestui que trust may be bound. I am not satisfied that a person who has not got the estate of the mortgagor with which to pay, properly represents that estate in a foreclosure action. In fact I think he does not. I decline to make an order for foreclosure in the absence of a properly-constituted representative of the mortgagor.

CARTER v. SILBER.
CARTER v. HASLUCK. (a.)

Infant—Marriage settlement—Confirmation or repudiation—Election—Compensation—Forfeiture—Infants' Relief Act, 1874 (37 & 38 Vict. c. 62), s. 2—Infants' Marriage Settlements Act, 1855 (18 & 19 Vict. c. 43).

A marriage settlement, dated the 16th of October, 1883, was made on the occasion of the marriage of two infants. The settlement was confirmed by the court on behalf of the wife, but not on behalf of the husband. By the settlement the husband's father covenanted with the trustees to pay £1,500 a year during the life of the wife and such further period as there should be any child or grandchild of the intended marriage, to be payable by equal quarterly instalments, such sum to be paid by them to the husband until he should assign, charge, or affect so to do, in which event there was a discretionary trust over. The settlement also contained a covenant by the husband that if, during the continuance of the annuity, he became entitled, under certain other settlements executed by his father, or under the will of either his father or his mother, to any property, he would assign the same to the trustees of his marriage settlement, in reduction of the amount of capital necessary to be set apart to meet the annuity.

The father, by his will dated the 22nd of November, 1878, gave the residue of his property equally between his two sons, one of whom was the husband in question. The testator died on the 14th of May, 1887. The husband attained his majority on the 19th of November, 1883, and received three instalments of the annuity, and paid over to the trustees of the settlement a sum received by him under one of the earlier settlements made by his father, but without prejudice to his right to repudiate the settlement. On the 31st of July, 1888, formal notice of repudiation by the husband, of the settlement of the 16th of October, 1883, was given to the trustees.

The trustees brought an action to have it declared that the husband could not repudiate, and that, if he could repudiate, compensation ought to be made by him out of any moneys payable to him under the settlement and out of the property which would have been comprised in his covenant if he had not repudiated.

Held, that the husband was entitled to repudiate the settlement, and had done so within a reasonable time of coming of age and acquiring a knowledge of his rights.

Held, that, as he had repudiated, he must make compensation out of his interests under the settlement and out of the property coming to him under his father's will.

Held, also, that such compensation, coming out of moneys payable to the husband under the settlement, operated as a forfeiture of his right to the annuity thereunder, and that the discretionary trust over took effect.

Trial of action.

This was an action commenced on the 17th of June, 1889, by Robert Brudenell Carter and the Right Honourable Arthur Henry George, Earl of Lisburne, the trustees of the settlement, dated the 16th of October, 1883, made on the marriage of the defendants Martin Albert Silber and Lady Lucy Silber (then Lady Lucy Vaughan), against the beneficiaries under the settlement, and certain incumbrancers on the interest of Martin Albert Silber, and originally claimed to have the rights of all parties under the settlement declared and the trusts thereof administered by the court. Subsequently the pleadings were amended, and raised substantially the question whether, under the circumstances hereinafter stated, the defendant, M. A. Silber, having been an infant at the date when the settlement was made, could repudiate it after coming of age, and, if so, whether he was bound in consequence, to compensate the persons disappointed by his repudiation, out of certain property given to him by his father's will, or out of an annuity settled on him by the deed in question.

The settlement in question was dated the 16th of October, 1883, and was made between Albert Marcius Silber of the first part, Martin Albert Silber, then an infant of the age of twenty years and upwards, son of Albert Marcius Silber, of the second part, Lady Lucy Silber (then Lady Lucy Vaughan), an infant of the age of eighteen years, of the third part, the plaintiff R. B. Carter and the plaintiff the Earl of Lisburne (then Lord Vaughan), of the fourth part; it contained recitals, that an insurance on the life of the said Martin Albert Silber to the amount of £20,000 had been effected by the said Albert Marcius Silber payable on the said Martin Albert Silber attaining the age of sixty years or on his death under that age, and that it had been agreed that the said Albert Marcius Silber should enter into the covenant thereinafter contained for the payment during the life of the said Lady Lucy Vaughan, and for such further period (if any) as there should be living any child or grandchild of the said intended marriage, of the yearly sum of £1,500, and that such yearly sum should be paid or applied in manner thereinafter provided; and by the operative part the said A. M. Silber, the father, covenanted with the plaintiffs that in case the said intended marriage should take place, he, the said A. M. Silber, his heirs, executors, or administrators, would pay to the trustees of the said indenture of settlement the yearly sum of £1,500 during the life of the said Lady Lucy Silber, and during such further period (if any) as there should be living any child or grandchild of the said intended marriage, such sum of £1,500 to be payable by equal quarterly payments, payable in advance every three months, the first of such payments to be made on the day of the marriage, but to be deemed to accrue from day to day so as to be apportionable according to law at the commencement or termination thereof. And it was agreed and declared that the said trustees should pay the said yearly sum of £1,500 as and when the growing payments thereof should be received by them to the said M. A. Silber, the intended husband, during his life, or until he should become a bankrupt or should assign or charge, or affect to assign or charge, the said yearly sum, or some part thereof, or until some other event should happen whereby the said yearly sum or some part thereof, if belonging absolutely to him, would become vested in or payable to some other persons or person; and in the event of failure or determination during the life of the said husband of the trust thereinbefore declared in his favour, should during the remainder of his life, if the said Lady Lucy Silber or any child or grandchild of the said intended marriage should so long live, pay or apply all or any part of the said yearly sum unto or for the personal support or benefit of the said husband and his wife and issue (if any); and subject to such discretionary trust or power should hold the said yearly sum upon the trusts upon which the same would for the time being be held if the said husband were then dead. And after the death of the said husband the trustees were directed to pay the said yearly sum to the wife during her life. And it was agreed and declared that the interest of the said husband and wife respectively in the said trust premises should be subject to, and charged with, the obligation of providing out of the said yearly sum a suitable residence and maintenance for the said wife (as to the life interest of the said husband), and such of the children and grandchildren of the said intended marriage as, being male, should for the time being be under the age of twenty-one years and unmarried, or, being female, should be unmarried, in priority (unless the trustees or trustee should otherwise determine) to any other fund applicable for that purpose, but without liability to account so long as the said husband and wife, as the case might be, should duly provide such residence and maintenance. And after the death of the said husband and wife the trustees were directed to stand possessed of the said yearly sum of £1,500 upon the trusts declared concerning the moneys assured by the said policy—viz., for such child or children of the said intended marriage as the said husband and wife should by any deeds jointly appoint. And in default of such appointment then as the survivor of them should by any deed or deeds or will appoint, and in default of appointment in trust for all children of the said intended marriage who, being sons, should attain the age of twenty- one years, or, being daughters, should attain that age or marry under that age, and if more than one in equal shares. And it was agreed and declared that if during the continuance of the annuity the father or the husband should transfer any stock to the trustees in satisfaction pro tanto of the said yearly sum for the time being payable, at the rate of four per cent. per annum, so that the said yearly sum should thenceforth be reduced by one twenty-fifth part of the value of the stock so transferred, then that the trustees should hold the same upon the trust declared of the policy moneys. And it was further agreed and declared that if the said husband then was, or if he or the trustees should become, entitled to any property whatsoever under any settlement executed or to be executed by the said father, or under any appointment made or to be made in exercise of any power in any such settlement contained or to be contained, or under or by virtue of the will of the said father, unless such settlement or appointment or will should otherwise direct, such property, if not thereby given to the said trustees, should be vested in them upon the trusts thereinbefore declared with respect to the moneys assured by or to become payable under the said policy, or such of the same trusts as should be then subsisting and capable of taking effect; and the amount or value of all such property so acquired by the trustees should be applicable by way of satisfaction pro tanto at the rate aforesaid of the yearly sum covenanted to be paid by the father.

The settlement was approved by the Chancery Division of the High Court of Justice on behalf of Lady Lucy Silber, but not on behalf of the defendant Martin Albert Silber. It was duly executed by all the said parties thereto, including Martin Albert Silber. The marriage took place, and there were two children born of it, the defendants V. E. M. Silber and E. E. E. A. Silber.

Martin Albert Silber, the husband, attained the age of twenty-one years on the 19th of November, 1883.

A. M. Silber, the father, had, previously to the settlement in question, made three settlements dated respectively the 2nd of June, 1865, the 31st of December, 1870, and the 22nd of March, 1875, the trusts of which were nearly identical, and to the effect that his wife, the defendant Amelia Silber, should have the income of the funds thereby respectively settled for life, with remainder to such of the settlor's children as he should by will or deed appoint. By his will, dated the 22nd of November, 1878, A. M. Silber, the father, confirmed the settlements last mentioned, and in exercise of the powers in them contained, he directed that, after the determination of the trusts for his wife, the trust estates should be held upon trust to raise thereout certain sums for his daughters, and on further trust to divide and pay or transfer the residue of the same premises to or between such of his sons as should attain the age of twenty-one years, and, if more than one, in equal shares. And after certain specific and pecuniary bequests, he devised and bequeathed all his residuary real and personal property upon trust for such of his sons as should attain twenty-one, or, if there should be but one such son, the whole to be in trust for him.

A. M. Silber, the father, died on the 14th of May, 1887. On his father's death the question whether Martin Albert Silber, the husband, was entitled to repudiate the covenants on his part contained in the settlement of the 16th of October, 1883, was raised, and on the 16th of January, 1888, his solicitors wrote to the trustees to the effect that, without in any way admitting that the husband was bound by the covenant to settle his after-acquired property, and without prejudice to his right to repudiate the same should he be so advised, he consented to his share under the settlement of the 31st of December, 1870, which amounted to about £2,448 18s. 1d., and had fallen in, being paid to the plaintiffs as trustees under the settlement of the 16th of October, 1883. The husband, after his father's death, also received the quarterly instalments of the annuity on the 17th of January, 1888, the 17th of April, and the 17th of July, 1888.

On the 31st of July, 1888, formal notice was given by the husband that he declined to be bound by the settlement of the 16th of October, 1883, on the ground that he was under age at the time when the deed was executed by him, and the deed had not been approved by the court on his behalf.

The other defendants to the present action were Henry Arthur White, John Edward and Henry Isaacs, R. Coulson, John Lee Booker, John A. Morris, Benjamin Blaiberg, and Bertha Hamerton, incumbrancers upon the share of the husband in his father's estate, and H. A. White also claimed to be assignee of the instalments of the annuity of £1,500 accruing on the 17th of October, 1888, the 17th of January, 1889, and the 17th of July, 1889.

On the 28th of November, 1889, M. A. Silber assigned to J. E. and H. Isaacs all his interest under the settlement of October 16, 1883, but expressly excluded any interest which by assignment or attempted assignment was liable to forfeiture.

Neville, Q.C., and Maidlow, for the plaintiffs.—M. A. Silber must be assumed to know the provisions of the settlement he executed. He allowed his father to live and die believing that the settlement was binding, and after his death he went on accepting benefits under it. He has by his acts affirmed the settlement, and cannot now repudiate it. Even though the execution of it did not bind him, he at least is affected by notice of its contents: Watts v. Cresswell, 9 Viner's Abridgment, 415. The settlement was not void, but only voidable: Duncan v. Dixon, 38 W. R. 700, 44 Ch. D. 211; Esron v. Nicholas, 1 De G. & Sm. 118. If M. A. Silber can repudiate he must compensate the plaintiffs, and they are entitled to a lien on his interest under his father's will to the extent of the benefits which he has received under it: Codrington v. Codrington, 24 W. R. 648, L. R. 7 H. L. 860.

Chadwyck Healey, Q.C., and F. Thompson, for Amelia Silber.—M. A. Silber must have known everything about the settlement and has confirmed it: Whittingham v. Murdy, 60 L. T. 956, 37 W. R. Dig. 91. The settlement of an infant is not void, but voidable, and that within a reasonable time: Cornwall v. Hawkins, 20 W. R. 653. The same principle is applicable to a contract by an infant to take shares in a company. A voidable contract by an infant is sufficient to sever a joint tenancy: Burnaby v. Equitable Reversionary Interest Society, 33 W. R. 639, 28 Ch. D. 416.

Sir Horace Davey, Q.C., and Hornell, for H. A. White.—M. A. Silber repudiated the settlement, and had a perfect right to do so. The acts relied on as confirmation were done by him when he had no information as to his rights; he repudiated within a reasonable time, and there is no occasion for putting him to election: Codrington v. Lindsay, 21 W. R. 182, L. R. 8 Ch. App. 578; Wilson v. Thornbury, 23 W. R. 329, L. R. 10 Ch. App. 239. For a case of election there must be (1) distinct knowledge of the elector's position; (2) distinct intention—i.e., determination to elect. Until M. A. Silber knew what the value of the property was which he took, how could he elect? and he did not know his rights until after his father's death. He never did any act with the intention or knowledge that it should be construed as an election. The payments of the annuity made cannot be regained; there could only (if at all) be a right of retainer as to accruing payments. In Codrington v. Lindsay the repayments were made by consent of all parties out of another fund. As to section 2 of the Infants' Relief Act of 1874, if the contract of an infant is void, it cannot be ratified; if voidable, it can. Kekewich, J., in Duncan v. Dixon, if he meant that section 2 did not apply to voidable contracts, must have been wrong. It was most improbable that M. A. Silber really knew the contents of his settlement. Ex parte Jones, 29 W. R. 747, 18 Ch. D. 109, has some valuable remarks on the Act of 1874 by Jessel, M.R.

Haldane, Q.C., and J. G. Butcher, for M. A. Silber.—We urge three points—(1) there is no evidence of ratification; (2) if there has been ratification, the Infants' Relief Act comes in; (3) election and compensation do not apply. M. A. Silber clearly did not know his rights until 1888. As to (2), in Duncan v. Dixon the case of ratification did not arise, it turned on section 1. Coxhead v. Mullis, 27 W. R. 136, 3 C. P. D. 442, is a clear decision in our favour. This action itself is founded on ratification.

ROMER, J.—Can I do more in the present state of the pleadings than direct the trustees to bring an action on the covenant? I can decide the rights if the plaintiffs amend by claiming—(1) that M. A. Silber is bound by the settlement; (2) and if not bound, then alternative relief by compensation. If this is done there will be liberty for all parties to amend.

After further argument ROMER, J., directed the pleadings to be amended.

The pleadings having been amended, the case again came on for argument on the 24th of April. As amended the 16th paragraph of the claim was as follows: "The plaintiffs claim that the said M. A. Silber was and is bound by the said settlement of the 16th of October, 1883, and that his attempted repudiation of it was inoperative. The said M. A. Silber was from the first aware of the purport and effect of the settlement of the 16th of October, 1883. He took a personal part in the negotiations for it, and it was duly read over to him before he executed it. He knew that it was the intention of his father that any property to which he might become entitled under any settlement executed by his father, or under any appointment in exercise of any power in any such settlement contained, or under or by virtue of his father's will or any codicil thereto, should be settled upon the trusts of the said settlement so as to diminish pro tanto the liability of his father under his covenant in respect of the annuity, and by his silence during his father's life he implied that he would give effect to such intention, and the father confirmed his will by the codicil of the 28th day of June, 1886, and in particular left the share of his residuary estate to the said M. A. Silber instead of formally settling it upon the trusts of the settlement in the belief that such intention would be carried out by the said M. A. Silber, and the said M. A. Silber is bound by a trust in respect thereof. Further, it was not competent for the said M. A. Silber to repudiate the said settlement, except within a reasonable time after he attained the age of twenty-one years, and under the circumstances such reasonable time had at all events elapsed at the time of his father's death. Moreover, it was not competent for him to repudiate the said settlement after his receipt in manner hereinbefore mentioned of the said annuity payable thereunder."

The statement of claim further set forth that by a scheme of arrangement for the affairs of the defendant M. A. Silber approved by his creditors on the 27th of October, 1890, and subsequently approved by the Court of Bankruptcy, it was provided that the scheme should not affect the interest of the debtor in the annuity in pleadings mentioned, but that all other property of the debtor, including his share in his father's residuary estate and all other interests which he was or might become entitled to by his repudiation of the said settlement of the 16th of October, 1883, should vest in Laurence Hasluck, as trustee, to be administered by him as though the debtor had been adjudicated bankrupt, and Hasluck was made a party to the action.

Lady Lucy Silber and her infant children were also made defendants to the amended statement of claim, and put in several defences.

Neville, Q.C., and Maidlow, for the plaintiffs.—The relief claimed by the amended statement of claim is partly founded on Codrington v. Lindsay, which was afterwards taken to the House of Lords and decided in Codrington v. Codrington, 24 W. R. 648, L. R. 7 H. L. 854. The judgment was a considered judgment on the point as to whether there should be compensation or not, and out of what fund. M. A. Silber, though under twenty-one years of age, was affected with notice of the contents of the settlement. The result of the evidence given is that the only thing in that document which he did not understand was the covenant to settle his after-acquired property. He acted as go-between between his father and Lord Lisburne in the negotiations. Either he did know, or was bound to know, of the existence of this covenant. His father knew of the obligations his son had contracted under the settlement, and acted on that footing up to the time of his death, continuing to pay the annuity, and made his will in the belief the son would perform his covenant. It would be inequitable against the father that the son should be permitted to repudiate his covenant. Even if he can repudiate the plaintiffs are entitled to a lien on his interests under his father's will.

Haldane, Q.C., and J. G. Butcher, for M. A. Silber.—(1) This action is incompetent, as it is an action to charge him on a ratification; (2) there is no fund out of which compensation can be made. As to the first point there never was ratification. M. A. Silber repudiated the settlement as soon as he acquired a knowledge of his rights. But even if the allegations in paragraph 16 bind M. A. Silber, the Infants' Relief Act, 1874, applies, and prevents him ratifying. Section 1 of that Act refers to specified contracts, which do not comprise a marriage settlement; but section 2 refers to ratification of all contracts. This is clear on the words, and the following cases make this even clearer: Coxhead v. Mullis; Ditcham v. Worrall, 5 C. P. D. 410. In the latter case Lindley, L.J., does not express dissent from Coxhead v. Mullis. It is true that in Duncan v. Dixon Kekewich, J., doubted Coxhead v. Mullis. There being no ratification, the question of the 2nd section does not arise. The 2nd section was meant to deal with ratification, and is, in fact, quite distinct from section 1. Then it is urged that compensation ought to be made. It cannot be made out of the annuity, as it is inalienable. Election may be rebutted by a particular intention—i.e., an intention may be found in the instrument rebutting the presumption that every part of the instrument shall take effect, which is the principle on which the doctrine of election depends. The principle of the doctrine is clearly laid down in Codrington v. Lindsay. "Restraint on anticipation" is a contrary intention: In re Vardon's Trusts, 34 W. R. 185, 31 Ch. D. 275. In Willoughby v. Middleton, 10 W. R. 460, 2 J. & H. 344, it was decided that a married woman restrained from anticipation could be put to election. The case was commented on in Smith v. Lucas, 30 W. R. 451, 18 Ch. D. 531. [ROMER, J.—Do you say that a man who forfeits on alienation is in the same position as a woman restrained from anticipation?] Yes; restraint upon alienation, as upon anticipation, is an indication of intention that the whole instrument need not necessarily take effect: In re Vardon's Trusts. The annuity is vested in M. A. Silber; if he had to make compensation out of it it would become vested in someone else and go over. There is a particular intention that M. A. Silber should not alienate the annuity; if he makes compensation out of it he does, in fact, alienate: Smith v. Lucas. McCarogher v. Whieldon, L. R. 3 Eq. 236, 15 W. R. Ch. Dig. 32, distinctly shows that the doctrine of election cannot apply. The covenant to settle is voidable, and independent of the other provisions of the settlement. He disaffirms the covenant, but he is not bound to approbate or reprobate the settlement as a whole, and he has no fund out of which compensation can be made. The effect of the determination of the life interest would be to benefit Lady Lucy Silber, and the people really entitled to compensation would get nothing.

Chitty, for Lady Lucy Silber.—My case is based on the principle that there are certain contracts which are binding until repudiated, and the repudiation must be express and within a reasonable time. They are contracts dealing with permanent property: Zouch v. Parsons, 3 Burr. 1794; Burnaby v. Equitable Reversionary Interest Society. A voidable contract is either (1) binding until repudiated, or (2) not valid until confirmed. Under the first head comes a covenant in a marriage settlement: Smith v. Lucas. This principle applies to all the contracts of an infant that are continuing, all that deal with property of a permanent nature, all the deeds of an infant. There was no repudiation here within a reasonable time: London and North-Western Railway Co. v. McMichael, 5 Ex. 114. There is no distinction between a deed of an infant in which there is a covenant, and a deed in which there is a conveyance. The decisions all depend on fact that there is a deed: Cornwall v. Hawkins. As to the reasonable time within which repudiation must be made, a person bound by a voidable contract ought not to be allowed to repudiate after any of the persons interested have changed their position by reason of the non-repudiation. In this case the father lived and died under the impression that the son would fulfil his covenant: Jones v. Badley, 16 W. R. 713, 3 Ch. App. 362; In re Tussaud's Estate, Tussaud v. Tussaud, 26 W. R. 874, 9 Ch. D. 376. McCarogher v. Whieldon is cited in nine subsequent cases without disapproval, and must therefore be taken to be good law.

Methold, for the two infant defendants V. E. M. Silber and E. E. E. A. Silber.—The father cannot have intended the son to have £1,500 in any event. This is the particular intention which is set up to bring the case within In re Vardon's Trusts. The covenants to pay the annuity and to settle after-acquired property are interdependent, and the whole settlement hangs together.

Horton Smith, Q.C., and Ingpen, for the defendant J. E. H. Isaacs.

Franks, for Hasluck.

Waggett, for B. Hamerton.

Neville, Q.C., in reply.—M. A. Silber received three instalments after the letter of December 4, 1887, and therefore ratified, and did not repudiate within a reasonable time. We do not expressly raise the question of forfeiture of annuity if he has to compensate, but it is impliedly raised in the claim of the statement of claim, and it is raised by the infants.

Cur. adv. vult.

On May 29 judgment was delivered.

ROMER, J.—In this case there is no dispute as to facts apart from the question as to the actual knowledge of the defendant Martin Albert Silber, during his father's lifetime, of the effect of the settlement, as pleaded in paragraph 16 of the re-amended statement of claim. This question is one distinct from that of the legal effect of his execution of the settlement, which I will consider hereafter. On the evidence before me I am satisfied that the defendant, the son, was not, in fact, aware, during his father's lifetime, that the settlement purported to bind any property he might acquire under his father's will, and that the allegation in paragraph 16, as to the son being aware of his father's intention, there referred to, and by his silence encouraging his father to make or confirm the disposition by will of his father's property, under the belief that the son would not repudiate his execution of the settlement, are unfounded.

Now, the son having executed the settlement while a minor, and not under the authority of the court, it is clear, I think, that the settlement was voidable by him, and that he could avoid it in a reasonable time after he attained twenty-one. In the cases where a minor executes a voidable deed the numerous authorities cited before me show, and I think the true effect of these authorities amounts to this, that what is a reasonable time for the infant to repudiate after he attains twenty-one depends on the circumstances of each case fairly considered.

The first question, therefore, I have to consider is whether, under the circumstances of this case, the son was bound by his not having repudiated the deed during his father's lifetime. I think he was not. During this period he was not called upon by any person to re-execute or to further consider the deed, and I think there was, on his part, no unfair dealing or misleading of his father or of any other party. Moreover, in any case, during this period, whether the deed bound the son or not, it bound the father, and the son was entitled to receive the moneys which were paid to him under the deed. Until the father's death, and until it became known that the son was entitled under the will to a share in the father's estate, no question actually arose as to the effect of the deed on any property coming to the son, and the right of the trustees to withhold payments under the deed to the son to compensate those injured by the son's refusal to allow his property to be bound by the deed only first arose on the death of the father.

For these reasons I think the son was not bound during his father's lifetime, notwithstanding the receipt during that period of the annuity payable under the deed by the father.

The next point I have to consider is whether the son's formal repudiation on the 31st of July, 1888 (the father having died on the 14th of May, 1887), came too late, bearing in mind that in the meantime the son had received three quarterly instalments of the reduced annuity. I have come to the conclusion that it did not, for I think that the son was entitled to a reasonable time after the father's death to ascertain what his rights were, and what his father's residuary estate would probably amount to, and to be advised before he finally elected, and that the time taken was not, under the circumstances of the case, unreasonable. This, however, must be subject to the son's obligation of repaying the three instalments he received, which, in my judgment, he is bound to do.

For reasons already appearing I do not think this obligation extends to the sums he received during the father's lifetime.

The next point which arises is whether the trustees have an equity to be paid these three instalments out of the son's share in the father's residuary estate and other the property which would have been comprised in the covenant of the son in the deed of settlement if he had not repudiated the same, in priority to the claims of the son's mortgagees and of his trustee under the scheme of arrangement in bankruptcy. I have come to the conclusion that I cannot treat this question as an open one for me to decide. I consider myself bound by the decision in Codrington v. Lindsay, which cannot be distinguished on this point from the present case. It is true that in the reports of that case I find no mention of any arguments on the point in question. But the point was decided there, and not by consent. In the report of the case in L. R. 8 Ch. App. at p. 584 I find Lord Selborne saying that the equity in question did exist, and minutes of the decree given at page 594 are clear on the point, and were evidently most carefully considered. This decree was appealed from to the House of Lords, and the lords who decided the appeal evidently carefully considered, and in some respects altered, the form of the decree appealed from, and yet did not alter the decree on the point I am now considering. It follows that I must make a declaration in the present case of the existence of the equity in question to the extent I have indicated, and I will only add that I think it is inaccurate to describe this equity as a lien, as has been sometimes done.

I have now further to consider the effect of the repudiation on the moneys which, notwithstanding the repudiation, would still continue to be payable to the son according to the terms of the settlement. I think that those moneys must be retained by the trustees in order to make compensation, and until compensation has been thereby fully made, to the persons disappointed by the repudiation of the benefits under the settlement of which they have been, or will be, deprived by the repudiation. And this gives rise to the further question whether the right of retainer on the part of the trustees does not in itself determine the further payment of the annuity under the deed to the son, seeing that the annuity has thereby "become vested in, or payable to, some other person or persons" within the meaning of those words as used in the deed. I think this further question must be answered in the affirmative, and that consequently the trusts have arisen under the deed with regard to the annuity declared in the event of the failure or determination during the lifetime of the son of the previous trust declared in his favour. For these points there is to guide me the authority of McCarogher v. Whieldon, which was decided in 1867, and has never been questioned until now, and ought, I think, to be treated as binding on me. It is, however, said on behalf of the son that that case has in effect been overruled, and that the case before me is governed by Vardon's Trusts. But Vardon's Trusts appears to me quite distinguishable from the case now before me. In Vardon's Trusts the Court of Appeal held that the restraint on anticipation which fettered the settlement of income to the separate use of a married woman altogether prevented, and was intended by the parties to the settlement altogether to prevent, that income ceasing to be payable to the married woman by any act on her part, including any election by her against the settlement. But in the case before me I can find no indication that the parties to the settlement intended that the annuity should always continue to be payable to the son. On the contrary, they contemplated his assigning or charging it, and provided (inter alia) that if he did assign or charge it it should cease to be payable to him. And certainly I cannot gather that it was the intention of the parties to this settlement that the son should be at liberty to repudiate it so far as his obligations were concerned, and still continue to enjoy the annuity. I find here no declaration of a particular intention which is inconsistent with or excludes the doctrine of election.

The above decides all the points which I have been called upon to deal with in this case.

There must accordingly be a declaration to the following effect:—

1. That the son was entitled to repudiate, and has repudiated, the settlement.

2. That the moneys in respect of the said annuity which have been received by the son since the death of the father, and all subsequent moneys which would have been payable to him if he had not repudiated the settlement, and all other, if any, the interest to which, if he had not repudiated, he would have been entitled under the settlement, ought to be applied (subject to the following declaration No. 4) in making compensation to the persons disappointed by such repudiation for the benefits under the settlement of which they respectively have been or will be deprived by such repudiation, so far as the same shall extend, and until such compensation shall be fully made.

3. That in respect of the three instalments received by the son since the father's death, the plaintiffs, as trustees of the settlement, have the right to be repaid the same out of the share or interest of the son in his father's estate under the father's will and codicil, and that in priority to any claim thereto on the part of the son's incumbrancers or of his trustee, Laurence Hasluck, defendants to this action.

4. That the repudiation and acts of the son have caused a determination of his interest in the annuity as from the father's death.

As to the costs. The costs of the plaintiffs and of the defendants Lady Lucy Silber and the infant children must be taxed and raised and paid out of the funds subject to the trusts of the settlement. The defendant Amelia Silber will, of course, get her costs out of her late husband's estate, but I can make no order as to them in this action. The defendants Martin Albert Silber and Laurence Hasluck will bear their own costs, but this, of course, will not prejudice the defendant L. Hasluck's right to get his costs out of the funds, subject to the trusts of the scheme of arrangement. I make no order as to the costs of the other defendants, but, of course, such of them as have charges will be entitled to add their costs to their security.

There should be liberty to apply. The plaintiffs' junior counsel had better sign the minutes.

Neville, Q.C., pointed out that Mr. Silber had received other instalments since his father's death of the annuity than those actually mentioned in the pleading.

REG. v. GOVERNOR AND COMPANY OF THE BANK OF ENGLAND. (a.)

Bank of England—Unclaimed stock—List of holders—Right to inspection—Mandamus—National Debt Act, 1870 (33 & 34 Vict. c. 71), ss. 51, 52.

The National Debt Act, 1870 (ss. 51, 52), provides for the transfer of unclaimed stock to the National Debt Commissioners and for the entry of the names in which the stock stood immediately before the transfer, with other particulars, in a list to be kept by the Bank of England, "which list shall be open for inspection at the usual hours of transfer."

Held, that "open for inspection" meant "open for inspection by any person claiming an interest in the stock," and that a mandamus to the bank to permit inspection of the list ought not to go upon the application of a person who did not bonâ fide claim such an interest.

In this case a rule nisi had been obtained calling upon the Governor and Company of the Bank of England to show cause why a mandamus should not issue commanding them to permit the applicant, Gilbert Terrell, to inspect the list of holders of unclaimed stock kept by the bank in pursuance of section 52 of the National Debt Act, 1870.

The applicant, who traded as Adams & Co., published from time to time a book containing the names of persons who appeared to be entitled to unclaimed stock, with the object of obtaining fees from such persons for making inquiries on their behalf. For the purposes of this publication the applicant had requested the bank to allow him to inspect the list; he did not allege that he was himself entitled to any unclaimed stock, or was acting as agent for any person so entitled. The bank refused to allow him to inspect the list, and the applicant obtained this rule.

The National Debt Act, 1870, provides:—

Section 51. All stock, no dividend whereon is claimed for ten years before the last day on which a dividend thereon becomes payable (except where payment of dividend has been restrained by a court of equity), shall be transferred in the books of the Bank of England or of Ireland (as the case may be) to the National Debt Commissioners.

Section 52. Immediately after every such transfer the name in which the stock stood immediately before the transfer, the residence and description of the parties, the amount transferred, and the date of transfer shall be entered in a list to be kept for the purpose by the bank in whose books the stock stands, which list shall be open for inspection at the usual hours of transfer.

Sir R. E. Webster, A.G. (Greene, Q.C., and R. Bray with him) for the bank, showed cause against the rule.—A person who applies for inspection, relying upon a statutory right, must show a reasonable ground for his demand: The Queen v. London and St. Katherine Docks Co., 23 W. R. 136. [He was stopped by the court.]

A. B. P. Gaskell, for the applicant, in support of the rule.—This case is distinguishable, because here the list is "open for inspection," which means open for inspection by any member of the public. The statute is silent as to the bona fides of the applicant, and the bank has no right to ask for what purpose the inspection is required.

A. L. SMITH, J.—This is an application for a mandamus to compel the Bank of England to allow the applicant to inspect the list kept at the bank containing particulars as to stock the dividends upon which have not been claimed for ten years. The applicant bases his application on section 52 of the National Debt Act, 1870, and says that he is entitled to a prerogative writ of mandamus. It appears that the object of the publication for the purposes of which the inspection is required is to state the amount of stock due to persons who have not claimed, and to obtain fees for making searches and inquiries as to the persons entitled. There is no evidence before us that the applicant claims to have any personal interest in the dividends, but he says that section 52 gives him a right to this writ. [His lordship read sections 51 and 52.] The bank has complied with the requirements of the statute as to keeping the list. The question is, What do the words "open for inspection" mean? In my opinion they mean "open for inspection by any person who claims to be interested in the stock," and the applicant seems to me to be outside that meaning altogether. Down to the year 1843 it appears that a list of particulars of this unclaimed stock used to be published; it was found that that publication led to the making of false claims by fraudulent persons, and about that year it was stopped by an order of the Treasury. Since that date it has been the practice for the bank themselves to make inquiries as to the holders of the unclaimed stock, and to afford gratuitous assistance to persons applying to them in the belief that they are interested in such stock. Under the new practice it appears that there is less unclaimed dividend than was formerly the case. Now Mr. Terrell is not interested in any unclaimed stock either himself or on behalf of any other person. What, then, is the duty of the court? We have to use our discretion as to issuing this writ, and it may be refused, not only upon the merits, but for delay or other reasons personal to the applicant. On these grounds I think that we ought to refuse to issue the writ in this case, and the rule must, therefore, be discharged, with costs.

GRANTHAM, J.—I agree. The list which is published by the applicant eliminates anything which would enable the persons entitled to be identified. It is made for the benefit of the applicant in his business. The issue of this prerogative writ of mandamus is quite in the discretion of the court, and under these circumstances I think that we should do wrong in granting it.

Rule discharged.

Inland revenue—Income tax—Schedule E—Offices of master and mistress of national school—Money necessarily expended in performance of duties of office—Expense of keeping servant—Income Tax Act, 1853 (16 & 17 Vict. c. 34), s. 51.

The respondent and his wife were the master and mistress of a national school, and received a joint salary for their services. An assessment to the income tax was made upon the respondent under Schedule E. He claimed to deduct a sum in respect of expenses necessarily incurred by him in keeping a servant, in order that his wife might be able to perform her duties as schoolmistress.

Held, that such deduction could not be allowed.

Case stated by income tax commissioners under 43 & 44 Vict. c. 19, s. 59, on the application of a surveyor of taxes.

At a meeting of commissioners for the general purposes of the income tax for the division of Bath Forum, in the county of Somerset, the respondent, George Harding, appealed against an assessment to income tax under Schedule E. The assessment was made in respect of his office of national schoolmaster, and of the office of national schoolmistress held by his wife, for which they received a joint salary of £150 a year, and also of his office of choirmaster, for which he received £10 a year. From the total of £160 there was deducted £120, the statutory abatement on all incomes less than £400, and also £12, allowed for annual life insurance premium, leaving a balance of £28, on which duty was charged.

The respondent claimed a further deduction of £30, in respect of expenses necessarily incurred by him in keeping a servant, in order that his wife might be able to perform her duties as schoolmistress; and he further claimed total exemption from duty on the ground that the said expenses reduced his income from all sources below £150 per annum.

The commissioners allowed the claim, and discharged the assessment.

Sir Edward Clarke, S.G., and Danckwerts, for the surveyor of taxes, in support of the appeal.

Dicey, Q.C., and Henry Lynn, for the respondent.

POLLOCK, B.—It is clear to my mind that the salary of £150 paid to the respondent and his wife is a joint salary, and it would probably be impossible to do what Mr. Dicey suggests we might do—namely, discover how much is attributable to the services of the husband and how much to the services of the wife. It is also clear that it is a salary which is taxable under Schedule E, being derived from that which is a public office or employment within the meaning of section 51 of the Income Tax Act of 1853; for it is paid by persons whose position and duty to manage the school is recognized by Act of Parliament and Orders in Council, and it is paid out of sums of money principally contributed from the taxes. The other enactment to which we must refer is section 45 of the Income Tax Act of 1842: "The profits of any married woman living with her husband shall be deemed the profits of the husband, and the same shall be charged in the name of the husband, and not in her name, or of her trustee."

Now exemption is claimed under section 51 of the Act of 1853, by which it is provided that from the salary, fees, or emoluments of such office or employment certain expenses may be deducted, and the earlier part of the section gives a sort of analogy as to the class of expenditure which is intended to be included within the Act, that is, the expenses of travelling in the performance of the duties thereof, or of keeping or maintaining a horse to enable one to perform the same, or other money laid out and expended wholly, exclusively, and necessarily in the performance of the duties thereof. Can it be said that because the wife, who would otherwise possibly or probably be engaged in looking after the household affairs of her husband, is unable to look after those affairs by reason of her devoting her time to earning this salary in question, can it be said that because that state of things exists he or she is expending money wholly, exclusively, and necessarily in the performance of the duties of their office or employment? When we apply the spirit of the Act as well as the language of it, it seems to me that it would be wholly nullifying the intention of the Act if any such deduction were made. Whenever a man accepts an office there are certain detriments as well as profits, but the expenditure now in question is in no sense such an expenditure as the section allows to be deducted. It is merely that which is derogatory to their income, a disturbance of their income, a deprivation of a portion of their income in order that they may accept the office. If we were to go into these questions with great nicety, we should have to consider in each case the district in which the person lives, the price of meat, the clothing he requires, and the style in which he lives, before we could come to any conclusion. It seems to me unnecessary and foreign to the present question to go into any of these matters. It is enough to say that within the spirit and the language of the Act this is a deduction which cannot be made; and I have therefore come to the conclusion, though with some regret, that the decision of the commissioners was wrong, and that this is a taxable amount.

"THE KNUTSFORD." (a.)

Practice—Evidence—Admiralty action—Transcript of shorthand notes of evidence taken before examiner—Incorrect transcript—Application to take transcript off the file.

In an admiralty action the transcript of the shorthand notes of the evidence of witnesses directed to be examined before an examiner becomes, on being filed in the registry, evidence in the cause, and such transcript cannot be taken off the file without an order of the court.

Accordingly, in a case where the transcript of the shorthand notes of the evidence of a witness examined before an examiner was shown to be incorrect, the judge in court granted a motion ordering the transcript to be taken off the file and returned to the examiner for amendment.

This was a motion by the plaintiffs, the owners of The Drumhendry, in an action of damage instituted against the steamship Knutsford, that the judge might direct that the transcript of the evidence of Robert Williams, a witness on behalf of the defendants, examined before Mr. R. Stephens Jackson pursuant to the order of the court made therein, be taken off the file and returned to the said examiner for amendment so as to make it correspond to the evidence given by the said witness, and that the defendants should pay the costs of the application.

In support of the motion an affidavit of the examiner was read, in which he deposed that a shorthand writer was engaged to attend for the purpose of taking a shorthand note of the evidence of the witnesses to be examined before the examiner; that the shorthand writer, previously to the examination of the said witnesses, was duly sworn to faithfully and correctly take down and transcribe the evidence to be given by the said witnesses, and that the examination proceeded, and the several witnesses were examined and cross-examined by counsel for the plaintiffs; that after the examination was completed the transcript of the evidence, including the transcript purporting to be the evidence of the said Robert Williams, was furnished to the examiner, and that such transcript, without the examiner perusing the same, was filed in the registry of the court; that subsequently the attention of the examiner was called to the fact that the evidence of Robert Williams, as filed and printed, did not contain a certain statement which had been made by the said Robert Williams upon cross-examination, as to the time when he saw the lights of The Drumhendry, and also omitted a portion of the re-examination which bore upon the point; that the examiner, therefore, sent for the original notes of the evidence and for the shorthand writer, and in the presence of the solicitors for the plaintiffs and the defendants requested the shorthand writer to read to him the said notes, and that the examiner then found that the transcript of the notes which the shorthand writer had forwarded was both incorrect and incomplete, and that some of the words in the transcript did not correspond with those in the original notes, and that other questions and answers had been entirely omitted.

Another affidavit in support of the motion, made by the plaintiffs' solicitors stated that they were advised that the errors and omissions in the transcript of Williams' evidence had most material bearing on the plaintiffs' case, and that justice would not be done unless the examiner's return, together with the transcript, should be taken off the file and returned to him for amendment.

On behalf of the defendants an affidavit was filed alleging that the defendants had consented to the transcript being taken off the file provided that the costs involved should be costs in the cause.

Butler Aspinall, for the plaintiffs, in support of the motion.—The transcript which we seek to have taken off the file is admittedly incorrect, and if it remains on the file there is no way in which it can be corrected, as in admiralty actions evidence taken before an examiner when once filed, is evidence for all parties in the cause, the practice in this respect having, no doubt, originated at the time when all evidence in admiralty actions was on paper, and a special statutory provision was necessary to enable witnesses to be examined orally in such actions. [BUTT, P.—It has always been said that evidence taken before an examiner in an admiralty action and returned into the registry is admissible evidence without being put in by any of the parties to the action.] Yes; and the practice of returning the transcript of the shorthand notes of the evidence into the registry has always prevailed, and is still in force. [He referred to Williams & Bruce, p. 427.] In these circumstances the court, as it clearly appears that the transcript is not correct, ought to grant the motion as of course.

Raikes, for the defendants.—The defendants have always been ready and willing that any errors in the transcript should be corrected. They only object to have the corrections made either wholly or partly at their expense.

BUTT, P.—The motion will be granted in the terms of the notice of motion, except that all questions of costs will be reserved.*

In the Goods of BARKER. (a.)

Probate—Will—Property requiring protection—Sole executor abroad—General power of attorney by executor—Grant to attorneys.

The sole executor of a will was abroad, with the intention of not returning for two years, and three or four months must elapse before communications could be had with him. The court had made a grant ad colligenda to the widow of the testator, but this was found insufficient to protect the estate. The sole executor, before leaving England, had granted a general power of attorney to two persons, who applied for a grant of administration with the will annexed.

Held, that, on the general terms used in the power of attorney, the court was justified in making the grant.

Motion for a grant of administration with the will annexed of the estate of George Richard Barker, deceased, to the attorneys of Bazett Michael Haggard, the sole executor under the will.

The testator died on the 5th of January, 1891, leaving a will duly executed on the 22nd of July, 1889, whereby he appointed Mr. Haggard sole executor. Mr. Haggard was appointed Her Majesty's Commissioner for Samoa, and left England for that place in November, 1890.

Before leaving—viz., on the 4th of November, 1890—he executed a power of attorney to Messrs. Fenwick & Lofthouse, the applicants, which contained the following passages:—

"And I also authorize my said attorney or attorneys to appear for me in any court of justice, in any actions or other proceedings which may be instituted against me or whereunto I shall be a party, to defend the same or to suffer judgment to be had or given against me in any such action or other proceeding by default or otherwise as my said attorney or attorneys shall be advised or think proper"; "or generally to do, execute, and perform any other act, matter, or thing whatsoever which ought to be done, executed, or performed, or which, in the opinion of my said attorney or attorneys, ought to be done, executed, or performed, about my concerns, engagements, or business of every nature and kind whatsoever as fully and effectually and to all intents and purposes as I myself could do if I were present."

The estate of the testator consisted of articles requiring protection. A grant ad colligenda with liberty to pay debts and testamentary expenses had been made to Mrs. Barker, the widow and residuary legatee, but this was found insufficient for the proper protection of the estate. Mr. Haggard was expected to be absent for two years, and three or four months must elapse before any communication could be had with him. The present application had been refused in the registry.

Licensing Acts — Renewal — Discretion of justices — Licensing Act, 1828 (9 Geo. 4, c. 61), s. 1—Licensing Act, 1872 (35 & 36 Vict. c. 94), s. 42—Licensing Act, 1874 (37 & 38 Vict. c. 49), s. 26.

Licensing justices have an absolute judicial discretion to grant or refuse an application for the renewal of a licence under the Licensing Acts, 1828, 1872, and 1874.

This was an appeal from a decision of the Court of Appeal (Lord Esher, M.R., and Fry and Lopes, L.JJ.) (reported 37 W. R. 187, 22 Q. B. D. 239), affirming that of the Divisional Court (Field and Wills, JJ.) (reported 36 W. R. 634, 21 Q. B. D. 66).

In September, 1887, William Ridding duly applied to the licensing justices for a grant by way of renewal of a licence for the sale by him of all intoxicating liquors at the Low Bridge Inn at Kentmere, in the county of Westmoreland. The application was refused, on the grounds of the remoteness from police supervision and the character and necessities of the locality; and Susannah Sharpe, the owner of the inn and a person aggrieved by such refusal, appealed to the court of quarter sessions, who, after hearing evidence, upheld the order of the justices, and dismissed the appeal.

The Divisional Court, on a special case stated, held that the justices had an absolute judicial discretion to grant or to refuse the application, and this was affirmed by the Court of Appeal.

The owner appealed.

(a.) Reported by CHARLES H. GRAFTON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

March 20.—Lord HALSBURY, L.C.—I do not think that at any period of the argument any of your lordships doubted but that this judgment must be affirmed. By the express language of the statute which is still the governing statute the grant of a licence is expressly within the discretion of the magistrates. For reasons to be stated presently, I am of opinion that no legislation has ever altered that provision; but if one were to argue a priori, what possible reason could there be for limiting the discretion of the justices to the first grant of the licence?

It is not denied that for the purpose of the original grant it is within the power and even the duty of the magistrates to consider the wants of the neighbourhood with reference both to its population, means of inspection by the proper authorities, and so forth. If this is the original jurisdiction, what sense or reason could there be in making these topics irrelevant in any future grant? It surely must have been in the contemplation of the Legislature that the circumstances of a neighbourhood might change; a population might diminish or increase. Would it be argued that, if the population had very much increased at some point where by reason of its previous want of population no such public accommodation had been hitherto granted, no licence should be granted because this additional grant might to some extent interfere with the practical monopoly enjoyed by the persons already licensed? This, of course, could not be argued, since it is the well-understood practice to do this very thing. But can anything be more unreasonable than the suggestion that the Legislature had given the discretion in one direction and withheld it in the other? In real truth a great deal of the argument on the part of the appellant has been addressed to us not upon the true construction of the Act of 1828 or the statutes which have followed it, but to some supposed injustice, which the argument assumed would be so great, if the matter were left to the discretion of the justices, that the Legislature never could have intended to intrust them with discretion so wide. I do not think, even if the injustice were so great as it is suggested by the argument, that that consideration could prevail over the plain language of the Legislature. But I am not able to assent to the motion that the injustice is so great. An extensive power is confided to the justices in their capacity as justices to be exercised judicially, and discretion means, when it is said that something is to be done within the discretion of the authorities, that that something is to be done according to the rules of reason and justice, not to private opinion: Rooke's case, 5 Rep. 100a; according to law, and not humour. It is to be not arbitrary, vague, and fanciful, but legal and regular, and it must be exercised within the limit to which an honest man competent to the discharge of his office ought to confine himself: Wilson v. Rastall, 4 T. R., at p. 757. So in Reg. v. Boteler, 12 W. R. 466, where justices thought proper not to enforce the law because they considered that the act in question was unjust in principle, the Court of Queen's Bench compelled them by a peremptory order to do the act which nevertheless the statute had said was in their discretion to do or to leave undone. So, again, where overseers who were required by 3 & 4 Vict. c. 61 to certify whether applicants for beer licences were real residents and ratepayers of the parish, it was held that they were not entitled to refuse the certificate on the ground that in their opinion there were already too many public-houses, or that the beershop was not required: Reg. v. Withyham Overseers, 2 C. L. Rep. 1657. So a discretion which empowered justices to grant licences to innkeepers, as in the exercise of their discretion they deemed proper, would not be exercised by coming to a general resolution to refuse a licence to anybody who would not consent to take out an excise licence for the sale of spirits: Reg. v. Sylvester, 2 B. & S. 322, 10 W. R. C. L. Dig. 2. Again, where justices were authorized to alter the hours for the sale of intoxicating liquors in any particular district, it was held that, though this was a general discretion given to them, they had no right by virtue of a general resolution to alter the time in every case. They were required judicially to determine, although according to their discretion, what places in the honest exercise of their judgment required other hours for opening and closing than those specified. The question arose in the case to which I am referring (Macbeth v. Ashley, L. R. 2 Scotch App. 352, 22 W. R. Dig. 38), on the proviso to section 2 of the 16 & 17 Vict. c. 67, which was in these words:—"Provided always that in any particular locality within any county or district or burgh requiring other hours for opening and closing inns and hotels and public-houses than those specified in the forms of certificates in said schedule applicable thereto, it shall be lawful for such justices or magistrates respectively to insert in such certificates such other hours not being earlier than 6 o'clock or later than 8 o'clock in the morning for opening, or earlier than 9 o'clock or later than 11 o'clock in the evening for closing the same as they shall think fit." Eleven o'clock at night was accordingly the hour appointed for closing public-houses in Scotland, and the magistrates of Rothesay issued an order closing them at 10 o'clock instead of 11. Lord Selborne, in giving judgment in the House of Lords in that case, makes these observations:—"Without meaning to deny that it is confided to the discretion of the magistrates to determine what particular localities require other hours for opening and closing than those specified, it is obvious that such discretion as they have is not an arbitrary discretion to define any localities they please, but they must be such localities as they consider in the honest and bonâ fide exercise of their own judgment to require a difference to be made. The participle 'requiring' is connected with the substantive 'locality,' and therefore it must be a requirement arising out of the particular circumstances of the place. The magistrates must, in the exercise of an honest and bonâ fide judgment, be of opinion that the 'particular locality' which they except from the ordinary rule is one which, from its own special circumstances, requires that difference to be made."

I do not feel, therefore, though the language of the statute and the power given by that language is so great and so unqualified that the mischief or danger apprehended by the appellants is at all likely to arise. The Legislature has given credit to the magistrates for exercising a judicial discretion, that they will fairly decide the questions submitted to them, and not by evasion attempt to repeal the law which permits public-houses to exist, or evade it by avoiding a plain exposition of the reasons on which they act. I am very far indeed from saying that, assuming the complete discretion that I have indicated to exist, it would be likely that the persons exercising it would consider an original application in the same way as one which was applied for by the person who has already been licensed for one year. Of course, the justices would remember that a year before, a licence had been granted, and, presumably, unless some change during the year was proved, they start with the fact that the topics to which I have referred have already been considered, and one would not expect that those topics would be likely to be reopened unless, as I say, some change has been proved. This would be likely to limit the inquiry to the conduct of the house and the character of the licensee, and perhaps the condition of the house, but as matter of fact, and not as matter of law at all.

As to the question of law arising upon the language of all the statutes, it may, in my judgment, be very shortly disposed of. The first statute to which one need go back, it is admitted gives discretion. Does any Act passed since purport to withdraw it? Certainly not. On the contrary, the Acts referred to expressly retain it, subject to certain provisions which it cannot be pretended affect to exclude the topics, which it is argued are topics irrelevant to a renewal. Now I do not mean to say that a repeal or qualification may not sometimes be implied by subsequent statutes enacting something inconsistent with a previous Act, but in a matter so constantly before the Legislature as the licensing laws, I cannot but think that if it was intended to alter the law in this respect it would have been done in plain and unambiguous language. Now the Acts of 1872 and 1874, which are the Acts upon which reliance is placed, do not profess to limit the discretion, but enact certain new procedure, all of which procedure is perfectly consistent with the preservation intact of the discretion given to the magistrates. I do not think that it is necessary to go into details as to the alteration of procedure—it is merely procedure. It leaves the earlier Act absolutely untouched upon the subject now in debate, and I entirely approve of and adopt the decision of Cockburn, C.J., and Mellor, J., arrived at thirteen years ago (Reg. v. Smith, 48 L. J. M. C. 38, 27 W. R. Dig. 116).

I therefore think that this appeal ought to be dismissed, with costs.

Lord BRAMWELL.—I think this a very plain case, and that the judgment should be affirmed. Houses of public entertainment and the sale of drink have been in this country and in many others the subject of regulation for police purposes; not for what one may call economic purposes, like the fixing of the price of bread, or the wages of labour, but for the maintenance of order. And naturally the buildings themselves, their character, their number, and their neighbourhood have been considered as well as the persons who should be permitted to carry on the trade or business. That certainly has been the case in England; and it is undoubtedly so now, with respect to licences granted to sell drink on premises for the first time. This is so clear that the learned counsel for the appellants have not contended to the contrary. If an application is made for a licence to sell drink on premises not before licensed it is certain that the magistrates may refuse it, and may refuse for the reason and no other than that they think the neighbourhood does not need it; that none is needed, or none in addition to the houses already licensed. But it is said that this power or right in the magistrates does not exist where a licence has been granted, and the question is whether it should be renewed. I am not sure that this contention might not be met by this: the magistrates have a discretion to refuse, they are not bound to state their reason, and, therefore, their decision cannot be questioned. But I think it better to say that, in my judgment, if they had to state their reasons it would be a good one in point of law that they refused to renew on the ground of "the remoteness from police supervision and the character and necessities of the locality and neighbourhood in which the inn is situate." Of course, the finding of the facts by the sessions is conclusive.

Two objections are raised by the appellants. One is, that though by the Act 9 Geo. 4, c. 61, the above might be a good ground for a refusal of a licence applied for for the first time, it is not for a refusal of its renewal. Why I know not. I quite agree that different considerations should operate on the minds of the justices, and I doubt not, do. The hardship of stopping the trade of a man who is getting an honest living in a lawful trade and has done so perhaps for years, with probably an expense at the outset, may well be taken into consideration; but it must be done so in conjunction with considerations the other way, and must be left to the discretion of the justices. The licence is a renewal. That word has been criticized. It may be misleading, but is, I think, correct. It is a "renewal"—i.e., a new licence, as we talk of a new lease being a renewal, though parties and terms may be wholly different. And one cannot help seeing this, that if the discretion was to be limited, as contended, in the case of a renewal, the Legislature might have said so in terms, and has not. Whenever that is the case it seems to me that courts ought not to put a limit on general words without almost a necessity for doing so. The other objection is that subsequent legislation has shown that Parliament intended there should be a difference between the treatment of original applications for a licence and applications for renewals, and has shown that it intended the licence should be renewed except for objection to the licensee, at all events, that its renewal should not be refused for such a reason as is given in this case, and so the power to refuse on that ground has been taken away by the Legislature. I cannot find this. I do find, indeed, that the Legislature, in its subsequent Acts, contemplated that, as a rule, as a practice, licences would be renewed. But there is nothing to show that the discretion to refuse is taken away. The word "personal," so much relied on, means "individual," as distinguished from the class to which he belongs. And I must repeat my remark that it could have been so enacted, and there is nothing to justify implying such a repeal. Indeed, I think this argument presents a consideration unfavourable to the appellants. The Legislature has most clearly shown that it supposed, contemplated, that licences would usually be renewed; that the taking away of a man's livelihood would not be practised cruelly or wantonly. True, and because it showed that plainly it may have felt it safe to leave an absolute discretion with the justices, a discretion that would be discreetly exercised. And it has been. I do not say in this case, I know nothing about it, I mean by justices generally. That is shown by what was mentioned by Mr. Poland—namely, that at the sessions when there is an appeal against a refusal of a first licence the appellant begins; the burden of proof is on him, he has to make out that he ought to have a licence. Where, on the other hand, the appeal is against a refusal to renew a licence the respondents begin; the burden of proof is on them, they have to make out that the applicant ought not to have a licence; practically, that his licence should be taken from him. This, Mr. Poland says, is the practice throughout England. One may well suppose this to be known to the Legislature, and to be one cause why the justices are trusted with such extensive power. For these reasons I think the appeal should be dismissed, thinking, indeed, that the Legislature contemplated that ordinarily licences would be renewed, and have most strongly shown that, but thinking also that that does not help the appellants to show, and that they have not shown, that a renewal may not be refused for the reason given in his case.

Lord HERSCHELL.—The sole question for decision in this case is whether, where a licence is applied for by way of renewal, by one who already holds a licence for the sale of intoxicating liquors, the licensing authorities are entitled to take into consideration the wants of the neighbourhood and the remoteness of the premises from police supervision, or whether their inquiry must be limited to the character and conduct of the applicant, and they can only refuse the applicant on the ground of his personal unfitness. It was admitted by the learned counsel for the appellants that there was authority for the proposition that a complete discretion had been vested in the justices to grant or withhold any application for a new licence, though they somewhat faintly contended that upon the true construction of the 1st section of the 9 Geo. 4, c. 61 this discretion was confined to the question whether the applicant was a fit and proper person to hold the licence, and whether the premises in respect of which he made the application were suitable for the purpose. It is to my mind abundantly clear that this is not a correct view of the statute. Giving to the language used its natural interpretation, I think it impossible to do otherwise than hold that the discretion of the justices is not in any way fettered. When once this conclusion is arrived at, it seems to me to follow that the justices had under the statute of Geo. 4 the same discretion when the holder of a licence applied for another licence for the ensuing year. It is by virtue of the very same enactment that the justices are empowered to grant such a licence. The statute makes no distinction between this case and the original application. The word "renewal" is never mentioned, and it is expressly provided that every licence granted under the authority of the Act shall last for one year "and no longer."

But it was argued that the law had been modified by subsequent legislation, and this was the point mainly insisted upon on behalf of the appellant. The Licensing Act of 1872 has, it is true, by section 42, altered in some respects the procedure provided in relation to applications for licences by the statute of Geo. 4. But the alterations have reference to matters of procedure only. Under the earlier Act the applicant for a licence was required to attend in person unless hindered by sickness, infirmity, or other reasonable cause. The Act of 1872 provided that in case of an application for the renewal of a licence the applicant need not attend in person at the annual licensing meeting, unless required by the justices so to attend. It also contained enactments securing to the applicant for a renewal of his licence notice that objection was taken to such renewal, and prescribed that no evidence with respect thereto should by received by the justices that was not given on oath. These provisions would obviously have left the discretion of the justices just what it had been before, even if the statute had not gone on, as it does, to provide that subject thereto licences should be renewed, and the powers and discretion of justices relative to such renewal should be exercised as theretofore. But it was said that the amendment of section 42 of the Licensing Act. 1872, enacted in section 26 of the Licensing Act, 1874, had the effect of limiting the power of the justices and prohibiting them from refusing to grant a renewal of a licence save from some cause personal to the applicant. The enactment in question certainly does not in terms contain any such provision, and I do not think it is possible to infer from the language used that the Legislature intended thus to alter the law. The section, after reciting that it was enacted by section 42 of the Act of 1872 that an applicant for the renewal of his licence need not attend in person at the annual licensing meeting, unless required by the licensing justices so to attend, enacts "that such requisition shall not be made save for some special cause personal to the licensed person to whom such requisition is sent." I think the object of this provision is obvious. Under the earlier Act the justices at any sessions might (or at the very least it was open to contention that they might) have required all applicants for a renewal to attend as before. The later Act prescribes that no such requisition is to be made except for some special cause personal to the recipient of the requisition. The cause, it will be observed, is to be a cause for requiring the individual to be present, and the fact that objection was taken to the renewal of his licence would be such a cause. The language of the statute has no reference to the causes which, when the applicant attends in pursuance to the requisition, may operate in the minds of the justices to determine whether his application shall be acceded to or not. For these reasons I think that the judgment of the court below was correct, and ought to be affirmed. There is one observation made by my noble and learned friend the Lord Chancellor to which I am not prepared to give my assent without qualification. I do not think that the fact that a licence had been granted for the previous year would be a sufficient ground for the justices presuming that the licensed house was then needed, and considering only whether the circumstances had changed in the interval. It might well be that the attention of the licensing justices had not on a former occasion been called to the condition and wants of the neighbourhood.

Lord MACNAGHTEN.—For the reasons which have been stated by my noble and learned friends, and which it is unnecessary for me to repeat, I also am of opinion that it is clear beyond the possibility of doubt or question that the Act of 1828 conferred upon the licensing justices the same discretion in the case of an application for what is now termed a renewal as in the case of a person applying for a licence for the first time, and that, although there has been an alteration in the procedure in favour of applicants for renewed licences, there is nothing in the subsequent legislation to do away with, or impair, or fetter that discretion.

Lord HANNEN.—I do not consider it necessary to occupy your lordships' time with observations on the Act 9 Geo. 4, c. 61. It was long ago decided, I think rightly decided, that the justices were under that Act entitled and bound to consider the needs of the neighbourhood on an application for a licence to a person seeking to keep a house for the sale of exciseable liquors (Reg. v. Lancashire Justices, 19 W. R. 204, L. R. 6 Q. B. 97), and that their discretion is equally wide in the case of a person already keeping such a house as in one where the application is by a person not before licensed: Reg. v. Smith. But it was contended that the general discretion given by the Act of Geo. 4 was restricted by the Act of 1872 (35 & 36 Vict. c. 94), and by the Act of 1874 (37 & 38 Vict. c. 49). By the first of these Acts the renewal of licences is dealt with, and by the 42nd section certain changes are made in the procedure where a renewal is asked for: (1) The applicant need not attend in person unless required by the justices to do so; (2) no objection to the renewal is to be entertained unless written notice of the intention to oppose, stating the general grounds of the opposition, has been served seven days before the meeting; and (3) evidence with respect to the renewal shall be given on oath. But the section concludes: "Subject, as aforesaid, licences shall be renewed, and the power and discretion of justices relative to such renewal shall be exercised as heretofore." This, therefore, clearly leaves the discretion of the justices unfettered where the provisions of the 42nd section have been complied with. The argument for the appellant was chiefly based on the qualification of the above-mentioned 42nd section of the Act of 1872, added by the first clause of the 26th section of the Licensing Act of 1874 (37 & 38 Vict. c. 49). That clause is as follows:—"Whereas by section 42 of the principal Act, it is enacted that a licensed person applying for the renewal of his licence need not attend in person at the general licensing meeting, unless he is required by the licensing justices so to attend: Be it enacted that such requisition shall not be made save for some special cause personal to the licensed person to whom such requisition is sent."

Rightly to understand this enactment it is necessary to revert to the earlier legislation on the subject of the personal attendance of applicants for licences. By the 12th section of the Act 9 Geo. 4 only those applicants were excused from personal attendance who could prove by sworn testimony that they were hindered by sickness or infirmity or by any other reasonable cause, in which case an authorized person might attend for them. The 42nd section of the Act of 1872 excused the applicant for a renewal of his licence from attendance unless required by the justices. This left it in the power of the justices to require the attendance of all applicants for renewed licences. This power might be exercised so as to cause inconvenience to applicants required to attend on grounds not having reference to their particular case. Instances have been brought before the superior courts where justices have expressed and acted upon a general intention with regard to all licences, whereas it is their duty to consider each individual case on its own special merits. The object of the 26th section of the Act of 1874 appears to be to enforce this duty, and to require the justices to particularize the special ground on which they considered the personal attendance of the applicant necessary. The word "personal" is fully satisfied by construing it as meaning "for a cause in which the applicant is personally interested, and not merely interested as one of the general body of licensed persons." For these reasons it appears to me that the judgment appealed from is correct and should be affirmed.

Appeal from the judgment of the Queen's Bench ivision, [1891] 1 Q. B. 383, upon a case stated by the ncome Tax Commissioners for the City of London nder 43 & 44 Vict. c. 19, s. 59, in an appeal against a assessment of £4,341 13s. 4d. made upon the ppellants under schedule D. of 16 & 17 Vict. c. 34 r the year ending April 5, 1889.

The appellants were a banking company registered nder the Joint-Stock Companies Acts having their gistered and head office in London, where the irectors and shareholders met, and from which the ffairs of the company were directed and managed. he company had branches in Mexico, and the details f the management of the branches were conducted y managers on the spot, general directions and nstructions for management being issued from the ead office. The seat of power was in London with he directors. The company carried on banking usiness in London (other than current banking ccounts), and transacted in London the London usiness of their branches. At their branches they arried on all usual banking business. By a law of he Republic of Mexico passed in 1884 the right of anks to issue notes was limited to such banks as had btained, or within a limited time should obtain, the uthorization of the Federal Executive. At the time of the passing of this law the company had not obtained, nor did they within the time limited obtain, that authorization. For the purpose of continuing the issue of notes the company on September 10, 1886, entered into an arrangement with "The Banco de Empleados," which held a concession to issue notes in Mexico, to transfer the concession to the company in consideration of the sum of £20,000, part of the consideration being the extinction of a debt due by the Mexican bank to the company, and the remainder being paid in cash. The amount of cash actually remitted to and received by the company in England was reduced by the deduction of the whole sum paid in Mexico to the Mexican bank. Such cash as was paid was paid out of the assets of the company in Mexico. From time to time an adjustment of balances was made between the head office and the branches, and the dividends were paid in London.

The company contended that in estimating the balance of profits and gains for the purpose of assessment to the income tax only the actual sums received as profits in Great Britain ought to be taken into computation. The Queen's Bench Division overruled this contention, and gave judgment for the respondent.

The company appealed.

Gainsford Bruce, Q.C., and Tindal Atkinson, for the appellants, contended that the profits made abroad were not assessable to the income tax until they were received in this country, and that the decision in Colquhoun v. Brooks, 38 W. R. 289, 14 App. Cas. 493, was applicable.

They also referred to Sulley v. Attorney-General, 8 W. R. 472, 5 H. & N. 711, and Cesena Sulphur Co. v. Nicholson, 25 W. R. 71, 1 Ex. D. 428.

Lumley Smith, Q.C., and Danckwerts, for the respondent, were not called upon.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—This case seems to me to come within the principle of the decision in Colquhoun v. Brooks. The ground of that decision was that a person, who carries on a business solely abroad, is not liable to pay income tax in England upon the profits of that business unless the profits are received in England. If a person carries on one business in England, and another distinct business abroad, the two businesses must be looked at as separate businesses, and the person can only be assessed upon the profits of the business carried on abroad which he receives in this country. In the present case the appellants do not carry on two distinct businesses, one in this country and another in Mexico. They carry on one business, and that business is carried on in England. No doubt a portion of the profits of that business is earned in Mexico by transactions carried out there. But those transactions are carried out under the direction of the directors in England. The profits of the business are arrived at by bringing into the account the profits of the transactions abroad and in England, setting against them the expenses abroad and in England, and determining in England the difference between those two sums. There is, therefore, no business carried on solely abroad. The business seems to me to be one business carried on in England, and there is no rule that in such a case the profits must be received here before the appellants can be assessed in respect of them. The judgment of the Divisional Court must, therefore, be affirmed.

LOPES, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. There are not two distinct businesses, one carried on in this country and the other carried on abroad. There is only one business carried on partly in this country and partly abroad. The case is, therefore, distinguishable from Colquhoun v. Brooks.

KAY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. In Colquhoun v. Brooks there was a business carried on entirely abroad. That decision does not apply where the business is carried on in England, though some part of it is conducted by means of transactions abroad.

Appeal dismissed.

A testator devised his business to his executors and trustees, upon trust to carry on the business in conjunction with a son of the testator, and directed that each of the executors and trustees whilst carrying on the business, and that the son whilst managing the business in conjunction with them, should receive specified annual sums out of the profits of the business.

Held, that these annual sums were legacies, and liable to legacy duty.

Decision of North, J. (ante, p. 233), affirmed.

Appeal from the decision of North, J., reported ante, p. 233.

(a.) Reported by M. J. BLAKE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Joseph Thorley by his will, made in 1873, devised to three persons (substituting three others by a codicil), whom he also appointed his executors, his business, on trust to "carry on the business in conjunction with" the testator's son, W. R. Thorley; and the testator declared "that whilst the said trustees or trustee shall be carrying on the said business, each of them the said trustees or trustee shall receive the annual sum of £250 out of the profits thereof; and that if in any one year the profits of the said business shall be twenty-five per cent. over the profits for the year ending the 30th of June next before my decease, then in every such year each such trustee or he the sole trustee for the time being shall receive the sum of £500 in lieu of the said sum of £250"; the will then contained a direction that if only two-thirds or only one-third of the business should, under the provisions in that behalf contained, be carried on by the trustees, then that the annual sums of £250 or £500, as the case might be, should be proportionately reduced; the testator further declared "that whilst my son W. R. Thorley shall be managing my said business in conjunction with the said trustees or trustee, he the said W. R. Thorley, shall be entitled to the said annual sum of £250 more, as also to £500 in the event of such increase of profit as is hereinbefore mentioned in that behalf."

Joseph Thorley died in 1876, and the three persons named as his trustees carried on the business, and the son, W. R. Thorley, managed the business in conjunction with the trustees until his death, which occurred in September, 1882. The three trustees of Joseph Thorley's will and W. R. Thorley until his death received the remuneration of £250 a year in accordance with the terms of the will.

The questions raised by the appeal were whether these sums received by the trustees of Joseph Thorley's will, and also by the son, W. R. Thorley, were or were not subject to payment of legacy duty.

Actions for administration of the estates of both Joseph Thorley and W. R. Thorley had been instituted.

To determine the questions of legacy duty a petition had been presented in both actions by the trustees of Joseph Thorley's will, and by the trustees and executors of W. R. Thorley's will. The Commissioners of Inland Revenue were made respondents. North, J., held that legacy duty was payable on the sums so received by the trustees of Joseph Thorley's will, and by W. R. Thorley.

The petitioners appealed.

Napier Higgins, Q.C., and Charles Macnaghten, for the appellants.—These annual sums paid to the trustees and to W. R. Thorley are not gifts, but merely remuneration to secure their services in the business, and they are payable, not out of the testator's estate, but out of the profits of the business, which would depend on the enterprize and exertions of the trustees and the son; such remuneration is not a legacy: Hanson, 3rd ed., p. 63; Willis v. Kibble, 1 Beav. 559. In re Pooley, 37 W. R. 17, 40 Ch. D. 1, turned on the construction of section 15 of the Wills Act (1 Vict. c. 26). But, at all events, the recipients of these sums are not liable to pay duty on the full amount of the annual sums received, but only on the difference between the value of the services rendered by them and the value the testator put on those services: Attorney-General v. Hennniker, 7 Ex. 331; Sweeting v. Sweeting, 1 W. R. 121, 1 Drew. 331.

They also referred to Williamson v. Naylor, 3 Y. & Col. 208; Attorney-General v. Cavendish, Wightwick, 82; 8 & 9 Vict. c. 76, s. 4; 36 Geo. 3, c. 52, ss. 6, 8, 9, 22.

Vaughan Hawkins, for the respondents, was not called on.

LINDLEY, L.J.—[His lordship read the clauses above set out in the will of Joseph Thorley, and continued:—] The only question raised is whether these sums of £250 can be properly regarded as subject to legacy duty. That depends, of course, on the construction of the Acts of Parliament which imposed legacy duty. Mr. Higgins and Mr. Macnaghten are quite right in saying that those Acts, like all other taxing Acts, are to be read strictly—that is to say, they are not to be extended so as to have the effect of imposing on the subject, a tax which Parliament has not clearly made him pay. That principle is perfectly familiar to us. The Acts in question are 55 Geo. 3, c. 184, to which I need not particularly refer, and 8 & 9 Vict. c. 76. Section 4 of the latter statute is that which applies to this case. It recites as follows: "Whereas under or by virtue of the said several recited Acts certain duties have been granted and are now payable . . . upon legacies, and doubts have been entertained whether certain gifts by will or testamentary instrument are legacies liable to the said duties, and it is expedient to remove such doubts." That shows, therefore, that there had been some construction put upon the previous Acts which did not give the term "legacy" so extensive a signification as Parliament thought it ought to have. Accordingly, this section extended the signification. It says: "Be it enacted, that from and after the passing of this Act every gift by any will or testamentary instrument of any person, which by virtue of any such will or testamentary instrument is or shall be payable, or shall have effect or be satisfied out of the personal or movable estate or effects of such person, or out of any personal or movable estate or effects which such person hath had or shall have had power to dispose of." Then it goes on further to enact that those gifts shall be legacies.

Those are very general terms, and the question we have to consider under that section is whether this provision, as I will call it, for the sake of using a neutral term, is or is not a "gift"; secondly, whether it is a gift by a will or testamentary instrument; and, thirdly, whether it is payable or has effect or is satisfied out of the personal estate of the testator.

Now, is it a "gift"? Let us take the case of the trustees first. The trustees and the executors, apart from the will, could not charge for their trouble in carrying on the business of the testator. It would be competent to them, if they did not like to carry on that business, to have nothing to do with it. They need not take office unless they like. But no implied right of remuneration would arise from the mere fact that they executed the trusts which they elected to perform. Nor could they, in point of law, frame a declaration based on any implied contract of payment, for the simple reason that they are the paymasters and payees; they are the persons to employ themselves: and they cannot get an implied obligation to pay, out of such a state of things. Therefore, if they are to obtain this £250 a year at all they must do so under the will. They cannot get it in any other way. Then is that, or is not that, a "gift" by the will within the meaning of this section? I cannot say that it is not. Of course, the argument is put in this way. It is said that there is a consideration for the money; that they are to give their services, their time, and their attention. That is perfectly true. But does that alter the question? If they could charge the estate of the testator for their services apart from the will it would alter the question very materially, but they cannot. They cannot get a shilling out of the estate, either at law or in equity for their services, except under the will. That appears to me to bring this case so far, within the section. Nor do I think that we could possibly hold the contrary, without running counter to the reasoning of the court in the case of In re Pooley. It is very true that that case did not raise the question of legacy duty. But the decision in that case proceeded upon the principle which I have been endeavouring to explain. There a solicitor who was entitled to charge profit costs under a will, claimed a benefit under the will, and, therefore, was an interested witness, and, having attested the will, could not claim the benefit that the will gave him, which was simply remuneration for his services. I cannot see on principle any distinction between that case and the present.

With reference to the other cases which have been cited I will not say anything. I do not think that they are close enough to require any comment.

Upon the first part of this analysis of the section I am unable to differ from North, J., in holding that this is a gift by will. It is either that or nothing. If the trustees and the son take it at all, they take under the will. It is a gift on condition, it is true, that they attend to this business and make a profit out of it, because it is a gift to them out of the profits. It is not an absolute gift, still it is a gift on condition, which is just as much a taxable legacy as a legacy to an executor for his trouble in winding up the estate. That has always been taxed, and must be taxed, unless we are to depart from the language of the section which imposes the duty.

Now I pass on and consider the second point, whether this provision of £250 a year is payable, or has effect, or is satisfied out of the personal or movable estate or effects of the testator. The difficulty in answering that question is this: If it is not payable out of his estate, out of whose estate is it payable? It is payable out of somebody's. It is obvious that this is property which the testator had power to dispose of. It is quite true it would not exist if the business were not carried on profitably, more or less through the exertions of those who carry it on. But to say it is not payable out of the testator's personal estate or out of his effects, or is not to be satisfied out of his personal estate, appears to me to involve the proposition that the business, with the profits thereof, were not the testator's to dispose of. Therefore, when we come to consider it, it appears to me that the only answer to the question is, that these are legacies taxable under the statute to which I have referred. That was the view taken by North, J., and it appears to me to be right. The appeal must, therefore, be dismissed, with costs.

BOWEN, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The first question is, whether this annuity is a "gift" of £250 a year, and I will take that question first. Well, if it is gratuitous, it is a "gift." If you part with a thing for valuable consideration it is not a "gift." Do the trustees, therefore, take the annuity as a gratuity from the testator or not? Mr. Higgins and Mr. Macnaghten say that it is not a gift of, let us say, £250 a year; it is a gift of some right under the will which may be capable of valuation, but it is not a gift of the annuity. Let us see, analyzing that proposition, whether it will stand.

What is the right which it is suggested is given? It is a right to claim money if some services are rendered. The money is to come out of the testator's estate, that is certain; but, it is said, only if the trustees render services. That expression is ambiguous. If they render services to whom? They can no longer render them to the testator. They render them to the estate or to those who represent the estate. That is to say, according to the argument, it is a gift of a right to money out of the estate if the trustees render services to the estate, services for which they could not charge except by the will. Now, is not that, when you analyze it and write it out at length, exactly equivalent to a right to the money out of the estate upon a condition that the legatees do something for the executors? That is what it is. It is not a gift for a valuable consideration; it is a gift upon a condition. Now a legacy is not the less a legacy because it is given on a condition. That is clearly established. The truth is, that this is a conditional gift of the money out of the testator's estate from the profits which the testator's estate will give the legatees. But the right to receive it depends on the fulfilment of two conditions subsequent—namely, that the estate shall bear the fruit which is necessary to satisfy the annuity, and that the services shall be rendered.

Well it is said that that is a condition which deprives the gift of the character of bounty and makes it not a gift, or, as Mr. Higgins put it clearly, that the payment will not come entirely out of the estate, but that the estate of the testator is swollen by the enterprize and services which are rendered. But it is not the less a gift because there is a condition. That is established law, and the truth is that the persons who are the legatees have a right to elect whether they will take the gift on the condition or not. If they think it will not pay them to take it, they need not take it. But if they take it, it follows that they take it as being the bounty of the testator, and therefore subject to legacy duty.

With regard to the son it is really the same thing over again. He claims under the will. He does not claim under any contract. The same argument and the same reasoning apply.

I ought to say that, with regard to In re Pooley, the view of Cotton, L.J., and the view of Lindley, L.J., in that case seem to me to be at variance with the argument addressed to us on behalf of the appellants here, and by that case I think we are morally, so to speak, bound.

KAY, L.J.—I agree with the other Lords Justices. It seems to me that the two questions in this case involve the same point, and I will take the second first. It is said that this annuity was not given out of the estate of the testator. There is a very simple mode of trying that. Suppose the testator had left the business to his trustees on trust to pay the profits to A. for his life, and afterwards to hand over the whole business to B., there can be no question whatever but that he could have made a gift of that kind. Therefore he had power to deal with the subsequent profits of his business for the benefit of a tenant for life. If so, he could give the subsequent profits of his business. If he could give the subsequent profits of his business, it follows as a matter of course that he could give an annuity out of the subsequent profits of his business. Therefore the subsequent profits of his business, out of which this annuity was to come, were, beyond all question, his personal estate, which he could deal with. They were, in truth, the fruit of the business which belonged to him. One might put many illustrations of the kind. Suppose this testator had been the possessor of a large orchard of trees, and that he had given all the fruit of those trees for ten years after his death to A. He could have done that. The fruit would not have been in existence during his lifetime, but, nevertheless, he would have had power to dispose of it. In that sense it would have been his, because it would have been the fruit of his estate, of which, at the time of his death, he could dispose of, giving a limited interest in it.

I think, therefore, this question is almost too clear for argument if you come to consider it. If the testator could give the profits of his business after his death, then the annuity out of the profits of that business was part of his estate which he could have disposed of.

That does not, of course, entirely solve the first question. I will take the case of the son, who is not one of the executors and trustees, but to whom, if the son chose to carry on the business in conjunction with the testator's executors and trustees, the testator gave out of the profits of that business a certain annuity. Now really it seems to me the simple mode of trying whether that annuity is subject to legacy duty or not, is to suppose that instead of an annuity the testator had given a lump sum of money. Suppose the testator had said, "I give to my son £10,000 out of my estate. I give him £10,000 as a legacy on condition that he shall assist my trustees for ten years (or during his life) to carry on my business." The son would have the power of choosing. If he said, "I do not think that, sufficient remuneration, therefore I will not assist," of course then he would not take the legacy. But if he accepted it, it would be quite unarguable to say that the legacy in that event would not be subject to duty. The son must be taken to know that it would be subject to duty. Therefore, if he accepted the legacy and upon the condition, accepting the condition that he was to have this remuneration for his services, he would know that the thing he was to get would be that sum minus the legacy duty which the law mposed upon him. It was his to take or refuse as he pleased. If he takes it, how could he turn round and say, "I will not pay the legacy duty."

The argument has been a very ingenious one, The argument, and I put it in what seems to me the most striking form in which it was adduced by Mr. Higgins and Mr. Macnaghten in favour of their view, was this: they say, Suppose this son had been a manager of the business up to the time of the testator's death, and had been in the habit of receiving £500 a year for managing the business, and the testator had said, "I give to my son £500 a year upon condition that he shall go on managing the business as he has done." They say it would be very hard to treat that as a legacy. But that it would be very hard, is not a eason why it should not be treated as a legacy, if it s a legacy. Is it a legacy or not? How does the on take it? How would he claim it? He would me to the trustees, supposing he accepted the posi- on, and say, "I will go on, and I will take this." He would come to the trustees and say, "By the will you are directed to pay me £500 a year." That is claiming under the will. A thing which is claimed under a will, being the gift of the testator, is a legacy. I cannot conceive, even in that case, how the son, if he accepted the gift by the will, could say, "I have accepted this. I have accepted the condition under which it is given. I claim it under the will; but I say it is not a legacy."

Then it was said, Suppose the gift were of £5,000, upon condition that the son released a debt of £2,000 which the testator owed him, surely the son would not have to pay the duty on the whole £5,000? I do not know how the Inland Revenue Office would deal with that, but it seems to me probable that he would not. Why? For this simple reason. In that case the residuary estate would be increased by the £2,000 which otherwise would have to be paid out of it. The residue would pay increased duty—namely, the duty payable on that sum of £2,000—so that if the legatee were made to pay the duty on the whole fund, the estate would have to pay the duty twice over. Now that does not apply here, therefore the analogy is imperfect. That does not apply to a gift of this kind, where the valuable consideration which is to be given to the testator's estate as a condition of the legacy is a thing which is not taxable, and is not taxed, and does not pay duty. Therefore there is that broad and plain distinction between those two cases.

I am unable to see the difference between a legacy of a lump sum to a man upon condition that he shall perform services to the testator's estate and a legacy of an annuity to a man upon the same conditions. Each seems to me to be distinctly and plainly a legacy, and I agree that there is really no hardship in the matter; because if the consideration—if you like to call it such—which the legatee has to give by performing the duties for the testator's estate, be too onerous, he is not bound to say he will accept the legacy. He may say, "I decline it on those terms." Unless we were to hold as we do, it would seem to me to follow inevitably that the ordinary case of a gift to executors of a legacy for their trouble in performing the trusts of the estate ought not to pay duty. It has always been held that such a legacy should pay duty; and certainly, so far as I know, in nine cases out of ten such a legacy is a very insufficient remuneration indeed for the trouble which executors have. Very often it is a mere complimentary legacy—nineteen guineas, or something of that kind. A man's time may be taken up for years and years, he may be exposed to the continuous litigation which trustees and executors frequently are exposed to, and all his remuneration is nineteen guineas, and yet that has now to pay duty. We should be overruling previous cases, it seems to me, if we were to say, in this case, the legacy was not subject to duty. I think that the decision of North, J., was perfectly right.

DEAN v. DEAN. (a.)

Will—Life estate—Contingent remainder—Executory devise—Children who attain twenty-one "before or after the death of the tenant for life"—Powers of maintenance and advancement—No estate in trustees.

Devise, subject to a life estate in E. D., to the use of such child or children of the said E. D. "as, either before or after the death of the said E. D.," should attain the age of twenty-one.

Held, an executory devise.

Brackenbury v. Gibbons, 2 Ch. D. 417, 24 W. R. Dig. 315, not followed.

The legal effect of powers of maintenance and advancement in cases where the trustees take no estate, explained.

By his will, dated the 24th of August, 1871, Edward Dean, after certain devises to his nephew Charles Matthews and his son Edward Dean upon the trusts therein mentioned, and other devises and bequests not material to this report, devised all and singular the hereditaments whatsoever and wheresoever (not therein otherwise disposed of) of or to which he should be possessed or entitled at his decease, subject to an annuity, unto his sons Edward Dean and Robert Dean for their respective lives as tenants in common. And from and after the decease of his son Edward Dean the testator gave and devised one equal moiety of the said hereditaments and premises unto the use of such child or children of his son Edward Dean living at his decease and such issue then living of the child or children of his son Edward Dean then deceased as, either before or after the death of his son Edward Dean, should attain the age of twenty-one years, or die under that age and leave issue living at his, her, or their death or respective deaths as tenants in common if more than one, and the heirs and assigns of such child or children and issue respectively, but so that such issue should take only the share or shares respectively which the deceased parent or parents if living would have taken.

Then followed a similar devise of the other moiety on the death of Robert Dean to his children and issue.

But in case there should be no such child or issue of his son Edward Dean who should become entitled to the first mentioned moiety of the said hereditaments and premises, then and in that case the testator gave and devised the same from and after the decease of his son Edward Dean, unto and to the use of his son Robert Dean for his life, and from and after his decease the testator gave and devised the said moiety of the said hereditaments and premises unto and to the use of the child or children and issue of his son Robert Dean in like manner and under the same limitations as the moiety therein-before devised to them.

A similar cross-limitation of the second mentioned moiety followed in case of a similar failure of Robert Dean's issue, with a gift over on a similar failure of the issue of both Edward Dean and Robert Dean to the said Edward Dean and Robert Dean and their heirs upon the trusts therein declared in favour of the testators' daughters Ann Fairman and Mary Hall and their issue.

And the testator gave and bequeathed all the rest, residue, and remainder of the property and effects of or to which he might be possessed or entitled at his decease unto his said two sons Edward Dean and Robert Dean, their executors and administrators, as tenants in common.

And the testator empowered his trustees to apply all or any part of the income arising from any minor's presumptive share in any part of his property after the death of the preceding owner for life thereof (if any) for the maintenance and education of each such minor notwithstanding that a parent of such minor might be living and able to provide the same. And the testator directed his trustees to invest and accumulate the unapplied income in augmentation of the capital of such share, and also authorized his trustees to apply, but with the consent of the life owner for the time being (if any), any part not exceeding one-half of the presumptive or vested share of any person for his or her advancement in the world, and empowered his trustees for the purposes aforesaid to pay such income or the money so to be raised unto the parent or guardian for the time being of any such minor as aforesaid without being in any way answerable for the application thereof.

The will contained a power to appoint new trustees, and declared that the powers and discretions vested in the trustees named in the will should be exercisable by the trustees or trustee for the time being.

The said Charles Matthews and Edward Dean were appointed executors.

The testator died on the 12th of November, 1872. His will was proved by Edward Dean alone, Charles Matthews having renounced probate and disclaimed the trusts.

At the time of his death the testator was seised in fee simple of certain freeholds and copyholds.

The testator's son Robert Dean died on the 12th of February, 1885, intestate, leaving his widow, Mary Dean, and four children—viz., the defendant Edward Dean, his eldest son and heir-at-law, the defendant Robert Dean, his youngest son and customary heir of the copyholds, and two daughters. All the children were still infants.

The testator's son Edward Dean, who was illegitimate, died in June, 1889, unmarried and intestate.

The infant daughters, who were the plaintiffs by their next friend the said Mary Dean, claimed that the rights and interests of the plaintiffs in the freehold and copyhold hereditaments devised by the said will of the said testator in favour of his said sons Edward Dean and Robert Dean, and their respective children and issue, might be declared.

Byrne, Q.C., and A. à B. Terrell, for the plaintiffs.—There are two questions:—(1) Are the gifts to the children of Edward Dean and Robert Dean contingent remainders or executory devises? Robert Dean's children take if there is a contingent remainder properly supported or a valid executory devise. If the gift is construed as a contingent remainder it was supported by the estate in the trustees implied by the powers of maintenance and advancement. [They referred to Andrew v. Andrew, 24 W. R. 349, 1 Ch. D. 410; Brackenbury v. Gibbons, 2 Ch. D. 417, 24 W. R. Ch. Dig. 315, not followed in In re Lechmere and Lloyd, 18 Ch. D. 524, 30 W. R. Dig. 225, or in Miles v. Jarvis, 24 Ch. See Andrew v. Andrew and Muskett v. Eaton, 24 W. R. 52, 1 Ch. D. 435.

Daniel Jones, Bramwell Davis, and Methold, for the issue of Mary Hall and Ann Fairman, argued that the gift over in their favour had taken effect.

They cited Rhodes v. Whitehead, 13 W. R. 800, 2 Dr. & Sm. 532; Cole v. Sewell, 2 H. L. Cas. 186; Blackman v. Fysh, ante, p. 520; Fearne on Contingent Remainders, p. 18.

Ingle Joyce, for the Attorney-General, on behalf of the Crown.—My claim arises from the illegitimacy of Edward Dean. The Crown is not bound by a trust when it takes property by escheat: Chitty on Prerogative, 234; Lewin on Trusts, p. 30; 47 & 48 Vict. c. 71. In re Lechmere and Lloyd is wrong on the subsequent authorities.

Byrne, Q.C., replied.

CHITTY, J.—Apart from the clauses as to maintenance and advancement, this case is not distinguishable from Brackenbury v. Gibbons and In re Lechmere and Lloyd. The decisions in those cases are conflicting. In the former case, Hall, V.C., had present to his mind two rules of law; the first, as he stated it, "that every gift which can take effect as a remainder absolutely excludes its being treated as an executory devise," and, secondly, that a contingent remainder fails unless it is ready to take effect in possession immediately on the determination of the particular freehold estate. He applied both rules. In the latter case, the Master of the Rolls (Sir G. Jessel) declined to apply the first rule, and held that the limitation was a valid executory devise. The distinction which he drew between a future limitation to all the children of a tenant for life who shall attain twenty-one and a future limitation to all the children of a tenant for life who, either during his life or afterwards, shall attain twenty-one seems at first sight subtle and over refined. So far as the testator's intention is concerned, the meaning of the limitations is the same; in both cases the testator intends that all the children who attain twenty-one, whether before or after the death of the tenant for life, shall take; and it would seem strange to anyone not acquainted with the niceties of the law relating to real property in this country that any different legal effect should be given to a mere difference in words which mean the same thing. But a difference in the mere form of words does in several cases make a difference in law. [His lordship mentioned some instances in illustration of this point.]

Now the reasoning upon which the decision in In re Lechmere and Lloyd is founded appears to be this: by the express words that those who attain twenty-one after the determination of the preceding estate are to take the testator shows that, in the event which he contemplates of all the children not attaining twenty-one in the lifetime of the tenant for life, there is to be a gap between the determination of the preceding estate and the future estate to the children. The testator has used such a form of gift as, on the face of it, is inapplicable to a remainder, and consequently the court is precluded from applying the rule that every gift which can take effect as a remainder must not be construed as an executory devise. The court cannot construe the gift as a remainder unless it strikes out part of the express limitation; and the rule referred to neither requires nor justifies such an alteration of the testator's language.

According to the judgment in Festing v. Allen, a contingent remainder to the children of the tenant for life who attain twenty-one vests absolutely in those children who at the death of the tenant for life have attained that age, to the exclusion of those who subsequently attain that age. But according to the reasoning now under consideration, where the limitation is to children who, either before or after the death of the tenant for life, attain the age of twenty-one, the testator expressly attaches the qualification of membership of the class to those children who attain the age after the tenant for life's death, and, in order to give effect to the express and lawful limitation in favour of such children, the court is bound to hold that the limitation, taken in its entirety, is an executory devise. This reasoning, subtle as it may appear to be, is not more subtle or artificial than the reasoning of a scholastic character which the common law judges of former times applied to cases of this kind; and I think that, having regard to the subject-matter, it may be accepted as correct. It has the merit of giving effect to a lawful intention expressed in clear terms.

But I am not under the necessity of choosing between these two conflicting authorities. In Miles v. Jarvis, Kay, L.J. (then Kay, J.), followed the decision of the late Master of the Rolls in preference to that of Hall, V.C.

The weight of modern authority is therefore in favour of my holding that the limitation in question before me is an executory devise, apart from the clauses as to maintenance and advancement.

These clauses appear to afford additional reasons for holding the limitation to be an executory devise. It was argued that the clauses do not apply to the devises where the devisees take directly the legal estate; that they apply only where, under the other gifts in the will, the legal estate passes to the trustees, and the beneficiaries take thereby equitable interests under the trusts declared. But this argument does not give proper effect to the words "all or any part of the income arising from any minor's presumptive share in any part of my property" in the maintenance clause, or the words "presumptive or vested share of any person under this my will" in the advancement clause. I am of opinion that these clauses apply not only where the trustees take the legal estate, but also where the beneficiaries take it directly. The question then arises, what is the legal operation and effect of these clauses? Where the legal estate in fee is vested in trustees the powers are equitable powers only. But where no legal estate is vested in the trustees, as is the case in reference to the questions raised in this action, it is necessary, in order to give effect to the clauses as they stand, to imply some legal right or estate in the trustees. Unless such an implication is made the trustees could not execute the power of "applying" the rents which is conferred upon them, nor could they accumulate the surplus rents according to the direction given to them, nor could they raise the money for advancement. Ought, then, a legal estate or merely legal powers to be implied? If the former, it would, I apprehend, regard being had to the maintenance clause, be arguable that it was at least a legal estate to arise on the determination of the preceding life estate, and to continue during the respective lives of the children presumptively entitled so long as they were under age, in their respective shares, and that such an estate would be a determinable estate of freehold pur autre vie, and sufficient to support the limitation to the minors respectively if construed as contingent remainders. But, in my opinion, to imply an estate in the trustees would be going beyond what is necessary, and would not be justifiable, having regard to the other parts of the will, where the estates are expressly devised to trustees. I think, then, the right construction is to imply a legal power in the trustees named in the will to enter upon the devised lands, and to take the profits sufficient to enable them to execute the express power of maintenance, and the direction or trust to accumulate the surplus rents; and also a legal power in the same trustees, by way of revocation of uses or otherwise, sufficient to enable them to raise the money required for advancement under the express power of advancement. These powers would pass to new trustees. The power to appoint new trustees expressly declares that the powers and discretions vested in the trustees named in the will shall be exercisable by the trustees or trustee for the time being of the will.

The manner in which the maintenance and advancement clauses support the construction that the limitations in favour of the children and issue of Edward and Robert are executory devises is that they contemplate and make express provision for the event of there being a gap between the determination of the preceding life estates and the vesting of the estate in the children or other issue.

The question then arises, what has become of the legal estate since the deaths of the tenants for life during the suspense period? It was claimed by the beneficiaries as having passed to the trustees named in the will by virtue of the limitations in case both the testator's sons Edward and Robert should die without leaving issue who should become entitled under the provisions of the will. But this claim cannot be maintained. The estate does not pass under this devise until after it has been ascertained that there is no issue entitled. I think it passed under the residuary devise. Consequently, it vested in the two sons as tenants in common, and on the death of Robert, who died in 1885, his moiety passed as to the freeholds to Edward, his eldest son, as his heir-at-law, and as to the copyholds to Robert, his youngest son, as his heir, according to the custom of the manor. On the death, in 1889, of Edward, who was illegitimate, his moiety passed as to the freeholds to the Crown, and as to the copyholds to the lord of the manor. But the legal estate during this suspense period is subject to the implied powers already stated, apart from any question as to the prerogative of the Crown.

One De Penny, who was born in Scotland in 1831, from 1856 to the date of his death was chiefly resident in Bolivia. In 1882 he married the plaintiff, a Bolivian lady; in 1886 he returned to Scotland, where he bought an estate, and in 1888 he again returned to Bolivia, where he died in 1890, being then about to return to Scotland. The plaintiff procured from the Bolivian Court ex parte a declaration of the deceased's intestacy, and that she was entitled to his movable property, including the movable or personal property in England. The sisters of the intestate, who were his next of kin, obtained from the Scotch Court a confirmation of their title and a finding that the deceased died domiciled in Scotland, and they were "decerned" to be the "executrices dative" of the intestate. Pursuant to that decree they delivered an inventory of the personal estate of the intestate in England and Scotland in accordance with the Confirmation and Probate Act, 1858, and found security for the administration of the intestate's personal estate, the greater part of which was in England and consisted of £36,000 in the hands of the deceased's former agents, who held a power of attorney from the plaintiff to prosecute actions here. The personalty in Scotland was about £3,000 in value. The confirmation was sealed in the Probate Court in England notwithstanding a caveat entered on behalf of the plaintiff. The four sisters thereby became the legal personal representatives of the intestate in England. Proceedings were contemplated on behalf of the plaintiff for revocation in Scotland of the Scotch confirmation.

The plaintiff brought this action, claiming a declaration that the deceased died domiciled in Bolivia, administration, an injunction to restrain the agents from paying the funds in their hands to the "executrices dative," or otherwise parting with the funds, except to the plaintiff, an injunction to restrain the executrices from taking proceedings to recover, and from receiving, the deceased's personal estate, and for a receiver. The writ was served on the agents in London, and the plaintiff had obtained an order for service of the writ out of the jurisdiction on the executrices.

This was a motion to discharge the order for service out of the jurisdiction.

CHITTY, J. — Such recognition of the plaintiff's rights as has taken place in Bolivia is relied on merely for the purpose of showing that she has a primâ facie title. No objection was taken by the counsel for the sisters on the ground that she had not made an affidavit, nor as to the sufficiency of the evidence for the above limited purpose. Her case, then, is that she is absolutely entitled in equity to the fund which is now within the jurisdiction of this court; and she asks that the fund may be kept here until she has had an opportunity of establishing her title. She alleges that the sisters are in poor circumstances, and that they intend, if they receive the fund, to take it out of the jurisdiction of this court and to distribute it among themselves as the intestate's next of kin in prejudice of her right, and that if they remove the fund she will be without remedy, and unable to obtain restitution thereof. At the same time, her counsel disclaimed any imputation of bad faith or dishonesty on the part of the sisters.

The sisters' case is this:—They claim that at his death the intestate was domiciled in Scotland, the land of his birth; and they deny that the plaintiff is his widow. They allege that they are his next of kin, and as such entitled to his movables wheresoever found. They have accordingly applied to the proper tribunal in Scotland for a confirmation of this title, and have obtained there a finding that the deceased died domiciled in Scotland; and they have been decerned there to be "the executrices dative" of the intestate. They accordingly represent the intestate in Scotland, and are entitled to recover and receive his movables there. These proceedings in Scotland were also ex parte, and were conducted in the absence of the plaintiff, just as her proceedings in Bolivia were conducted in the absence of the defendants, the sisters. In neither case are the absent parties bound, subject only to the point to be presently mentioned turning on the effect of the Confirmation and Probate Act, 1858.

Having obtained this confirmation the sisters applied, pursuant to the above Act of 1858, to the Probate Division of the High Court in England to have the confirmation sealed in England. Here they were met by a caveat which had been entered on behalf of the plaintiff. On an appeal from the registrar

(a.) Reported by V. DE S. FOWKE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Butt, J., ordered the confirmation to be sealed, but declined to stay contentious proceedings. The confirmation has accordingly been sealed. The result is that the sisters are the duly constituted legal personal representatives of the intestate in England, and as such entitled to sue for and recover in the English courts the personal estate of the intestate within their jurisdiction; consequently they can recover by action in England the debt or fund in the hands of the defendants Gibbs & Sons which those defendants admit to be due.

The 9th section of the Confirmation and Probate Act, 1858, makes the finding in Scotland that the deceased died domiciled there conclusive, but this section, as explained by the 17th section, makes the finding conclusive for the purposes of the Act only (see Sir Cresswell Creswell's decision in Hawarden v. Dunlop, 2 Sw. & Tr. 340), and Lord Selborne's statement of the effect of the Act in Ewing v. Orr-Ewing). I understand the reason why the sealing was ordered here, notwithstanding the caveat was that the finding in Scotland was conclusive on the question of sealing, and that, until such finding was duly reversed by the proper tribunal, the English court was bound to allow the sealing. [His lordship here read the plaintiff's writ, and continued:—] The defendants Messrs. Gibbs are friendly to the plaintiff—in fact, some members of that firm have received from the plaintiff a power of attorney from her, and it is upon instructions given by them, as such attorneys, that this action has been instituted in her name. So far as the action is concerned they are mere stakeholders.

In these circumstances it is plain that the plaintiff is claiming by an equitable title depending on the law of the alleged Bolivian domicil to be the sole beneficiary—at least of the funds within the jurisdiction of this court.

In the old Court of Chancery when, on the granting of letters of administration the Ecclesiastical Court had, by a definitive sentence in a contentious suit, determined the question which of the parties were next of kin, such sentence was held to be conclusive in a suit for the administration of the estate, and it was not permissible to reopen the question on the distribution of the estate (see Barrs v. Jackson, 1 Phil. C. C. 582). But where the administration had been granted by the Ecclesiastical Court in a non-contentious proceeding, the grant was not conclusive (see Long v. Wakeling, 1 Beav. 400).

I think, therefore, that the plaintiff was not precluded by the sealing of the confirmation from suing in this court. Indeed, this point was admitted by the sisters' counsel.

The effect of the sealing of the confirmation in this country, taken in connection with the ex parte finding of the domicil in Scotland, is to render the representation and administration here ancillary to the representation and administration in Scotland. But it has been the practice of the courts in all countries to retain assets within their jurisdiction for the purpose of insuring payment of the debts of creditors within the jurisdiction, and not to permit the assets to be taken away until such creditors are paid, and only after they are paid to allow the surplus assets to be remitted to the principal administrator in a foreign country.

In The Société Générale de Paris v. Dreyfus Brothers Pearson, J., held that the plaintiffs, foreigners out of the jurisdiction, were entitled to restrain the defendants, also foreigners out of the jurisdiction, from removing out of the jurisdiction funds to which the plaintiffs claimed to be entitled. His judgment was reversed on appeal, on the ground that the further evidence adduced showed that the matter was res judicata between the parties by reason of the judgment of the French courts having jurisdiction in the matter.

The exact point for decision in this case turns upon order 11 of the rules of 1883. This order contains the code of English law and procedure upon the question of service out of the jurisdiction. The only parts of the order on which the plaintiffs can rely are sub-sections (f) and (g) of rule 1. As to sub-section (g), the plaintiff's counsel did not argue that the case fell within it. I need therefore say no more about that sub-section than that I think it does not apply. Sub-section (f) enables the court to allow service out of the jurisdiction where any injunction is sought as to anything to be done within the jurisdiction.

For the sisters it was argued that the thing to be done must be something which could be done only or exclusively within the jurisdiction, and that inasmuch as the injunction asked was to restrain payment by the defendants Gibbs & Sons anywhere, and to restrain the sisters from suing or receiving anywhere, the case was not within the rule. But although the injunction asked for is in wider terms than it would be right to grant it, I think that on a motion supported by proper evidence the court would be justified in granting an injunction restraining the sisters from suing Messrs. Gibbs within the jurisdiction, and that such a limited injunction would be an injunction to restrain a thing being done within the jurisdiction, and consequently within the rule.

As the evidence stands at the present moment the sisters could sue the defendants Gibbs & Sons only within the jurisdiction, and consequently, as Gibbs & Sons are friendly to the plaintiff, and not willing to pay the sisters unless compelled so to do by action, such an injunction would be effectual. The case, then, is not within the principle of the decision in the British Marine Association v. McInnes, where Manisty, J., so far as appears from the short note of his judgment, thought that the injunction would not be effectual. I am of opinion, then, that the plaintiff is right on this point, and that the court has authority to order service out of the jurisdiction.

But there remains for consideration, first, the question arising on the 2nd rule of order 11, which requires that where leave is asked to serve a writ in Scotland, if it shall appear to the court that there may be a concurrent remedy in Scotland the court shall have regard to the comparative convenience of proceeding in England or in the place of residence of the defendants, and also, secondly, the question of the proper exercise of the judicial discretion in allowing service out of the jurisdiction: see the Société Générale de Paris v. Dreyfus Bros. These questions I will consider together.

Assuming that there is a concurrent remedy in Scotland, it will be unquestionably more convenient to the defendants, the sisters, who are resident in Scotland, that the proceedings should take place there, and inasmuch as the plaintiff resides in Bolivia it will make but little difference to her convenience whether the proceedings are, in England or in Scotland, although it would be slightly more convenient to her that the proceedings should be here, where her lay attorney and her present professional advisers are resident. But it is stated for her that the balance of convenience is in favour of suing in England because the fund is here.

Now I think this would be a strong ground in her favour if the defendants, the sisters, proposed to take the funds which are here, not merely out of the jurisdiction, but to some foreign country. But on the evidence as it stands the only case made for the plaintiff is that the sisters intend to take the fund to Scotland, but there is no reason for supposing that they intend to fly from their native land with the money if they receive it.

Further, they have given security in Scotland for the due administration of the intestate's estate in pursuance of the Probate and Confirmation Act, 1858, a statute which applies to both England and Scotland. The main contest between the parties is as to the domicil. The intestate was a Scotchman by birth, and although there is no very precise evidence on the point, the probability is that several of the witnesses are in that country. Certainly the intestate's agent and factor, who has made an affidavit as to the Scotch domicil, and will be a material witness, resides in Scotland. Although I do not pretend to review the finding in Scotland that the domicil was Scotch, and I am aware the plaintiff has not as yet had a fair opportunity of giving evidence as to the domicil, and although it would be premature to express any definite opinion on the question, I may without impropriety go so far as to say that upon the letters of the intestate, written within a short time before his death, upon the fact of his having recently bought an estate in Scotland, and the other facts deposed to there is a fair primâ facie case shown for the Scotch domicil. But when I say this I must not be understood as meaning in any way to prejudice the plaintiff's case. My conclusion is that on the question of convenience the preponderance is in favour of Scotland.

But is there a concurrent remedy? The suggestion on behalf of the sisters is that the defendant Gibbs & Sons as the stakeholders may institute in Scotland an action of multiple poinding, an action analogous to interpleader in England, the result of which would be that the fund would be deposited in a bank there, and the litigation would proceed between the plaintiff and the sisters. But although the defendants Messrs. Gibbs may be willing to assist the plaintiff to some extent, they may not be willing, and they certainly are under no obligation to her, to incur the trouble and expense of instituting proceedings in their own names on their own behalf in Scotland. A remedy which depends on the will and pleasure of another person is not a concurrent remedy within the 2nd rule of order 11.

There remains, however, to be mentioned one fact which, in connection with the other circumstances of the case, is, I think, decisive on the question of the proper exercise of the judicial discretion. It is this: from the affidavit in support of the plaintiff's case it appears that it is intended to institute proceedings on her behalf in Scotland for the revocation of the Scotch confirmation. These proceedings will go to the root of the matter. If the plaintiff succeeds, the revocation of the sealing in England will follow, and the plaintiff will thus become the legal personal representative in Scotland and in England of the intestate. In any view of the case she must have recourse to the Scotch courts to establish her claim to the movables there. Considering, then, that she must take proceedings in Scotland; that there is no substantial risk of the English personal estate being lost to her if removed to Scotland, and that security has been given there for the due administration of the entire estate in both countries, and considering that the Scotch courts have, to the extent above stated, seisin of the case, I come to the conclusion that the service in Scotland ought not to stand. The Bolivian lady ought not to be allowed to draw the Scotch ladies across the border into the English courts, but must pursue them in the courts of their own country, which have jurisdiction to do her complete justice.

I therefore accede to the application, and discharge the order for service out of the jurisdiction, with costs to be paid by the plaintiff.

BOSTOCK v. D'EYNCOURT. (a.)

Will—Construction—Joint tenants—Tenants in common—Words of distribution.

A testator who died in 1826 by his will devised real estate to trustees upon certain trusts during the lives of his children and the survivor of them, and from and after the decease of the survivor, or during the life or lives of all or any, with their concurrence, upon trust to sell and stand possessed of the proceeds upon trust "for all and every my said sons and daughters who shall be then living, and the issue of any then dead (such issue standing in loco parentis), share and share alike. The testator left six children surviving him, the last survivor of whom died in 1877. The property was sold in 1890. Only two of testator's children had issue. Two of testator's grandchildren died before the sale.

Held, that, as the words of distribution, "share and share alike," occurred only once, the issue of each child took as joint tenants inter se.

Adjourned summons.

This was a summons by two of the trustees of the will of the Rev. John Yates to determine how, and in what shares, certain moneys were divisible under the said will, the question being whether the grandchildren of the testator took as joint tenants or tenants in common.

By his will, dated October, 1826, the testator devised real estate to his trustees upon certain trusts during the lives of his sons and daughters and the survivors or survivor of them, and from and after the decease of the survivor or during the lives or life of all or any, with their concurrence, upon trust for sale, and to stand possessed of the proceeds upon trust "for all and every my said sons and daughters who shall be then living and the issue of any then dead (such issue standing in loco parentis) share and share alike." The testator died in 1826 leaving six children only him surviving, all of whom have since died, the last survivor in 1877. Two only, J. B. Yates and J. A. Yates, had issue. The sale of the property took place in 1890. Two of the grandchildren died previously.

C. Williamson, for the executors.

NORTH, J.—In this case it is said that the primary intention is to sell after the death of the surviving sons and daughters, but there is a secondary intention to sell during their lifetime. I cannot draw any distinction between these. There is to be a sale after the death, and it is to be earlier if they like, but not unless they like. Then we come to words of division, and the primary thing contemplated is that it is to be divided while the testator has one or more children still living to take, for the words are, "shall stand possessed of and interested in the moneys arising from such sale, upon trust for all and every my said sons and daughters who shall be then living, and the issue of any then dead." Although the clause does hit the case of all being dead before the time came for division, yet what the testator had in his mind was a case in which some of them would be living. Then what is the class among whom the property is to be divided? "All and every my sons and daughters who shall be then living," and "the issue of any then dead." This class, then, will take per capita, and as tenants in common or joint tenants, as the case may be. No words of distribution occur there, and under those circumstances I apprehend they would take as joint tenants. Then we have the words "such issue standing in loco parentis." In the place of a parent means in the place where a parent would have stood if the parent had been living. Therefore, we have a class consisting of sons and daughters then living plus the family, so to call it, of a deceased son or daughter, which family is to stand where the parent would have stood if alive. Then come the words "share and share alike." They, of course, create a tenancy in common instead of a joint tenancy. In what? In the class which is described in which there would have been a joint tenancy but for the fact that those words follow.

Now the families of the deceased sons and daughter each take a share. How are they to take it? There are no words whatever addressed to this particular case. There are, so to say, two classes to take. Firstly, the sons and daughters plus the family of a deceased son or daughter; secondly, the grandchildren. But the words of distribution occur only once, and the court has held time after time that in such cases the words apply to the first class only, and not to the second class, the issue, who take the share a deceased son or daughter would have taken. I cannot follow the case of Shepherdson v. Dale, as it is inconsistent with many other cases, such as Penny v. Clarke and Heasman v. Pearse, which is exactly in point. The cases of In re Smith and Hodges v. Grant are quite distinguishable, as there the words of distribution are repeated twice. The courts have drawn a distinction arising from the repetition of the words, and as here there are no words of distribution between the issue of the children, such issue must take as joint tenants. With regard to Mrs. Phillips' marriage settlement, I do not think it severs the joint tenancy. One moiety will therefore go to the children of J. B. Yates, and the other moiety to the children of J. A. Yates as joint tenants.

A company is not entitled to reduce its capital by the amount expended on preliminary expenses, as such expenditure is not "lost capital" or "capital unrepresented by available assets" within section 3 of the Companies Act, 1877.

Petition.

This was a petition for reduction of capital. The balance-sheet of the company for the year 1890 showed the expenditure of £15,452 17s. 7d. on preliminary, agency establishment, and extension expenses. The company proposed to write off £11,445, part of the said expenditure, by cancelling part of its capital.

Cozens-Hardy, Q.C., and Wurtzburg, for the petition.—Section 3 of the Companies Act, 1877, says that the power to reduce capital conferred by the Companies Act, 1867, shall include a power to cancel any lost capital or any capital unrepresented by available assets.

NORTH, J.—I cannot accede to this application. I cannot, simply on the statement contained in the petition, assume that the capital which was expended on preliminary expenses is now "unrepresented by available assets." The effect would be that every sum expended, properly, by a company in preliminary expenses may be provided out of capital, and the company might then, simply because the money has been so spent, at once reduce its capital by that sum. I do not think that this is the intention of the Act. I dismiss the petition.

REG. v. POWELL AND OTHERS. (a.)

Licensing Acts—Change of occupier—New tenant's licence under section 14 of 9 Geo. 4, c. 61—Second application—Jurisdiction.

When a new tenant has applied for and obtained a special licence provided for by section 14 of 9 Geo. 4, c. 61, there is no jurisdiction in justices to accede to a second application for a similar licence.

Rule nisi for a mandamus.

On September 2, 1889, one Roberts took possession and entered into occupation of a certain beerhouse which had belonged to one John, who held a licence for it which would expire on October 10. The licence had to be renewed, and John had omitted to apply for a renewal on August 30. Roberts on September 27 applied for a new licence, which was refused, but on the same day he applied for and obtained a licence under section 14 of 9 Geo. 4, c. 61, which would expire on October 10. On January 3, 1890, Roberts applied for a second licence of the same kind to carry him on to October 10, 1890. This was refused, on the ground that Roberts, not being a "new tenant," the justices had no jurisdiction. Roberts thereupon obtained a rule nisi for a mandamus.

David Lewis showed cause.—Section 14 applies only to new tenants or occupiers, and it was impossible to consider the applicant a new tenant when he had already obtained a licence as an occupier. That is the true test as to limit of time.

(a.) Reported by FRANCIS T. DUKA, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

(a.) Reported by CECIL CHAPMAN, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Reg. v. Justices of Liverpool, 32 W. R. 20, 11 Q. B. D. 638, shows that the application need not be made during the currency of the outgoing tenant's licence, but there must be some limit or a man would never cease to be a new tenant, which is absurd. His proper course would have been to apply for a renewal to himself of John's licence at the general annual licensing meeting instead of at the special sessions for transfers under 9 Geo. 4, c. 61, or he might have waited till after October 10 before opening the house.

Poland, Q.C., and James Paterson, in support of the rule.—There is nothing in this section to prevent a second application. It is unreasonable to suppose that the Legislature intended a renewal for a very few days to preclude the applicant from obtaining a renewal for a whole year, and it is conceded that if the application on January 3, 1890, had been the first one, it would have been granted.

A. L. SMITH, J.—This is a motion to make absolute a rule for a mandamus to the justices of Swansea to hear and determine an application by one Roberts for the transfer to him of a licence to sell beer on premises which were formerly occupied by one John. The question whether the justices were right in refusing to entertain the application on the ground that they had no jurisdiction depends upon the proper construction of section 14 of the Licensing Act, 1828. It appears that on September 2, 1889, John, being the tenant of a beerhouse in which he was then duly licensed, gave up possession to Roberts, who entered into occupation on the same day. Under those circumstances, if Roberts had held his hand and had abstained from obtaining a licence in the interval between the date of occupation and January 3, 1890, the justices would have had jurisdiction to grant his application, for that is decided by Reg. v. Justices of Liverpool. But he was not content so to abstain, and on September 27, 1889, he applied for and obtained a licence under section 14 of the Licensing Act, 1828. He only enjoyed the benefit of that for thirteen days, as by the terms of the section the licence was bound to expire on October 10, 1889. On January 3, 1890, he makes an application for a similar licence which should last till October 10, 1890, but the justices held that, having already obtained a licence, he did not bring himself within the terms of the section. I think they were right. In my opinion only one licence can be granted to one and the same person under that section. The same person cannot twice bring himself within the description of a "new tenant." The section says "if any person so licensed shall remove from or yield up the possession of the house specified in the licence, it shall be lawful for the justices to grant to any new tenant or occupier of any house having, &c., become unoccupied." That must mean the immediate new tenant, not one who had already obtained a licence.

GRANTHAM, J.—The only question is, whether the justices had jurisdiction to grant a licence under section 14 when they had already granted a licence under that section to the same tenant. I think not. If they could, there would be nothing to prevent a man going on year after year renewing applications for such licences as a "new tenant" for the rest of his life.

Divorce—Judicial separation—Matrimonial Causes Act, 1878 (41 & 42 Vict. c. 19), s. 4—24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, s. 43—Aggravated assault—Order—Wife not bound to cohabit with husband—Appeal.

A husband was convicted before justices of an aggravated assault on his wife under section 43 of 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, and they inflicted a fine of forty shillings. They also made an order under section 4 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1878, that the wife should be no longer bound to cohabit with her husband, and for maintenance. The husband appealed to this court.

Held, that section 4 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1878, gave no appeal from the conviction for the aggravated assault, but only from the order made under that section for separation and maintenance.

Appeal from a decision of the justices sitting in petty sessions at East Harling in the county of Norfolk, convicting Charles Sutton Lewin, under section 43 of 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, of an aggravated assault upon his wife, and making an order under section 4 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1878, that the wife should be no longer bound to cohabit with her husband, and ordering him to pay a weekly sum for maintenance. The justices inflicted a fine of 40s. and refused to state a case.

Poyser, for the appellant.—The conviction for the aggravated assault is bad on the face of it. Section 42 of 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100 gives the magistrates power to inflict a penalty of £5 or two months' imprisonment for an assault. Section 43 only applies "if the assault or battery is of such an aggravated nature that it cannot in their" (the magistrates) "opinion be sufficiently punished under the provisions hereinbefore contained." The fine of 40s. here inflicted comes within the provisions of section 42, as the magistrates have held that the fine which can be imposed by that section is sufficient, and by inflicting so small a penalty they have prevented the husband appealing to quarter sessions; the appeal is therefore to this court by the provisions of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1878, which provides that all orders made under section 4 shall be subject to appeal to this court. The order is made under that part of the section which provides that "if a husband shall be convicted of an aggravated assault within the meaning of 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, s. 43, upon his wife, the court or magistrate before whom he shall be so convicted may, if satisfied that the future safety of his wife is in peril, order that the wife be no longer bound to cohabit with her husband." Here the jurisdiction never arose, as there was no proper conviction under section 43. The evidence shows that there was no aggravated assault. In any event, I am entitled to go into the evidence to show that the magistrates were wrong in finding that the future safety of the wife was in peril. [He then referred to the facts.]

H. Browne, for the respondent.

JEUNE, J.—The only question in this case which I have to decide is whether the magistrates, on the evidence before them, were right in finding that the future safety of the wife was in peril. It has been suggested that a larger and more difficult question is involved—viz., whether the conviction for the aggravated assault was rightly made—but I do not think I have any right to entertain that question. In my view the Act of Parliament 41 & 42 Vict. c. 19, s. 4, means what it says. It gave an appeal to this tribunal from so much of the jurisdiction as the Act of Parliament conferred on the inferior court. It cannot be contended that I am not bound by the decision in Woods v. Woods, 33 W. R. 323, 10 P. D. 172, and Powell v. Powell, 14 P. D. 177, 38 W. R. Dig. 98, and those cases appear to me to cover all the ground in this case except the point I have stated. The conviction must, therefore, be taken to be good, although the fine imposed is not so large as required by section 43 of 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100. It is said that there ought to be an appeal because if the magistrates had fined in the full amount provided by that section there would have been an appeal, and therefore there must be an appeal here. All this, however, only goes to show good reason why there should be an appeal, but does not show that there is one. If there is any hardship it seems to me limited, because 41 & 42 Vict. c. 19 gives an appeal in every case where the provisions of that statute are acted upon. Assuming, then, that there is a good conviction for an aggravated assault, an examination of the evidence, if I have the right to examine, convinces me that the magistrates came to a very sensible conclusion, and that they had reasonable grounds for finding that the future safety of the wife was in peril. I dismiss the appeal with costs, but if necessary give leave to appeal.

Prob. Div. & Adm. Div. Probate. } March 3, 10.

In the Goods of SIR J. E. BOEHM (deceased). (a.)

Probate—Will—Intention to give equally to two—Name of first legatee repeated—Execution in ignorance of mistake—Grant omitting name in second legacy.

A testator instructed his solicitor that he wished to give £10,000 to each of his daughters, G. and F., but by inadvertence G.'s name was inserted in the draft and in the will in both clauses, F.'s name being omitted from the second, where it ought to have been. The draft was brought to the testator, but not read over to him, an epitome, in which the names were correctly stated, being read instead. The will was executed by the testator without being read to or by him, and in ignorance of the mistake.

Held, that the court would, on motion, with the consent of all parties interested, grant probate of the will omitting the name of G. from the second of the two clauses.

Motion for grant of probate of the will of Sir J. E. Boehm, R.A., deceased, omitting in two places in the latter of two clauses of gift, the name "Georgiana."

The testator died on the 24th of December, 1890, leaving a will duly executed, bearing date the 12th of December, 1889. The testator's instructions to his solicitor were that two sums of £10,000 each should be set apart to be settled to the use and benefit of his two unmarried daughters, Miss Georgiana Boehm and Miss Florence Boehm, and their children, after the death of his wife.

By inadvertence the word "Georgiana" was inserted in both the clauses of the draft will, and the word "Florence" omitted altogether, so that there were two gifts of £10,000 to Miss Georgiana Boehm. The draft was taken to the testator, but only an epitome, which contained the name of "Florence," was read to him. The will, which was engrossed from the draft, and therefore contained the same mistake, was not read over to the testator at the time of its execution, and his attention was not drawn to the mistake, which was only discovered after his death.

Cur. adv. vult.

March 10.—JEUNE, J.—I am asked to grant probate of the will of Sir Joseph Edgar Boehm with the word "Georgiana" omitted in two places, in what, on the face of the will, professes to be a gift in her favour. I had some doubt about deciding this matter on motion, but as representatives of all existing interests agreed to its being so decided, and future interests will be protected rather than prejudiced by this mode of dealing with this question, I see no objection to adopting it.

It is clear from the evidence that the testator intended to give £20,000 in equal moieties to trustees for each of his daughters, Florence and Georgiana, and the instructions for the will correctly express this; but the draftsman, instead of inserting in the draft of the will a clause of gift in favour of Georgiana, and then a similar clause in favour of Florence, inserted the name of Georgiana in the second clause as well as in the first. It is proved that the testator did not read, or have read over to him, the will, but did read what professed to be an epitome of it, such epitome being in accordance with the instructions, and correctly representing the testator's intentions. In a sense, therefore, the word "Georgiana" was clearly inserted in the two places in question, in error, though the real and complete mistake was in not inserting Florence in place of Georgiana. In view of the case of Morrell v. Morrell, 30 W. R. 491, 7 P. D. 68, following Fulton v. Andrew, 23 W. R. 566, L. R. 7 E. & I. App. 448, and the earlier authority of In the Goods of Duane, 2 Sw. & Tr. 590, 10 W. R. Prob. Dig. 9, mistake is to be regarded as a question of fact depending on the circumstances of each case, and there is now no difficulty in circumstances such as those of the above cases in striking out a clause, or a single word, if shown to have been inserted by mistake. Indeed, in the present case no such difficulty occurs as arose in Fulton v. Andrew, in reference to the decisions in Atter v. Atkinson, L. R. 1 P. & D. 665, 17 W. R. Prob. Dig. 9, Guardhouse v. Blackburn, 14 W. R. 463, L. R. 1 P. & D. 109, and Harter v. Harter, 21 W. R. 341, L. R. 3 P. & D. 11, from a presumption of knowledge and approval arising from the reading of or the hearing of a will read, by a competent testator, because here the evidence is that the testator, relying on the epitome, never read the will or heard it read. My difficulty at the argument was that, in the above cases, to strike out the word or words inserted in error left the will what the testator intended it to be. Here, to strike out the word Georgiana and to leave a blank in its place does not leave the will what the testator intended it to be, and I am not aware that there is any exact authority for striking a word out of a will under these circumstances. This case would seem to be the same as it would have been in Morrell v. Morrell if the jury had found that the mistake consisted not merely in having put in the word "forty," but in not having put in the proper number "four hundred" instead of "forty"—if the jury had, in fact, answered the second question put to them differently from the way in which they did. The cases of In the Goods of Bushell, 36 W. R. 128, 15 P. D. 7, and In the Goods of Hudson, 43 Law Times Rep. N. S. 255, refer, I think, only to the correction of clerical errors; and the language of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in Linden v. Linden, 30 W. R. 709, 7 App. Cas. 192, points to the difficulty of rejecting words where such rejection alters the sense of those which remain.

But I think that the application of the principle of striking out a word clearly inserted in mistake may be safely extended—if it be an extension—to a case where the effect of its rejection may be to render ambiguous or even insensible a clause of which it formed part. If a person by fraud obtained the substitution of his name for that of another in a will it would be strange if his name could not be struck out, although the rest of the clause in which it occurred became thereby meaningless. It may be that in the present case the effect of striking out the name in question will be on the construction of the will, as it will then read to carry out the testator's intentions completely. It is not for me to decide that. But even if to strike out a name inserted in error and leave a blank have not the effect of giving full effect to the testator's wishes, I do not see why we should not, so far as we can, though we may not completely, carry out his intentions. I am, therefore, willing to grant probate of this will as prayed with the omissions specified.

AVERY v. WOOD. (a.)

Copyright—Costs—Taxation—"Full costs"—Copyright Act, 1842 (5 & 6 Vict. c. 45), s. 26.

The term "full costs" in section 26 of the Copyright Act, 1842, merely means ordinary costs as between party and party.

Irwine v. Reddish, 5 B. & Ald. 796, and Jamieson v. Trevelyan, 3 W. R. 172, 10 Ex. 748, approved.

Appeal from North, J.

The plaintiffs in this action had sued the defendants in respect of an alleged infringement of the plaintiffs' copyright in certain publications, and Romer, J., had made an order dismissing the action, and (following the words of section 26 of the Copyright Act, 1842 (5 & 6 Vict. c. 45)) had directed "the full costs" of the defendants to be taxed and to be paid by the plaintiffs. The taxing master taxed the defendants' costs in the usual way as between party and party. The defendants objected to the taxation, and claimed that their costs should be taxed as between solicitor and client, but the taxing master overruled the objection, stating as a reason therefor that it had been decided in Irwine v. Reddish, 5 B. & Ald. 796, and Jamieson v. Trevelyan, 3 W. R. 172, 10 Ex. 748, that "full costs" merely meant "ordinary costs as between party and party." The defendants took out a summons to review taxation, and North, J., sitting in chambers, made no order on the summons, but gave the defendants leave to appeal direct to the Court of Appeal.

Section 26 of the Copyright Act, 1842 (5 & 6 Vict. c. 45), following the words of section 8 of 8 Anne, c. 19 (the first Act dealing with copyright which was repealed), provides that the defendant in any action brought in pursuance of the Act may plead the general issue and give the special matter in evidence, "and if upon such action a verdict be given for the defendant, then the defendant shall have and recover his full costs, for which he shall have the same remedy as a defendant in any case by law hath."

Section 10 of the same Act (following substantially section 5 of 8 Anne, c. 19) imposes a penalty of £5 on every publisher of any book who neglects to deliver a copy of the same, when demanded, on behalf of certain public libraries, such penalty to be recovered by such librarian either by summary process or by action of debt, "in which action, if the plaintiff shall obtain a verdict, he shall recover his costs reasonably incurred, to be taxed as between attorney and client."

Section 2 of 5 & 6 Vict. c. 97 (passed in the same session as the Copyright Act, 1842) repeals so much of any clause or provision in any Act providing that either double or treble costs, or any other than the usual costs between party and party, shall be recovered: "provided always that instead of such costs the party heretofore entitled to such double or treble costs shall receive such full and reasonable indemnity as to all costs, charges, and expenses incurred in or about any action as shall be taxed."

The defendants appealed.

A. Hopkinson, for the appellants.—Jamieson v. Trevelyan and Irwine v. Reddish were not cases under the Copyright Acts, but under Acts relating to proceedings on "Distress," and are, therefore, distinguishable. In Doe d. Hyde v. Corporation of Manchester, 12 C. B. 474, the words "full costs" were held to mean a complete indemnity as between attorney and client. [FRY, L.J.—But in that case the word "expenses" was used as well as full costs.] By the use of the word "full" qualifying the word "costs" in section 26 of the Copyright Act, 1842, the Legislature clearly intended something beyond the usual costs between party and party, and that brings the defendants within section 2 of 5 & 6 Vict. c. 97, and entitles them to receive full indemnity for all costs, charges, and expenses. Again, in section 10 of the Copyright Act, 1842, the words "to be taxed as between attorney and client" are used, and are substituted for the words "full costs" in the similar section (section 5) of the Act of Anne. Further, in all the other Acts granting a monopoly (e.g., the Patent Acts and the Engravings Act) the policy of the Legislature has been to give extra or indemnity costs: see section 31 of the Patents Act, 1883.

Arthur H. Spokes, for the plaintiffs, the respondents, was not called on.

LINDLEY, L.J.—The question raised by this appeal is as to what is meant by the expression "full costs" as used in section 26 of the Copyright Act, 1842 (5 & 6 Vict. c. 45). If the matter were res nova, there would no doubt be a good deal in Mr. Hopkinson's argument that the expression "full costs" must mean something more than ordinary party and party costs. But the term had been frequently used in Acts of Parliament prior to the Copyright Act, 1842, and it must have been well known to the Legislature in 1842 to have been often interpreted by the courts of common law as meaning merely "ordinary costs as between party and party." In Irwine v. Reddish, decided in 1822, it was held that there was no distinction known in law between costs and "full costs," and in point of practice no difference in the mode of taxation; and Jamieson v. Trevelyan is to the same effect. There has been no decision to the contrary, and the expression "full costs" has been used in all the Copyright Acts from the time of Anne. It is true that in section 10 of the Copyright Act, 1842, which replaced section 5 of the Act of Anne, the expression "costs reasonably incurred to be taxed as between attorney and client" is used instead of the expression "full costs" used in section 5 of the Act of Anne; but I think that only shows that that is the meaning to be put on those words in that particular section, which relates to actions brought by librarians of public libraries against publishers for not delivering a copy of their publications, and cannot be construed as a general interpretation of the term "full costs" in other sections of the Act. I think the point is res judicata and that the taxing master was right.

FRY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. I think that Irwine v. Reddish, decided in 1822, was a judicial determination of this point, and showed that "full costs" meant merely ordinary costs as between party and party, and that there was in practice no difference in the mode of taxation. The Legislature in 1842 must be taken to have used the expression "full costs" in the sense in which it had then been already judicially interpreted. As to Mr. Hopkinson's argument founded on section 2 of 5 & 6 Vict. c. 97, it assumes that "full costs" are costs "other than the usual costs between party and party," whereas it has been determined long ago that "full costs" are the same thing as "ordinary costs between party and party."

Appeal dismissed.

Will—Charitable gift—Failure of particular charity after testator's death, but before payment of legacy—Lapse—Cy-près.

A testator bequeathed a legacy to a charitable institution, which was an orphanage voluntarily maintained by a lady at her own expense. This institution was in existence at the date of the testator's death, but it came to an end shortly afterwards, and before the legacy was paid.

Held (reversing Stirling, J., ante, p. 284, [1891] 1 Ch. 373), that the legacy had not lapsed, but had become the property of the orphanage; and that, as the orphanage had ceased to exist, the legacy became applicable by the Crown for charitable purposes cy-près.

Appeal from the decision of Stirling, J., reported ante, p. 284, [1891] 1 Ch. 373, where the facts are fully stated.

Ingle Joyce, for the Attorney-General, the appellant.—The judge below considered himself bound by Clark v. Taylor, 1 W. R. 476, 1 Drew. 642. That case, if correctly reported, is not in accordance with Hayter v. Trego, 5 Russ. 113, which was not cited in Clark v. Taylor.

He also cited Attorney-General v. Fraunces, W. N., 1866, p. 280.

Welby King, for the respondents, the residuary legatees.—The "orphanage at St. Dominic's, Newcastle," was really a private charitable institution, and in the case of failure of a private charitable institution a gift to it fails altogether; it is otherwise in the case of a public charity which fails, for there the gift will no doubt be applied cy-près, as in Hayter v. Trego.

He cited Clark v. Taylor and Russell v. Kellett, 3 Sm. & Gif. 264, 4 W. R. Dig. 131.

March 20.—The judgment of the COURT (LINDLEY, BOWEN, and KAY, L.JJ.) was delivered by KAY, L.J.—This case raises a question which seems only to have occurred in two instances in the books—namely, whether a charitable bequest to an institution which comes to an end after the death of the testator, but before the legacy is paid over, fails for the benefit of the residuary legatee, as in the case of a lapse.

Properly speaking, a lapse can only occur by failure of the object in the lifetime of the testator. But it is possible that a will might be so framed as that a subsequent failure of the object of the charitable gift might occasion a resulting trust for the benefit of the testator's estate. We have not been referred to any such case, nor have we found any.

A surplus of charity funds arising from decay of the particular charity, or from increase in the value of the charity property beyond the requirements of the special object, has been treated as charity property to be administered cy-près. Lord Eldon in Attorney-General v. Mayor of Bristol, 2 J. & W. 313, states expressly that this is a settled rule in case of a surplus arising from an increase of the fund. Attorney-General v. Ironmongers' Co. decides the same point where the object fails after the bequest has taken effect, and see Attorney-General v. Craven, 4 W. R. 340, 21 Beav. 392; Chamberlayne v. Brockett, 21 W. R. 299, L. R. 8 Ch. App. 206; and Mayor of Lyons v. Advocate-General of Bengal, 24 W. R. 679, 1 App. Cas. 91.

In Attorney-General v. Wilson, 3 M. & K. 362, a difference is suggested where the will shows an intention to create a resulting trust, as where the charitable purposes do not exhaust the whole income of the fund which is dealt with at the time of the disposition, but something is left undisposed of from the first.

This is not a case of that kind. It is a simple legacy of a sum of "£200 for the Orphanage of St. Dominic's, Newcastle-on-Tyne." If it had been received the whole might have been expended at once, and even if not received the amount might have been anticipated by borrowing from a banker or otherwise and charging the legacy with the amount so borrowed. Bowen, L.J., has some doubt as to the effect of the evince, but Lindley, L.J., and I, think the case must be eated as the learned judge has done—that, upon the idence, "the orphanage, though about to be discon-nued at the beginning of the year 1883, had not ceased exist at the time of the testator's death" (see ante, p. 5, [1891] 1 Ch. 377). The orphanage did come to end, however, before the legacy was paid over. the case of a legacy to an individual, if he survived e testator it could not be argued that the legacy ould fall into the residue. Even if the legatee died testate and without next of kin, still the money was s, and the residuary legatee would have no right hatever against the Crown. So, if the legatee were corporation which was dissolved after the testator's ath, the residuary legatee would have no claim.

Obviously it can make no difference that the legatee ased to exist immediately after the death of the stator. The same law must be applicable whether was a day, a month, a year, or, as might well ppen, ten years after, the legacy not having been aid either from delay occasioned by the administra-on of the estate or owing to part of the estate not aving been got in. The legacy became the property f the legatee upon the death of the testator, though e might not for some reason obtain the receipt of it ill long after. When once it became the absolute roperty of the legatee, that is equivalent to saying hat it must be provided for, and the residue is only hat remains after making such provision. It does ot for all purposes cease to be part of the testator's state until the executors admit assets, and appro-riate or pay it over; but that is merely for their onvenience and that of the estate. The rights, as etween the particular legatee and the residuary egatee, are fixed at the testator's death.

These propositions are so obvious that it would eem impossible to dispute them without some uthority to the contrary. Is there any such autho-ity? In the case of Hayter v. Trego Sir John Leach ad this very case to deal with. A testator gave a egacy of £500 to a voluntary society called the Plymouth and Devon Asylum for the Reception of Female Penitents. He died in June, 1821, at which ime the asylum was still in existence, but, on the 9th of May, 1822, before the legacy was paid, the ociety was dissolved. We have examined the record; t is plain from it that the contest was between the ext of kin (there being no residuary gift) and the Attorney-General; and Sir John Leach decided the ase in the only way which, on principle, seems to us o be possible—viz., that the fund must be applied or charitable purposes resembling that which had ailed.

It is said, and perhaps with truth, that there was in hat case a sufficient indication of a general charitable ntention to justify the decision, even if there had been o such institution in existence at the testator's death, nd reliance is placed on the more recent decision of Kindersley, V.C., in Clark v. Taylor. According to he report in Drewry, the bequest was £50 to a emale orphan school in Greenwich, patronized by Mrs. Enderby. The testator died in October, 1846 which is in the report incorrectly printed 1840), and he school was discontinued in November of the ame year. In the WEEKLY REPORTER it is stated hat the school was discontinued about the same time hat the testator died. Neither in the arguments nor n the judgment was reliance placed upon the cir-umstance that the institution was actually in exist-nce at the testator's death. In the judgment it was eated as a clear case of lapse—that is, as though here was no such institution at the testator's death, nd the only matter dealt with by the Vice-Chan-ellor was the question whether on that supposition here was such a general intention of charity as to justify an administration cy-près. The Vice-Chancellor decided that there was not, and that the residuary legatees were entitled. Hayter v. Trego was not referred to. The only cases cited were Cherry v. Mott, 1 My. & Cr. 123, and Loscombe v. Wintringham, 13 Beav. 87, in one of which the failures of the charity occurred in the testator's lifetime, and in the other—what is equivalent—the legatee declined the bequest.

It was upon the authority of this decision of Kindersley, V.C., that the learned judge in the court below chiefly rested his judgment, rather, as we gather from his language, against his own opinion. We cannot treat Clark v. Taylor as a decision which supports the view he has taken. It seems to us that all the Vice-Chancellor intended to decide was that, assuming the institution to have failed in the testator's lifetime, there was no such general purpose of charity as would warrant the distribution cy-près. We have not found any case in which the supposed view of the Vice-Chancellor in Clark v. Taylor has been followed. In the text-books, Tudor's Charitable Trusts, 3rd ed., p. 41; Jarman on Wills, pp. 246, 247 (doubtfully); and Theobald, p. 277; and also by Lord Hatherley in Fisk v. Attorney-General, 15 W. R. 1200, L. R. 4 Eq. 523, and Stuart, V.C., in Coldwell v. Holme, 2 W. R. 150, 2 Sm. & G. 34, the case is treated as a lapse, on the ground that the institution had come to an end in the testator's lifetime. If it decided that failure of the institution after the testator's death occasioned a lapse, or on any other ground entitled the residuary legatee to the legacy, we are of opinion that the decision should be overruled, but we do not believe that anything of the kind was intended.

In the present case we think that the Attorney-General must succeed, not on the ground that there is such a general charitable intention that the fund should be administered cy-près, even if the charity had failed in the testator's lifetime, but because, as the charity existed at the testator's death, this legacy became the property of that charity, and on its ceasing to exist its property falls to be administered by the Crown, who will apply it according to custom for some analogous purpose of charity, as in Attorney-General v. Ironmongers' Co., Wilson v. Barnes, 38 Ch. D. 507, and the other cases collected in Tyssen on Charity, at p. 440.

The appeal will, therefore, be allowed.

Appeal from a receiving order made by Mr. Registrar Linklater.

(a.) Reported by F. G. RUCKER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

In March, 1888, W. H. Davis obtained a judgment against J. Gamgee, the debtor, for £1,500. In March, 1890, Davis, having obtained payment of £200 on account, assigned the balance of the judgment debt to R. J. Ward, the petitioning creditor, in consideration of the payment of £900.

The sum of £250 was advanced to Ward by Lord Egmont, and Ward agreed, in consideration thereof, that Lord Egmont should share with him the benefit of the judgment debt—viz., to the extent of five-eighteenths.

Two further sums of £125 each were advanced to Ward by two other persons for a like consideration.

Declarations of trust in favour of Lord Egmont and the two other persons were made by Ward.

A bankruptcy petition was presented by Ward alone, who claimed to prove for the whole debt.

The registrar made a receiving order.

F. Cooper Willis, for the debtor.—The petition has been irregularly brought. Ward, being a trustee, is not entitled to present a petition alone; the cestuis que trustent ought to have been joined as co-petitioners, or at least their consent should have been obtained to the bringing of the petition: Ex parte Dearle, In re Hastings, 33 W. Application by way of appeal from the Queen's Bench Division for a rule nisi for a mandamus to the stipendiary magistrate of Manchester to state a case for the opinion of the court under 42 & 43 Vict. c. 49.

The applicant was summoned for a nuisance arising from a chimney in his chemical factory sending forth black smoke contrary to section 91, sub-section 7, of the Public Health Act, 1875, and the magistrate made an order for the abatement of the nuisance under section 96. The magistrate held that the second proviso to section 91 did not apply, and, consequently, refused to hear evidence to show that the furnace was constructed in such a manner as to consume, as far as practicable having regard to the nature of the manufacture or trade, all smoke arising therefrom. The magistrate having refused to state a case, the Divisional Court refused to grant a rule nisi for a mandamus to direct him to do so.

Sir Horace Davey, Q.C. (J. Walton with him), moved by way of appeal for a rule nisi for a mandamus as above.—[Lord ESHER, M.R.—Is not this an appeal from a decision in a criminal cause or matter within section 47 of the Judicature Act, 1873? If so, no appeal lies.] This is a civil proceeding arising out of a criminal matter. After Ex parte Whitchurch, 29 W. R. 922, 7 Q. B. D. 534, it must be admitted that the proceedings before the magistrate were proceedings in a criminal cause or matter. But the application for a mandamus is a proceeding arising, not in the criminal cause or matter, but out of it. It has its origin in a criminal matter, but it is not itself a proceeding in the criminal matter.

He also referred to Reg. v. Holl, 7 Q. B. D. 575, 29 W. R. Dig. 81; Ex parte Woodhall, 36 W. R. 65, 20 Q. B. D. 832; Bell-Cox v. Hakes, ante, p. 145, 15 App. Cas. 506.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—We must stand by what we said in Ex parte Woodhall. This is an application for a mandamus to a magistrate to state a case in respect of a decision of his under section 91 of the Public Health Act, 1875. The objection has been taken by the court that it has no jurisdiction to entertain the appeal. The decision of the magistrate, it is admitted, was a decision in a criminal cause or matter. It is said, however, that the application for a mandamus is not a proceeding in a criminal cause or matter inasmuch as the mandamus is only to require the magistrate to state a case, and cannot of itself affect the question whether the magistrate's decision in the criminal cause or matter was right or wrong. It comes to this: the magistrate was asked to take a step in a criminal matter, which he refused to do, and the mandamus is applied for to compel him to take that step.

In Ex parte Woodhall we did not rest our decision upon the facts of the particular case. The court deliberately undertook to determine when, as a rule of general application, it had jurisdiction. I said: "The result of all the decided cases is to show that the words 'criminal cause or matter' in section 47 should receive the widest possible interpretation. The intention was that no appeal should lie in any 'criminal matter' in the widest sense of the term, this court being constituted for the hearing of appeals in civil causes and matters." And later on I said: "I think that the clause of section 47 in question applies to a decision by way of judicial determination of any question raised in or with regard to proceedings, the subject-matter of which is criminal, at whatever stage of the proceedings the question arises." The appeal in the present case is against the decision of the Divisional Court refusing an application for a mandamus to the magistrate to state a case. This seems to me to come directly within the language I have quoted. The decision of the Divisional Court was a decision by way of judicial determination of a question raised in or with regard to proceedings, the subject-matter of which is criminal. In Ex parte Whitchurch the Queen's Bench Division made absolute an order for a certiorari to quash an order of justices directing the defendant to fill up an ashpit so as to be no longer a nuisance, on the ground that the order was not warranted by sections 94 and 96 of the Public Health Act, 1875, and it was held that no appeal lay from the ecision of the Queen's Bench Division. That was an pplication for a certiorari to bring up an order of ustices for the purpose of having it determined hether the justices had gone wrong in law, and this ourt refused to entertain an appeal. In the present ase the application is for a mandamus, but the andamus is for the purpose of bringing the matter efore the court upon a case stated to enable it to etermine whether the magistrate acted rightly or rongly in point of law. There seems to me to be o distinction between the two cases. The court, herefore, has no jurisdiction to entertain the appeal.

BOWEN, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. It not disputed that the proceedings before the agistrate were proceedings in a criminal matter, nd indeed Ex parte Whitchurch puts the matter eyond the reach of controversy. There remains he question whether an appeal lies from the deision of the Divisional Court upon an application or a mandamus to compel the magistrate to state a ase. It seems to me that if we entertained this ppeal we should be going contrary to all the cases rom Reg. v. Fletcher, 25 W. R. 149, 2 Q. B. D. 43, nd Reg. v. Steel 25 W. R. 34, 2 Q. B. D. 37, down to x parte Woodhall. The intention of the Judicature ct was that the Court of Appeal should not interfere ith the criminal procedure of the country, and we hould be interfering if we were to entertain an ppeal with respect to an application for a mandamus to compel a magistrate to take a step in a riminal proceeding. The decision of the Queen's ench Division is, therefore, a decision in a criminal ause or matter, and no appeal lies.

GUARDIANS OF THE POOR OF THE PARISH OF BRIGHTON (Appellants) v. GUARDIANS OF THE POOR OF THE STRAND UNION (Respondents). (a.)

oor law—Pauper—Settlement by residence—Removal before 1876—Poor Law Amendment Act, 1876 (39 & 40 Vict. c. 61), ss. 34, 36.

Section 34 of the Poor Law Amendment Act, 1876, ives a settlement in a parish by three years' continuous esidence therein; and section 36 provides that "the provisions relating to settlement shall not apply to any auper removed under any order of removal . . . efore the passing of this Act."

Held, that these words in section 36, "any pauper moved," apply only to a person who was a pauper at e time the Act was passed and so long as he remained pauper; and that, therefore, they do not operate to prive of the benefit of section 34 a person who had been moved under an order of removal in 1866, but who was t a pauper at the time the Act was passed, and who had sided continuously in one parish from 1870 to 1881.

Case stated by order of Pollock, B., in an appeal gainst an order for the removal of a pauper named atilda Corbett, from the Strand Union, in the county London, to the parish of Brighton, in the borough Brighton, made by two justices of the peace for e County of London, and dated the 22nd day of July, 1890, whereby it was adjudged that the place of the last legal settlement of Matilda Corbett, a pauper chargeable to the respondents' union, was in the appellants' parish of Brighton.

The appellants appealed against this order of removal.

The pauper is the lawful daughter of G. and M. Corbett, and was born in the parish of Hove in March, 1862.

By an order of removal, dated the 13th of July, 1866, made by the stipendiary magistrate for the borough of Brighton, it was adjudged that the place of the last legal settlement of the mother of the pauper and of the pauper herself, then being an infant aged about four years, was in the parish of Blockley in the Shipston-on-Stour Union.

The mother of the pauper died about the month of October, 1866, and under the above-mentioned order of the 13th of July, 1866, the pauper was duly removed to the Shipston-on-Stour Union on the 8th of November, 1866.

In June, 1873, the pauper, who had previously been residing in service in the appellants' parish of Brighton since the year 1870, entered into another service in the same parish, where she remained for three years. She then left this service, and after residing for two or three days at the house of a friend in the same parish, went direct into another service in the parish, where she remained and resided for about two years. On leaving this service she again resided with her friend for two or three weeks in the same place as before, and she then went into another service in the parish, where she remained and resided for about twelve months. She then returned to her friend in the same parish, and remined with her until she went into another service in the same parish, where she remained for about a month, namely, until about the month of April, 1881, when she went to Paris to reside.

During the whole period between 1870 and the early part of the year 1881 the pauper did not reside or sleep at any place other than those abovementioned, namely, in the parish of Brighton, nor did she at any time during that period receive poor relief, and she has not since acquired a fresh settlement.

The grounds on which the order of removal now appealed against was made were that the pauper last resided for upwards of three years continuously up to the year 1881 in the parish of Brighton, and acquired a settlement by such residences, in accordance with the provisions of the statute 39 & 40 Vict. c. 61, s. 34.

The appellants' grounds of appeal were—

(1) That the pauper was not at the time of the making of the said order, and never had been, legally settled in the parish of Brighton; and

(2) That the said order of removal and the grounds of removal relating thereto were defective and bad, because the pauper, having been removed from the parish of Brighton to the parish of Blockley in the Shipston Union under the order of removal dated the 13th of July, 1866, and before the passing of the statute 39 & 40 Vict. c. 61, could not acquire a settlement under that Act, owing to the provisions of the 36th section thereof.

The respondents contended that the pauper acquired a settlement by three years' continuous residence in the parish of Brighton, under and by virtue of the provisions of section 34 of 39 & 40 Vict. c. 61, notwithstanding the provisions of the 36th section of that statute.

The question for the opinion of the court was—

Whether the pauper, by reason of the facts beforementioned, acquired a settlement by residence, and was now settled in the parish of Brighton, under and by virtue of the provisions of the said statute, 39 & 40 Vict. c. 61, and whether an order of removal to Brighton could be validly made under the statute or otherwise.

Section 34 of the Divided Parishes and Poor Law Amendment Act, 1876 (39 & 40 Vict. c. 61), provides:—"Where any person shall have resided for the term of three years in any parish, in such manner and under such circumstances in each of such years as would, in accordance with the several statutes in that behalf, render him irremovable, he shall be deemed to be settled therein until he shall acquire a settlement in some other parish by a like residence or otherwise; provided that an order of removal in respect of a settlement acquired under this section shall not be made upon the evidence of the person to be removed, without such corroboration as the justices or the court think sufficient."

Section 36 provides:—"The provisions relating to settlement shall not apply to any pauper removed under any order of removal, or without such order under the provision in that behalf contained in the Union Chargeability Act, 1865, before the passing of this Act, or in receipt of non-resident relief lawfully given, or in respect of whom any order of removal shall be pending at the passing of this Act."

Cur. adv. vult.

April 17.—A. L. SMITH, J., read the following judgment:—By order of removal, dated the 13th of July, 1866, Matilda Corbett, an infant of about four years of age, and a pauper, was removed with her mother from Brighton to the parish of Blockley, in the Shipston-on-Stour Union, such then being her place of legal settlement.

Four years after, namely, in the year 1870, she returned to Brighton, and from that year till April in 1881 she continuously resided there, and thus attained the privilege of irremovability therefrom. In April, 1881, she broke her residence in Brighton and went to Paris, and ultimately, in the year 1890, she became chargeable to the Strand Union.

The question is, under these circumstances, to what place is she now to be removed—to Brighton or to Blockley. The justices decided to Brighton, and hence the present appeal.

Apart from the Divided Parishes and Poor Law Amendment Act, 1876 (39 & 40 Vict. c. 61), she would be removable to Blockley, such being her last place of legal settlement. She had only acquired the privilege of irremovabilility from Brighton whilst she continued to reside there, and this privilege she lost when she broke her residence there and went to Paris in 1881. But it is said by the respondents that section 34 of the Divided Parishes Act, 1876, gave her a settlement in Brighton by reason of three years' residence there. The material parts of section 34 of the Act of 1876 are as follows:—[His lordship read section 34.] This Act came into operation on the 15th of August, 1876. At that date the pauper had resided in Brighton for six years, and she continued to reside there for four more years before she broke her residence, under circumstances which gave her unquestionably a settlement in Brighton under this section, whether the three years' residence is to be computed before or after the passing of the Act. This is clear.

But it is said that section 34 does not apply to the pauper at all, because of section 36, and it is upon the true construction of this section that this case hinges. [His lordship read section 36.] This section comprises four cases to which section 34 is not to apply. The first case to which it shall not apply is, "To any pauper removed by order of removal before the passing of the Act"; the second case is, "To any pauper removed by consent before the passing of the Act"; the third case is, "To any pauper in receipt of non-resident relief"; the fourth case is, "To any pauper in respect of whom any order of removal shall be pending at the time of the passing of the Act." It will be noticed that section 36 changes the phraseology of the party dealt with in sections 34 and 35 from "person" to "pauper," and also that cases one and two deal with matters that had occurred before the passing of the Act and not after; that case three apparently deals with matters at any time occurring, whether before or after the passing of the Act; and case four to matters occurring at the time of the passing of the Act. Therefore in this section there are different ways in which the word "pauper" may be read. In cases one and two the word may mean any person being a pauper before or at the time of the passing of the Act; it cannot mean being a pauper after the passing of the Act. In case three it may mean being a pauper before, at the time, or after the passing of the Act. In case four it must mean being a pauper at the time of the passing of the Act. Then what is the true reading of the word "pauper" when applied to the present case? Is it to be read so as to take away the settlement unquestionably given by section 34 if the section stood alone?—"Any person being a pauper at any time before the passing of the Act"—or is it to be read so as to leave her with the settlement conferred by section 34—that is, "any person being a pauper at the time of the passing of the Act"? It is the last reading which I prefer and apply to this case. It may well be that the Legislature, by cases one and two in section 36, intended to prevent the settlement of one who was a pauper when the Act passed, and whose legal settlement had been then determined, either by adjudication or consent, from being ripped up and the new settlement given by section 34 placed in its stead, and, indeed, this appears to me to have been the intention of the Legislature, and that it did not intend that a person—as in this case—removed when an infant, should never thereafter obtain the benefit of the new settlement by residence conferred by section 34, which is the point contended for by the appellants. I am aware that there are decisions upon the Act which have said that, in some instances, at any rate, the Act is not retrospective, but, for the reasons above, I have come to the conclusion that the word "pauper" in section 36, in cases one and two, is to be read as "pauper at the time the Act was passed," and in my opinion the judgment of the justices was correct, and that the appeal must be dismissed, with costs.

GRANTHAM, J., read a written judgment to the same effect.

May 27.—The guardians of the parish of Brighton appealed.

Lumley Smith, Q.C., and F. C. Gore, for the appellants.—The effect of section 36 of the Poor Law Amendment Act, 1876, is that a person who was once removed before the passing of the Act cannot ever acquire a settlement by virtue of that Act.

They cited Reg. v. Guardians of Ipswich, 25 W. R. 511, 2 Q. B. D. 269; Guardians of Sunderland v. Clerk of the Peace for Sussex, 30 W. R. 337, 8 Q. B. D. 99; Guardians of Westbury-on-Severn v. Guardians of Barrow-in-Furness, 26 W. R. 372, 3 Ex. D. 88.

Poland, Q.C., and Alexander Glen, for the respondents.—Section 36 is only a saving clause, and was not meant to affect any persons who were not paupers at the time the Act was passed.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—The question in this case turns on the construction of section 36 of the Divided Parishes Act, 1876. No doubt we must avoid breaking any of the ordinary canons of construction, and where the grammatical interpretation of the words is perfectly clear we have no right to depart from it unless there is something, either in the subject-matter of the Act or in the context, which both enables and compels us to do so. It has been argued before us that we ought to add certain words to the section in order to make it intelligible. I do not think that we have any right to do so, and therefore if section 36 had referred to "any person" and not to "any pauper" I should have thought that it was impossible for us not to construe the section in the manner for which the appellant union contends. But while sections 34 and 35 refer to "any person," when we come to section 36 we find the words are changed, and the language used is "any pauper." It is an ordinary rule of construction that when different words are used in the same Act, and dealing with the same subject-matter, the alteration in language has primâ facie been made with an intent and for some purpose. Let us, therefore, see whether "pauper" in section 36 is the same as "person" in the two previous sections. In my opinion the word "pauper" in section 36 is used to denote a difference from "person" in the earlier sections. It is meant to apply only to a person who is a pauper at the passing of the Act, and so long as he remains a pauper, but it does not apply in my opinion to a person who was not a pauper at the time of the passing of the Act. That really determines this case for it is admitted that Matilda Corbett was not a pauper at the time the Act was passed, and therefore section 36 has no application to her.

The great difficulty that I have felt in the case has been that it was argued that the result of this construction would be to apply the section to a person who, though a pauper at the time of the passing of the Act, subsequently ceased to be a pauper. I do not, however, think that that is so. As I read the section it applies to a pauper who is a pauper at the time of the passing of the Act, and so long as he remains a pauper, but no longer. Directly he ceases to be a pauper he becomes capable of acquiring a settlement under section 34, and the provisions of section 35 apply to him. I think that in the construction I put on the section I add nothing to it. I only expand and explain the word "pauper" as differing from the word "person" in the other sections.

I agree, therefore, with the decision of the Divisional Court, and think that this appeal must be dismissed.

LOPES, L.J.—It is perfectly clear that Matilda Corbett had acquired, under section 34, a settlement in the parish of Brighton, unless, under the provisions of section 36, she was prevented from doing so. The Act is one of considerable difficulty, and its language is far from clear, but, in my opinion, while sections 34 and 35 introduced great and material alterations into the law, section 36 was intended as a kind of saving clause of existing or pending proceedings. I entirely agree with the construction put upon the section by the Master of the Rolls. It applies to a person who at the time of the passing of the Act was a pauper and had been removed at that time, or who was under a consent order for removal under the Union Chargeability Act, 1865, or who, by receiving non-resident relief, admitted his chargeability, or against whom an order for removal had been made which was under appeal; and it applied to him, as the Master of the Rolls has said, only so long as he was a pauper.

It is clear that Matilda Corbett did not come under any of those categories at the time of the passing of the Act, and therefore she was capable of acquiring, and has acquired, a settlement in Brighton.

KAY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion, and feel no difficulty whatever about the case. If persons are described in any Act of Parliament by a particular status, primâ facie that means that the persons referred to have that status at the time of the passing of the Act. Section 36 refers to any pauper, and therefore it must mean any person who at the time of the passing of the Act was a pauper. The contention of the appellants would oblige us to alter the language of the Act in a manner which we have no authority to do, and which would, in my opinion, be contrary to the intention of the Act.

For those simple reasons I agree that the appeal must be dismissed.

On the question whether a person who was a pauper when the Act passed can afterwards acquire a settlement I desire to say nothing.

Appeal dismissed.

JOYNER v. WEEKS. (a.)

Landlord and tenant—Covenant to deliver up premises in repair—Measure of damages.

Unless something has taken place during a tenancy with regard to the property demised which alters the relationship of landlord and tenant, the measure of damages for breach of a covenant to leave premises in repair is the amount required to put the premises into such repair as was originally contemplated by the covenant.

Motion to set aside a judgment of an official referee.

The facts of the case and the arguments appear sufficiently in the judgment of the Divisional Court.

Jelf, Q.C., and W. H. Clay, for the defendant.

Cur. adv. vult.

April 17.—The following judgment of the COURT (WILLS and WRIGHT, JJ.), was delivered by WRIGHT, J.—This was an action for damages for breach of covenant by the lessee of a house to keep it in repair and deliver it up in repair. The cause was referred for trial before an official referee, who was to direct judgment to be entered and otherwise deal with the whole action pursuant to order 36. He gave judgment for the plaintiff for one farthing, and ordered him to pay to the defendant the whole costs of the action.

The facts are thus stated by the official referee:—"This is an action by the survivor of three lessors of a house, No. 10, Holborn-bars, against the lessee for damages for breach of a covenant to surrender the premises at the expiration of his lease (which was dated the 10th of November, 1868, and expired on the 25th of March, 1889) well and sufficiently repaired in accordance with the terms of the lease. The cost of making good the dilapidations was proved before me to be £70. Plaintiff's counsel claimed as damages the whole amount of this cost. The defendant without admitting liability had paid into court £45, but his counsel contended that under the circumstances which I am about to state I ought to give nominal damages only. On the 20th of May, 1887, the plaintiff, together with several other persons beneficially interested in the reversion, executed a lease of the house No. 10 to Samuel Lewis, who was the tenant of Nos. 9 and 11, which were subject to the same trusts as No. 10. This lease was for a term of twenty-one years, to commence on the 25th of March, 1889, when the defendant's lease of No. 10 would expire. The rent was £300, and Lewis covenanted to lay out £200 in making alterations to No. 10, and the adjoining houses Nos. 9 and 11 for the purpose of establishing communication between them. He also covenanted to keep the premises in repair. The defendant had carried on a millinery business at No. 10, and Lewis a draper's business at Nos. 9 and 11, and the object was to throw the three ground floors into one shop for Lewis's business. Immediately after the expiration of defendant's lease Lewis made the alterations, and in the course of them demolished some parts of No. 10 which were out of repair, and the cost of putting them into repair would have been £45. Lewis had made no claim to be reimbursed the cost to which he was put in repairing, and on the terms of his lease it was clear that he had no right to make any such claim. For the defendant it was urged that the plaintiff had suffered no loss by the breach of the covenant, and therefore ought not to have more than nominal damages. As a matter of fact, the plaintiff had suffered no loss, and never could have suffered any loss except in the possible contingency of a failure by Lewis to perform the covenants in his lease, and a consequent determination thereof. Nothing of this kind in fact happened, and it was not suggested that even if Lewis had to be evicted there would be found still remaining any of the dilapidations which the defendants had left."

The first question which arises on the judgment of the learned referee is whether he was right in awarding one farthing as damages on the ground that the plaintiff had sustained no loss. We do not understand the finding to be to the effect that the house was at the end of the term substantially as valuable to occupy, sell, or let in its then actual state as it would have been if the covenant had been duly performed. What the effect of such a finding would have been must be considered later on. The finding appears to be at least consistent with the view that the house was substantially less valuable to occupy, sell, or let by reason of the non-repair; and in substance to amount to no more than this, that the plaintiff had before the end of the defendant's tenancy happened to find another tenant who for reasons of his own was content to give as much for the house as he would have given if it had been properly repaired. If this is the correct view of the judgment, we think that the finding that the plaintiff has sustained no loss is based upon an erroneous view of the law. The breach of contract and a consequent diminution of the value of the plaintiff's interest in the house—apart from any special circumstances connected with the new lease—being supposed, the suggested kind of ademption of loss appears to us to be too remote, uncertain, and accidental to be properly made the ground of decision.

Many cases may be put in which it is plainly immaterial that at the commencement of an action for a breach of contract the plaintiff is in fact no worse off than he would have been if the contract had been performed. Charity, insurance, an alteration of market values, may have recouped or nullified his loss. Or it may be proved that the plaintiff, if he acted as a prudent man, in his own interest would at the end of the defendant's term have pulled down the house, even though duly repaired, and built a different kind of structure, so that the repairs, if done, would have been of no value, but he chooses to re-let the house in its existing state. In such a case it could hardly be contended that he might not recover substantial damages. The person whose breach of contract has caused damage is not the less liable because the damage has been made good, or its effect compensated by an extraneous event of such a kind that if it had operated the other way it would not have increased his legal liability. Nor does it seem to us that the relation between the plaintiff and the defendant is directly, if at all, affected by the terms of an agreement made by the plaintiff with a third person before the expiration of the defendant's term. That agreement might be rescinded or might never be performed. When it was made the parties to it could not foresee, and did not contract on the basis that there would, at the end of the defendant's term, be any breach of the contract to deliver up in repair. It must be not the making, but the performance of the new agreement to which the supposed effect would be attributable. But, if so, then at the moment of the termination of the defendant's tenancy, and before the new agreement was performed, a cause of action vested in the plaintiff against the defendant, and this could not be taken away or affected by the subsequent res inter alios acta.

Such authorities as are to be found appear to be consistent with this view. Colley v. Streeton (1823), 2 B. & C. 273; Oldershaw v. Holt (1840), 12 A. & E. 590; and Davies v. Underwood (1857), 6 W. R. 105, 2 H. & N. 570, may be referred to, but they throw little, if any, light on the matter. In Rawlings v. Morgan (1865), 13 W. R. 746, 18 C. B. N. S. 776, the point came near to being, but was not, decided. There, before the end of a lessee's term, his lessor had verbally agreed to give a building lease to a new tenant, who, in fact, entered on the expiration of the first term and pulled down the premises, and afterwards (but apparently before the action) obtained a building lease in conformity with the verbal agreement. The dilapidations were £22, but the terms of the building lease were not affected by the existence of the dilapidations. The lessor sued the first lessee for the £22, and was allowed to recover the full amount. The argument was the same as in the present case, that the plaintiff had, in fact, sustained no loss. Erle, C.J., and Keating, J., declined to say what their opinion would have been if, during the defendant's term, the plaintiff had made a binding agreement with the new tenant. Byles, J., relied exclusively on the fact that before any binding agreement had been made with a new tenant, a cause of action for the £22 had accrued. Montague Smith, J., doubted whether such a binding agreement would have in any way affected the plaintiff's right as against the defendant. In Inderwick v. Leech (1884), as reported in the Times Law Reports (Vol. 1), at pp. 95 and 485, the lessor, at the end of the term and before action, pulled down the house, but Lopes, J., at Nisi Prius, and Lord Coleridge, C.J., and Cave, J., in the Divisional Court, held him entitled to recover the sum which would have been the cost of repair. Lastly, in Morgan v. Hardy (1886), 35 W. R. 254, 17 Q. B. D. 770 (reversed on appeal on another point, but not appealed on this point), Denman, J., came to a similar conclusion, although it appeared that, owing to a change in the character of the neighbourhood, the house was as valuable at the end of the term without some of the repairs as it would have been if they had been done.

We think, therefore, that, both on principle and on the authorities, the ground on which the official referee limited the damages to a farthing is not tenable.

It does not, however, follow either that judgment can be entered for the £70, or that, on other grounds, the official referee could not properly have given nominal damages only, and it is necessary to endeavour to ascertain what is the proper rule for ascertaining the measure of damages in cases of this kind, extraneous agreements or matters being put aside. Considering the frequency with which this question must arise, the absence of clear and decisive authority is not a little remarkable.

Where a tenant covenants to repair during the term, and the action is brought during the term, the lessor, if he has reserved to himself a sufficient power of entry, and has done the repairs, may, of course, recover the cost. If he has not reserved such power, and if no measure of damages is fixed by his own liability to a superior lessor, Lord Holt is said to have held in Vivian v. Champion (1705), 2 Lord Raymond, 1125, 1 Salk. 141, that the lessor ought to recover the sum which the repairs would cost. Lord Cranworth, on the other hand (when Rolfe, B.), held, in Marriott v. Cotton (1848), 2 C. & K. 553, that the damages should be only nominal. Marriott v. Cotton is stated to have been reversed: see in Bell v. Hayden, 9 Ir. C. L. Rep. 301. Both these decisions have been repeatedly questioned so far as they might be regarded as laying down any general rule; and it seems to be now settled that in such cases the jury, on the one hand, are not bound to give the cost of repairing, and, on the other hand, are not limited to nominal damages, even where the length of the term unexpired is so great that no real damage can be proved, or the accumulated proceeds of investment of a nominal sum would, at the end of the term, provide more than a sufficient fund: Doe v. Rowlands (1841), 9 C. & P. 734; Turner v. Lamb (1845), 14 M. & W. 412; Macnamara v. Vincent (1852), 2 Ir. Ch. Rep. 481; Smith v. Peat, (1853), 9 Ex. 161, 2 W. R. C. L. Dig. 154; Bell v. Hayden; Mills v. East London Union (1872), 21 W. R. 142, L. R. 8 C. P. 79; Beattie v. Quirey (1876), Ir. Rep. 10 C. L. 516, 25 W. R. Dig. 139; Metge v. Kavanagh (1877), Ir. Rep. 11 C. L. 431, 26 W. R. Dig. 74. There is in these cases the less probability of injustice to the lessor in leaving the jury somewhat at large, because the lessor can bring repeated actions.

But when, as in the present case, the term has expired and damages must be recovered once for all, the necessity of a more certain rule is apparent. Two measures have been suggested, the first, the amount of money which it will cost the lessor to do the repairs, with some allowance for loss of rent or occupation during the time of reparation, and with some deduction, where proper, by reason of substitution of new for old; the second, the diminution of the value of the lessor's estate by reason of the non-repair. In general they will both come to the same thing, and it can seldom be the case that the diminution in value can be more than the cost of repair. It may, however, often be the case that the diminution in value by reason of some or all of the tenant's defaults is much less than the cost of making them good. A part of the structure may have been designed for a purpose which has become obsolete, or a building may for many reasons be found at the end of a term to be as valuable, or nearly as valuable, in a partially as in a completely repaired state. In such cases which measure is to preferred? The former, the cost of repairing, is adopted with more or less positiveness in the following cases:—Vivian v. Champion (action during term); Davies v. Underwood, per Watson, B.; Rawlings v. Morgan, per Montague Smith, J.; Woodhouse v. Walker (1880), 28 W. R. 765, 5 Q. B. D. 404, per Lush, J.; Morgan v. Hardy (not reversed on this point); Nixon v. Denham, 1 Ir. L. R. 100; Metge v. Kavanagh. The latter, the diminution in value, is supported in the following:—Colley v. Streeton (action during term); Doe v. Rowlands (action during term); Turner v. Lamb (action during term); Smith v. Peat; Davies v. Underwood, per Bramwell, B.; Rawlings v. Morgan, per Erle, C.J.; Mills v. East London Union (action during term); Beattie v. Quirey; Lombard v. Kennedy (1888), 21 L. R. Ir. Ch. D. 201, 36 W. R. Dig. 113.

In Inderwick v. Leech the two measures seem to be regarded as identical.

It appears to us that the better measure is the amount of the diminution of value, but not exceeding the cost of doing the repairs (with the addition or deduction as above suggested), and that in the cases which appeared to adopt the other test it was not intended to decide that the cost of repairing ought to be, or can properly be, given so far as it exceeds the diminution of value. To give that excess might, in effect, be to give an unfair kind of specific performance to the great detriment of the lessee without any advantage to the lessor, as such, whereas the proper function of a right of action for damages for breach of contract seems to be to make good to the aggrieved party the damage which he has actually sustained: see Robinson v. Harman (1848), 1 Ex. 850, and per Erle, C.J., in Rawlings v. Morgan.

A similar rule has been applied in an action for wrongfully pulling down a house: Hosking v. Phillips (1848), 3 Ex. 168, at p. 182, except—where the value was personal and exceptional: Duke of Newcastle v. Hundred of Broxtowe, 4 B. & Ad. 273—in an action for breach of covenant to build a wall: Wigsell v. School for Indigent Blind (1882), 30 W. R. 474, 8 Q. B. D. 357—and in an action for waste by removing soil: Whitham v. Kershaw (1885), 34 W. R. 340, 16 Q. B. D. 613. And compare Pell v. Shearman (1855), 10 Ex. 766, 4 W. R. C. L. Dig. 164, as to breach of covenant to sink a coal pit.

It may be urged that such a rule will admit expert evidence to an inconvenient extent; but this is not a sufficient reason for acting upon a wrong principle. Nor is this objection in fact obviated by the apparently more simple rule of taking the cost of repairs. It is matter of common experience that the cost of repairs is the subject of oppressive litigation.

Applying these conclusions to the present case, we think that the judgment of the official referee must be set aside, but that judgment cannot be entered for the £70 or the £45, or any other sum, and a new trial must take place (unless the parties can agree), in which the question will be how much, if at all, the value of the plaintiff's estate and interest in the premises was diminished by the non-repair, regard being had to the situation and other circumstances, including the consideration that a tenant of the adjoining houses might be willing to give as much for the plaintiff's house in its unrepaired state as he would have given if the covenant had been performed. In this inquiry the suggested doctrine (if in any case correct) that in actions brought during the term the jury are never bound to give more than nominal damages, appears to us to be inapplicable, notwithstanding the dictum attributed to Byles, J., in Rawlings v. Morgan. When the action is brought after the end of the term and the damages assessed according to legal principle are shown to be of any particular amount, we see no justification for reducing them on the mere ground that the plaintiff has, by reason of some matter not legally relevant, been saved from being out of pocket or being recouped. Further, even if the referee should come to the conclusion that the damages sustained are small, we think that if a substantial breach of the covenant has been committed, he would not be justified in dismissing the action, as he has practically done. The Divisional Court cannot interfere with his legal discretion as to costs, but in an action of this kind, where the defendant has made a substantial default, the circumstances must, in our opinion, be very peculiar which could make it right, not merely to deprive the plaintiff of costs, but to make him pay the costs of the action. There must be an order for a new trial; the costs of this motion will be reserved.

May 5.—The defendant appealed against this decision.

Jelf, Q.C., and Clay, for the appellant.

Lumley Smith, Q.C., and Chapman, for the respondent.

The arguments used and cases cited were the same as in the court below.

Lord ESHER, M.R.—In this case the plaintiff brings an action against the defendant upon a covenant in a lease that the defendant would leave the premises in repair. It is admitted that the lease has come to an end and that the premises were then left out of repair by the defendant. That is to say, there was a breach of covenant as between the plaintiff and defendant. The plaintiff has proved that the cost of putting the premises into such repair as was originally contemplated by the covenant would be £70. The defendant says that he is not bound to pay that sum to the plaintiff because the plaintiff had really suffered damages only to a nominal extent, or that, at any rate, he was not liable for more than £45, which he accordingly paid into court, with an alternative defence denying liability. The ground on which the defendant establishes his case is that during the time that the lease was running, and while the defendant was in possession of the premises, the plaintiff demised them to a third party, who covenanted to pull down and alter them, and to hold them at an advanced rent. The defendant, therefore, says that, under those circumstances, his breach of the covenant to leave the premises in repair did the plaintiff no harm. The question for us is whether or not the court is entitled to take those circumstances into consideration in estimating the damages due for the breach of covenant. The case was sent for trial to an official referee, and he gave the plaintiff one farthing damages and ordered him to pay all the costs. The plaintiff appealed, and the Divisional Court sent the matter back for a new trial, and in a long and most industrious judgment they laid down for the guidance of the official referee the rule on which the damages ought to be assessed. Then there is an appeal to us, and we have to say whether, on the undisputed facts, judgment ought not to be entered for the plaintiff for £90, and whether the rule laid down by the Divisional Court as to the mode of assessing the damages is right or wrong.
